Nor is it perceived how the general authority thus given is in anywise restricted by the eighth clause of this charter as was contended for by counsel. That section is in these terms, viz.: "That it shall be lawful for the city council of said City, by ordinance, to order the raising and cause to be raised by tax from year to year such sum or sums of money as they shall deem expedient for defraying (among other things) the supplying the said City with water." It was argued that inasmuch as the power of taxation was authorized to be used annually, for the purpose of supplying the City with water, thereby a limitation was implied; and that the municipal authorities could not make a contract on that subject to continue for a longer term than a year.

But the authority to provide water for the public is given to the common council by a previous section of this charter; and consequently, the clause just recited has not the restrictive effect ascribed to it. The power to raise money annually is quite as consistent with an agreement calling for annual payments through a series of years as it is with an agreement existing but for a single year. The construction claimed would debar the City from entering into any contract on any subject whose performance would endure beyond a twelve month. Most, if not all, municipal charters have a similar provision for annual taxation; and it has never been suggested that such a clause constituted a limitation on the power of the corporate body to make contracts.

It may be further remarked that the section, part of which has been above quoted, bestows upon the council the right to borrow money for all the purposes for which it is authorized to raise money by tax. So that it is apparent that an unlimited authority to obtain from loans the funds requisite for the performance of this contract originally existed in this City.

In the next place it was urged that the contract in question is perpetual, it being asserted that the City had not the capacity to bind itself for an indefinite period. In the formulation of this proposition the counsel of the defendant somewhat overstated the force of the contract referred to, for in point of fact it has not necessarily indefinite extension in time; as by one of its clauses the City is empowered to put an end to it, whenever so minded, by a purchase of the works of the plaintiff.

But waiving this, the conclusive answer to the position is that the power to provide the City with a supply of water has been conferred by the Legislature upon the common council, in an unqualified form, and that the court has no competency to circumscribe such a grant. It is true that if the ordinance warranting the making of this contract was an act of gross indiscretion this court, by force of its prerogative to supervise corporations of this class, might (such ordinance having been brought before it by certiorari) have adjudged it to be invalid. But this ordinance has not been annulled; and not being an act ultra vires, the contract founded upon it is obligatory in law.

Finally, it was insisted that this covenant was illegal for the reason that it contravenes the supplement to the Crimes Act passed in 1876 (P. L. 1876, p. 16) which prohibits any board of aldermen or common council from incurring obligations in excess "of the appropriation and limit of expenditure provided by law for the purposes respectively of any such board."

Even upon the assumption that the provision referred to be applicable to the stipulations of a contract of this kind, the exception cannot prevail, inasmuch as the facts upon which the question depends are not present in this record. It does not follow because this covenant calls for payments in futuro indefinitely, that, of necessity, such an obligation was in excess of the limits of expenditure that the common council could not legitimately transcend. The court cannot assume, in the absence of an averment to that effect, that such was the state of affairs. For anything that appears in this record moneys may have been in hand, or an ordinance in existence authorizing the raising of funds, adequate to the disbursements required by this contract.

The plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

Board of Public Works of JERSEY CITY,
Mayor and Aldermen of Jersey City, et al.

- *1. The title of the members of the Board of Public Works of Jersey City cannot be questioned on a certiorari to review the proceedings of the Board.
2. Parties interested are not legally entitled to a hearing before the board of finance and taxation of Jersey City, upon the question whether that Board shall concur in a resolution of the Board of Public Works ordering a street improvement.

ON certiorari to review proceedings for a street opening. Proceedings affirmed.
Argued before Depue, Reed and Dixon, JJ.
Mr. John Linn, for prosecutor.
Mr. John A. Blair, for defendants.

Dixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court: This writ of certiorari is directed to the Board of Public Works of Jersey City, the Board of Finance and Taxation of Jersey City, and the Mayor and Aldermen of Jersey City, and requiring them to certify their proceedings for the opening of Pavonia Avenue from Tounelle Avenue eastwardly through the property of the prosecutor.

The first reason assigned for reversal of these proceedings is that the Board of Public Works does not legally exist. The argument presented in support of this reason is that the statutes concerning legislative commissions, which were approved March 6, 1877 (P. L. 1877, p. 54), and February 26, 1878 (P. L. 1878, p. 28), abrogated the previously existing mode of appointing the members of this Board by the Senate and General Assembly and did not constitutionally substitute any other method of appointment.

This argument involves an inquiry which cannot be made in the present controversy. It concedes that in legal theory there is such an entity as the Board of Public Works of Jersey City, but insists that the persons who assumed the functions of such a board had no legal authority for so doing. This is the oft repeated but always futile attempt to question collaterally the title of the de facto incumbents of public offices. If the Legislature had evinced a purpose to abolish the Board with all its powers, instead of a mere design to do away with a statutory mode of selecting its members, a very different question would now be raised; but we have found no evidence of such an intention.

This reason is insufficient.

The other reason alleged is that the Board of Finance and Taxation concurred in the resolution of the Board of Public Works for the opening of the avenue, without giving the prosecutor due opportunity to be heard in the matter. We think that the Board of Finance and Taxation was not under legal obligation to afford to the prosecutor any hearing whatever. The statute regulating the subject is the supplement to the city charter approved March 27, 1874 (P. L. 1874, p. 504, § 9), which substitutes the concurrence of the Board for the approval of the Mayor.

It has never been considered that parties interested had a legal right to a hearing before the Mayor, when resolutions affecting them were submitted to him; and we perceive no ground for claiming such a right in the fact that this Board is to act in his stead. The hearing to which parties are entitled on general principles is secured to them by statute before the Board of Public Works; but neither legislative enactment nor abstract justice requires more.

The proceedings brought up must be affirmed, with costs.

COURT OF APPEALS.

ROSENTHAL, Appt.,
v.
POOLE.

Money paid by an heir at law of an intestate, upon false representations, for services supposed to have been rendered in establishing his claim, concerning which there was no ground for litigation, held, on the facts, to be recoverable.

(Decided—1886.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Baltimore City Circuit Court, in favor of complainant in a suit to recover back money paid under false representations, and to have a release canceled. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Julian I. Alexander, for appellant.

Mr. John E. Semmes, for appellee.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is not much in this appeal, either in its legal aspects or in any other aspect, to commend it to the favorable consideration of the court. The facts out of which the controversy arises may be briefly stated as follows:

Thomas Dorney, a lunatic, died in the early part of the year 1882, leaving an estate of about $100,000. Before his death, Rosenthal, the appellant, who was his committee, made a contract with one Noah Lemmon and five other persons, claiming to be the heirs of Dorney, by the terms of which Rosenthal was to establish their right to the estate, and in consideration of his services was to receive 15 per cent on the assessed value of the estate; in other words, they were to pay him $15,000 if he succeeded in establishing their claim to the estate.

Shortly after the execution of this contract Dorney died, and some litigation followed as to who were his heirs and next of kin, which resulted, however, in favor of the parties represented by Rosenthal; and letters of administration on Dorney's estate were granted to Rosenthal, Caroline F. Carter, one of the distributees, and Francis Carter, her husband.

In January, 1882, a bill was filed for the sale and division of Dorney's real estate among the six distributees represented by Rosenthal. In all these proceedings the rights of Poole, the appellee, who lived in Pennsylvania and who was a half brother of Noah Lemmon and one of the heirs of Dorney, were entirely ignored. In June, however, while the bill for the sale and division of the real estate was pending, he made a visit to his half brother, Noah Lemmon then living in Baltimore, and while there made some inquiry about Dorney's estate, the reply to which was very indefinite, and without the slightest intimation by Noah of the proceedings for its sale and division between himself and others, to the exclusion of Poole. In the fall of that year, Carter, the husband of one of the distributees, and himself one of the administrators of Dorney, made a visit to Poole, in company with Mr. Cox, a lawyer of Washington. Carter told Poole that he was one of Dorney's heirs, and as such was entitled to one seventh of his estate; that Noah Lemmon and others had filed a bill to divide the property among themselves; that they denied his, Poole's, relationship to Dorney, and there would be great difficulty in establishing his claim to the estate. A great deal more was said, which it is unnecessary to repeat; it is sufficient to say that Carter induced Poole to sign a contract agreeing to give him, Carter, one third of Poole's share in consideration of services to be rendered by Carter in making good Poole's claim as one of the heirs at law of Dorney.

Shortly after the execution of this contract, Cox, the attorney, wrote to Rosenthal, stating that he represented Poole, who claimed a one seventh interest in Dorney's estate. A petition was also filed by Cox in the orphans' court, asking that letters of administration of Dorney's estate be granted to Poole, as the oldest male heir and, therefore, the party entitled under the law. This application was resisted by Rosenthal and resisted, too, upon the ground that there was no relationship of any kind between Poole and Dorney.

On the 11th of December, while this application was pending before the orphans' court, Rosenthal, in company with Lemmon, made a visit to Poole. What took place between them at that time, we shall not now stop to consider. One thing is certain: on the evening of that day Rosenthal and Lemmon returned to Baltimore, and with them came Poole. On the next day, December 12, Rosenthal appeared in the orphans' court, and admitted that Poole was one of the heirs of Dorney and, as such, entitled to letters of administration. In fact, he admitted everything set forth in Cox's petition to be true, all of which he had but a few days before denied. Now, what do we find next? On the same day, letters of administration on Dorney's estate were granted to Poole and Rosenthal, and at the same time a contract was signed by Poole, in which he relinquished all claim to commissions on the estate and agreed to pay Rosenthal 15 per cent of his share of the property. Rosenthal proceeded accordingly to settle the estate, and for his services charged and was allowed $15,000, one seventh of which, $2,142, was deducted from Poole's share.

In the meantime suit was brought against Poole by Carter, on the contract made with him and which Poole at the instance and by the advice of Rosenthal had repudiated. After testimony had been taken the suit was compromised by the payment of $2,500 to Carter by Poole, besides which Poole was obliged to pay $400 as counsel fee, one half of which was received by Rosenthal. Poole, it thus appears, had paid over $5,000 for services supposed to have been rendered by Carter and Rosenthal in establishing his claim to one seventh of this estate; a claim about which there never was any ground for litigation and about which there never was any contention after Rosenthal's visit to Poole.

The contract with Carter is not before us in this appeal; we are now dealing with the con tract between Poole and Rosenthal, and under which Rosenthal deducted $2,142 from Poole's portion of the estate.

And in dealing with this contract, we deem it unnecessary to state in detail what took place between the parties when it was made. Poole was an old man, over seventy years of age, very poor, unable to read or write; and it is enough to say that the testimony shows, beyond all question, that Rosenthal knew at the time all about Poole's contract with Carter, and further that Poole was induced to sign the agreement under which Rosenthal deducted the $2,142 upon the faith of representations made by Rosenthal and Lemmon, which representations were in fact untrue. We forbear further comment upon the testimony, except to say a court of justice will not permit one to reap a benefit under a contract made under circumstances such as this record discloses.

Daniel MYERS et al., Appls.,

v.

STATE of Maryland.

1. The statute (Acts 1874, chap. 483, § 81) requires tax collectors "to pay at such times as the law shall direct;" the bond given by a collector provided "for payment at such times as the county commissioners shall by law direct." Held, that the variance was immaterial.
2. The provision in the bond of a tax collector for Carroll County, that he shall "pay to the county commissioners or their order" money which he shall receive, is not impaired by the Act of 1872, chap. 232, making it the duty of the treasurer of Carroll County to "receive the proceeds of all taxes levied in the county." Payment to the treasurer is, in law, payment to the commissioners.
3. The facts that a tax collector reappointed to office was, at the time, in default under a former appointment, and that the sureties on his new bond were not notified by the appointing authorities of his existing defalcation, will not avail as a defense to the sureties.
4. A tax collector will not be relieved from liability to account for taxes collected by him, by the omission of other officials to observe the statutory requirements that the assessment account shall be kept in a separate book, and that moneys for educational purposes shall be levied separately.
5. A payment by a tax collector, of money collected by him on the taxes for one year, in discharge of the taxes for previous years with which he is chargeable, is a breach of his bond.
6. Sureties on an official bond are estopped from denying the official capacity of their principal.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Carroll Circuit Court, in favor of plaintiff in an action on a tax collector's bond. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William P. Maulsby, C. T. Reifsnider and C. E. Fink, for appellants.
Mr. D. N. Henning, for appellee.

Bryan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the State, on a bond executed by Daniel Myers and the other appellants.

At the trial in the circuit court evidence was offered on the part of the plaintiff to show that Myers had been collector of the county taxes in the third election district of Carroll County from May or June, 1872, continuously up to the 11th day of May, 1881; that he was on that day appointed by the county commissioners to collect the state and county taxes for that year; that when he was appointed he was allowed a salary of $200 a year; that on the 26th of June the rate of taxation was fixed by the county commissioners; that afterward the clerk of the county commissioners, who was also the county treasurer, delivered to Myers a book which contained a list of the taxpayers of said district, No. 3, with a statement of their assessable property, which book was made up by the said clerk by computations or calculations of his own from data contained in a book labeled on the back "Assessment Book 1876, District No. 3"; that the clerk took from Myers a receipt, dated June 7, 1881, which stated that he had received of the county commissioners of Carroll County a copy of the property in the third election district of said county, assessable for county purposes, amounting to the sum of $1,027,198, on which amount a tax of 50 cents (.975 remitted) on each $100 valuation was levied by said commissioners for county and school purposes, amounting to the sum of $5,140.87, etc.

Evidence was also offered tending to show that the date of the receipt was by mistake written June, instead of July; and it was also shown that on the 14th of November, 1883, Myers had confessed a judgment on the bond in suit for the sum of $2,448.28.

Judgment had been confessed by all the obligors of the bond; but subsequently it was stricken out as against the sureties, who are now the appellants, and the cause proceeded to trial against them. They set up a number of defenses to the action. We find in the record two demurrers in their behalf, and a large number of pleas and prayers for the instruction of the jury.

It is maintained that the bond is void because it does not pursue the form required by the statute. It recites that Myers had been duly appointed, by the county commissioners for Carroll County, collector of the county taxes for the year 1881, imposed or to be imposed by the said county commissioners for Carroll County on the assessable property in the third election district of said county. And the condition is in these words:

"If the above bounden Daniel Myers, appointed collector as aforesaid, shall well and faithfully execute the office of collector of the county taxes for Carroll County as aforesaid, and the several duties required of him by law, and shall well and truly account for and pay to the county commissioners for Carroll County, or their order, the several sums of money which he shall receive, or be answerable for by law, at such times as the county commissioners shall by law direct, then the above obligation to be void; otherwise to be and remain in full force and virtue in law."

The form of the condition substantially agrees with requirements of the statute. Acts 1874, chap. 483, § 81.

The principal variance which has been suggested is that the statute requires the collector to account for and pay at such times as the law shall direct; whereas, the bond in suit provides for payment at such times as the county commissioners shall by law direct. The statute was made for a great public purpose, which might not be defeated by minute and unsubstantial objections.

It is also said that as the Act of 1872, chap. 332, provides for the election of a treasurer for Carroll County, and makes it his duty to receive the proceeds of all taxes levied in the county, the collector could not lawfully comply with the condition of this bond. The Act is local, and applicable only to Carroll County. The treasurer is required to be clerk to the county commissioners, and it is made his duty "to receive and pay over, according to the directions of law or the order of the county commissioners, the proceeds of all taxes levied in said county."

Previous to the passage of this Act the county commissioners were invested by statute with the "charge of and control over the property owned by the county;" and since the passage of this Act the Legislature, by the Act of 1874, chap. 411, amended and re-enacted the statute, and preserved to them their powers in this respect. It is clear that the Act of 1872, for the appointment of a treasurer, cannot operate so as to impair or diminish them. He is the receiver and custodian of the money arising from taxes for the lawful purposes of the commissioners.

The Act of 1874, chap. 483, § 81, prescribed the same condition for a collector's bond as was required before the Act was passed for the appointment of a county treasurer. We are therefore required to hold, in view of this legislation, that payment to the treasurer is in law payment to the county commissioners.

Another ground for the avoidance of the bond is the alleged fraud of the commissioners in obtaining it. It appears that at the time Myers was appointed collector for the year 1881, he was a defaulter in considerable sums for taxes levied in 1880 and in previous years; and it is argued that it was the duty of the commissioners to inform the sureties of these defaults before the bond was executed, and that their failure to do so was a fraud which vacated it.

The question is not whether the bond would be rendered null and void by deception or by misrepresentation of the facts on the part of the county commissioners. The twenty-fourth plea explicitly set forth that the county commissioners fraudulently concealed the defalcations of Myers from the defendants, and that they were thereby induced to execute the bond. By overruling the demurrer to this plea, the court below decided that it set forth a good defense to the action.

It is further maintained that an active duty rested upon the commissioners to give this information to the sureties; and cases have been cited in which it was held that the sureties were entitled to receive from the obligee a full and frank disclosure of such matters. This case must not be compared to a contract between private individuals, where one person is in the employment of another, and sustains towards him a confidential relation, by virtue of which sureties might infer that he was regarded by his employer as a person of integrity. Nor should it be likened to a case where the bond binds the sureties to a responsibility for defaults which have already occurred. The commissioners are public officers, who are authorized to appoint another public officer, and are required to take from him a bond for the faithful performance of his duty in the future. The sureties know the extent of the obligations which they incur by executing the bond, and they must determine for themselves how far they are willing to trust to the integrity of their principal. The commissioners are bound by their public duty to appoint to office persons of capacity and honesty. For a delinquency in this particular they are not, however, responsible to the sureties on the official bond.

The rights, duties and obligations of all parties in this transaction are settled by the law, and upon that they must stand or fall. It is not made a requisite to the validity of the bond that the commissioners should give any information to the sureties; and it would be an unreasonable construction to interpolate such a clause in the statute.

Before considering the other defenses set up in discharge of the bond, it is necessary to consider the statute under which the taxes were levied.

By the forty-first section, the clerk of the county commissioners is required to keep "an accurate account of the assessment or rate of taxes assessed upon taxable property of the county and how such assessment is disposed of, in a book to be kept for the purpose alone;" and within ten days after such assessment he is required to deliver to the collector a fair copy thereof, or a copy of so much thereof as it shall be his duty to collect.

By the forty-second section it is made the duty of the collector to proceed to collect taxes within thirty days after receiving this copy, and to pay the county taxes to the county commissioners, or their order, within six months; and it is also directed by the same section that all moneys levied for educational purposes shall be levied separately and distinctly from the other items of taxation, and a list thereof provided for the school commissioners of the county.

By the eightieth section it is enacted that if any collector shall fail to account for and pay over the money he has collected, or ought to have collected, within the time required by law, his bond may be put in suit and he shall be chargeable with interest from the time the money ought to have been paid.

The evidence shows that the book containing a statement of the assessment which was delivered to the collector was made up by calculations and computation from data contained in another book, and was not a copy from some other statement previously made and entered in a book kept for that purpose alone. It also shows that the money for educational purposes was not levied separately from the other items of taxation. When we consider the vital importance of the power of taxation, and its indispensable relation to all the operations of government, we cannot infer that the Legislature intended to make the levy of the tax void, and discharge the collector from responsibility for the money received by him from taxpayers, because these matters of detail were not observed. Their omission in no way concerned the collector or affected his rights.

Evidence was offered on the part of the defendants, tending to show that Myers had collected the sum of $5,064.86, on account of the county taxes for 1881, and had paid it over to the county treasurer, and had directed it to be applied to the credit of the taxes for the year 1881, chargeable to him. There was evidence on the part of the plaintiff, tending to show that a portion only of this sum was directed by Myers to be applied to this credit, being the amount shown by eight separate receipts given him by the treasurer when the payments were made; and that the residue of this sum was applied, by his direction, to his defalcations for previous years.

If the commissioners or the treasurer knew that the money applied to the taxes due for previous years had been collected on the levy of 1881, certainly they would have had no right to permit such application; but in the absence of any knowledge of the sources from which it was obtained it was difficult to see how they could have prevented Myers from applying it to his indebtedness for any year which he might name. When the money was in his possession, there was nothing to identify it or to distinguish it from other funds under his control or rightfully belonging to him. The obligation assumed by his sureties was that he should pay the money in discharge of the tax levied, within the time required by law. If he paid it in discharge of previous taxes, it was as much a breach of his bond as if he had retained it in his own pocket. We think the law on this point is correctly stated in Colerain v. Bell, 9 Met. 499, and in Gwynne v. Burnell, 7 Cl. & Fin. 572.

Without enumerating the numerous rulings of the circuit court on the questions which we have been discussing, it is sufficient to say that they are in accordance with the views which we have expressed.

There are, however, other questions in the record. It is maintained that there is a variance between the bond described in the declaration and the one set out on oyer. There is a different collocation of phrases in the two instances; but the legal meaning and effect of the contract is the same.

The twenty-fifth plea is bad on demurrer, inasmuch as it is a special plea which in effect amounts to non est factum. Some of the pleas which were overruled are distinguishable from those which were sustained, by scarcely perceptible shades of difference. We think that the defenses sought to be made by them were clearly and distinctly made by the pleas which were held to be good. Some of the pleas held bad on demurrer violate settled rules of proceeding. For instance, the first plea alleges general performance; whereas, the breach being set out in the declaration, it ought to have traversed, or confessed and avoided it. Others seek to make defenses from which the defendants were estopped. After the defendants signed this bond they could not deny that Myers was collector, or that he was answerable as collector, or that there were county commissioners of Carroll County. Billingsley v. State, 14 Md. 369.

The first exception was taken to the ruling by the court that a notice to produce certain receipts was sufficient. If parol evidence had been offered and admitted, of the contents of these receipts, we would have been required to review the action of the court; but the record shows that they were produced by one of the counsel for the defendants, and they were offered in evidence. We do not suppose that it is contended that they were not admissible.

In the sixth exception the court allowed the plaintiff to ask his witness a question which was leading in its form. Leading questions are, in general, objectionable and not to be permitted; but sometimes they may be properly used for the purpose of bringing the mind of the witness to the point about which it is desired to interrogate him. There are, of course, other occasions when they ought to be allowed. We think that it may safely be left to the discretion of the court conducting the trial to decide when they should be asked.

We have not found it necessary to take up the very numerous rulings in this case, one by one; but we have given them all deliberate consideration, and find no error which works an injury to the appellants.

The rule laid down in the plaintiff's sixth prayer for the computation of interest is less favorable to the plaintiff than it ought to have been. Interest ought to be calculated on the principal sum due, and the payments ought first to be applied to the extinguishment of the interest then due, and what remains ought to be applied to the reduction of the principal. This mode of calculating the amount of the indebtedness would produce a greater sum than the rule stated in the sixth prayer.

1. To justify the supreme court in reversing a judgment for the erroneous exclusion of evidence, it must appear that such exclusion worked an injury to the appellant.
2. Where the issue is as to whether property, undertaken to be disposed of by a will made by a married woman, belonged to the testatrix or to her husband, the will is not admissible as evidence against the husband, unless he, with full knowledge, acquiesced in the disposition made by the wife.

3. A provision in a will, by which the testatrix undertakes to dispose of property as her own, being a declaration in her own favor, is not admissible upon the question of ownership of the property, even in rebuttal of declarations made by her, in her lifetime, against her interest.
4. There must be an express promise to repay, to create a liability on the part of a husband for money belonging to his wife, appropriated by him with her consent.
5. If money arising from real estate of a married woman is paid to her husband with her knowledge and she recognizes it as belonging to him and it is deposited in a bank in their joint names, payable to either of them or to the survivor; then, in the absence of an express promise by the husband to treat the money as the wife's separate estate, he has the right, on her death, to draw it from the bank.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas of Baltimore City, in favor of defendants in an action by devisees to compel defendants to return certain moneys as part of the estate of testatrix. Affirmed.

This action was commenced in the Orphans' Court of Baltimore City, and issues sent to the Common Pleas for trial. At the trial in the court of common pleas a verdict was rendered for the defendants, and plaintiffs appealed to this court.

In the year 1865 a lease for ninety-nine years renewable forever was made to Mrs. Brown, of a lot of ground in the City of Baltimore on Howard Street. Subsequently certain buildings were erected upon this lot which were partially paid for by a mortgage upon said property given by Mrs. Brown. The property as thus improved was subsequently taken by the city in the opening of Park Avenue; and the net amount, after paying the mortgage, fees and expenses, of $17,882.90 was paid over to Mrs. Brown July 29, 1871, by R. W. Templeton, who had represented the property in the condemnation proceedings. This payment was made by a check drawn in her favor by Templeton on the banking house of Johnson Bros. & Co. It was delivered to her by Templeton at his office in the presence of her husband.

On the same day Mr. and Mrs. Brown went together to the said banking house with the check, and received from it a check drawn to her order on the Commercial & Farmers' Bank, with which check they went together to the latter bank where she received the money and there delivered it to her husband. He wrapped the money up and about two hours afterwards in company with a friend took it home, counted it in the presence of his wife and friend, and locked it up in his safe.

Out of the money in this safe the sum of $8,076.92, was expended in the purchase of a ground rent and certain leasehold property which were conveyed to the wife as her sole and separate estate. Another part thereof, the sum of $2,000 was invested in her name upon a mortgage of certain property executed to her by John Creagh, which was subsequently sold under the mortgage and the proceeds paid over to her by J. Sellman Shipley; and another part thereof, to wit: the sum of $5,000, was deposited in the Eutaw Savings Bank of Baltimore, September 30, 1871, in the joint names of Sarah M. Brown and William Brown. Opposite their signatures on the bank book in the handwriting of the officer of the bank is the following entry:

"And to the survivor of them, subject to the order of either;" which entry, according to the long established usage of the bank, was made in all joint accounts for the convenience of the bank, whether the depositors did or did not request it. The customary pass book upon which a similar entry was made by the bank was issued in their joint names, upon which various deposits were credited from time to time and by which it appeared that various sums were withdrawn from the bank during Mrs. Brown's lifetime, sometimes being receipted for by William Brown, and sometimes by his wife.

February 27, 1875, a few days after Mrs. Brown's death, this account was closed by the withdrawal of the sum of $6,538.07 by William Brown, which is one of the sums of money in dispute.

The plaintiffs offered to prove by William J. Taylor, the husband of Martha Ann Taylor, one of the plaintiffs, by whom she sues as her next friend, that shortly after the deposit of $5,000 was made in the Eutaw Savings Bank, or a few days and not more than a week thereafter, the witness had a conversation with Mrs. Brown in the presence of her husband William Brown, one of the defendants; in which conversation she explained to the witness why her husband's name had been placed upon the pass book at the Savings Bank, and that her husband, who was present and heard the explanation, did not say anything or make any objection to it. The court, upon objection made by the defendants, refused said offer of proof, which is the ground of the plaintiffs' first exception.

The defendants, in order to show title in William Brown in his individual right to the sums of money in controversy, were allowed to put in evidence, by William Brown, Sr., and other witnesses, the declarations of Mrs. Brown made to them on different occasions, to the effect that all the money had been earned by her husband and none by her, and that it was all his to do as he pleased with; and were also allowed to prove by Thomas C. Butler, a lawyer, that, some three or four months before Mrs. Brown executed her last will and testament, which was prepared for her by J. Sellman Shipley, and executed by her in his presence and in the presence of her husband, William Brown told the witness that his wife wished to consult him about making a will, and took him to her house on Dalton Street, and she then and there told the witness while talking about the will "that the money was all her husband's and that she intended him to have it." The will was then offered in evidence by the plaintiff in rebuttal and, upon objection made was refused by the court; which ruling forms the ground of plaintiffs' second exception.

At the request of defendants the court granted the following instructions:

"If the jury find from the evidence that the defendant, William Brown, with the knowledge and consent of his wife, came into the possession of any of the moneys of his wife, then, in the absence of an express promise to return or to account to her for the same as her separate property, the law does not raise any implied promise from such a taking and using to repay the same.

"Even if the jury find from all the evidence in the cause that the sum of money which was on deposit in the Eutaw Savings Bank at the time of the death of Sarah Ann Brown was part of the price paid by the city upon property taken under condemnation proceedings, and that the title to said property stood in the name of Sarah Ann Brown, his wife; nevertheless, if they further find that with her consent and full knowledge the same was received from the city and paid over to her husband, and was taken possession of by him, and that she recognized the money to be rightfully his, and acquiesced in his assumption of dominion over it; and that afterwards the same was deposited in said bank in their joint names, payable to the order of either of them, or to the survivor; then in the absence of an express promise on his part to treat the same as her separate property, he had the right to draw the same after her decease as his own money, and the verdict of the jury must be for the defendants on the first issue.

"That it is a question of fact to be determined by the jury from all the facts and circumstances, and from the whole course of the conduct and dealings between the husband and wife in connection with the declarations, acts and admissions of the wife, relating to the property which stood in her name, and to the beneficial interest of her husband therein, and to his efforts in acquiring the same (if they shall find any such acts, declarations or admissions), whether the said William Brown got the possession and control of the sums of money mentioned in the declarations, or either of them, with the knowledge and consent of his wife; and if with her knowledge and consent he took possession of them or either of them, and used and appropriated it as his own; then for any such sums as he so took and appropriated with her knowledge and consent, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, unless and only in respect of such sum as they shall find that he expressly promised to repay, or to appropriate to her separate use; and that the law does not imply, from the husband's using the wife's money for his own purposes with her consent, a promise to refund; nor is the relation of debtor and creditor thereby established between them, as it would be under the same circumstances between other persons."

Messrs. E. O. Hinkley and Benjamin Kurtz, for appellants:

William J. Taylor, the husband of Martha Ann Taylor, and through whom she sues as her next friend and through whom the offer of proof of the declaration of testatrix as to the reason why the husband's name was placed upon the bank book was made, was a competent witness.

Trahern v. Colburn, 63 Md. 99.

The offer was admissible as part of the res gesta. The presence of the husband's name on the bank book, and the bearing of this circumstance upon his right to the money, in connection with other evidence in the case, was the principal fact; and his wife's explanation of it, although given shortly afterwards, was admissible.

Graves v. Spedden, 46 Md. 536; Handy v. Johnson, 5 Md. 463; Kobb v. Whitely, 3 Gill & J. 189; Central Bank v. Copeland, 18 Md. 318; 1 Whart. Ev. § 262; Whiteford v. Buckmeyer, 1 Gill, 127; Nusbaum v. Thompson, 11 Md. 557; Cooke v. Cooke, 43 Md. 522.

The offer was admissible as an admission by a party to the record by acquiescence. The husband was present when the explanation, which was in derogation of his title, was made; and by his silence assented to it.

Batturs v. Sellers, 5 Harr. & J. 119; Hayslop v. Gymer, 1 Adolph. & E. 162; Knight v. House, 29 Md. 194; 2 Whart. Ev. § 1136; Turner v. Brown, 6 Hun, 338; Green v. Harris, 8 Ired. (N. C.) 210.

The offer was admissible against both defendants, because it was an admission by acquiescence by the real party in interest and who, the defendants contend, was the owner of the property.

1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 180, 181; 1 Phil. Ev. § 486; Dent v. Dent, 3 Gill, 482; Davis v. Calvert, 5 Gill & J. 269.

It was admissible also in rebuttal of the husband's evidence which had been given in this case, in explanation as to why the account was opened at the bank in their joint names.

Rev. Code, art. 70, § 4.

It was admissible also as part of the res gesta as showing a declaration of ownership made by one deceased, while in possession and control of the property in dispute.

Garner v. Smith, 7 Gill, 1; Smith v. Morgan, 8 Gill, 183; Abend v. Mueller, 11 Ill. App. 257; Amick v. Young, 69 Ill. 542; U. S. v. Labbe, 13 Blatchf. 60; Roebke v. Andrews, 26 Wis. 311, 318; 2 Whart. Ev. § 1168.

Mrs. Brown's will showing that she claimed and treated the money in the Eutaw Savings Bank, referred to, as her own, and only intended to give her husband a life estate in it, was admissible to rebut the testimony of her husband and other witnesses, as to declarations made by her, at and about the time the will was executed, that the money all belonged to her husband and she intended him to have it.

Smith v. Morgan, 8 Gill, 183; Hall v. Monroe, 28 Md. 114; Clark v. Wood, 84 N. H. 452.

The exclusion of the will from the jury practically told them that Mrs. Brown died intestate, which would entitle her husband to the possession of the money without administration, under the Act of 1798, chapter 101, which was in force at the time of Mrs. Brown's death on June 12, 1874.

Hubbard v. Barcus, 88 Md. 175.

Mr. Bernard Carter, for appellees:

The issue here is whether this money belonged to testatrix's estate at the time of her death. As there is nothing to show any change of ownership after it was deposited, the question whether it was hers at the time of her death depends upon the question whether it was hers or her husband's at the time it was deposited.

Murray v. Cannon, 41 Md. 466; Taylor v. Henry, 48 Md. 550.

The offer of the testimony of Taylor, husband of one of the devisees was an offer of a declaration of a person whose title to the money is the very subject in dispute, to show title in herself, as against those whom it is attempted to charge with a devastavit because of their failure to treat the money as hers, and is inadmissible.

2 Whart. Ev. 1168, 1214.

Nor does the fact that it was made in the presence of William Brown, and that he did not make any objection to it, furnish any better ground for its admissibility, for there is no evidence that he heard it.

1 Greenl. Ev. 197, 199.

In a suit between him and those claiming under the wife, certainly no admission of his, made before the death of his wife and therefore before he became an administrator, can bind his coadministrator.

Dent v. Dent, 3 Gill, 482; Mangun v. Webster, 7 Gill, 78; Beatty v. Davis, 9 Gill, 220; Mason v. Poulson, 40 Md. 365; 2 Whart. Ev. 1210; 1 Greenl. Ev. 179, 180; Hammon v. Huntley, 4 Cow. 498; 2 Whart. Ev. 1199, 1199 a.

Nor can the explanation or declaration be admissible as a part of the res gestæ of the deposit.

"Declarations, to be a part of the res gestæ, must have been made at the time of the act they are supposed to characterize."

Miller v. State, 8 Gill, 145.

In the case just cited, the declaration in reference to the transaction was made in the evening of the day the transaction took place; but, being the narrative of a past transaction, was rejected.

Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Allison, 62 Md. 482. See also 1 Whart. Ev. §§ 259, 261; 2 Whart. § 262; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 108, 110.

It is a familiar principle of practice that the plaintiff is bound to offer all evidence pertinent to maintain the issue on his part in chief; but that even when not compelled to enter into evidence in chief, on any particular subject, yet if he does he must exhaust his evidence on this point.

Bannon v. Warfield, 42 Md. 39; Brown v. Ward, 53 Md. 356.

The attempt to dispose in the will of the money in the Eutaw Savings Bank is, at the most, but a declaration that testatrix considered it her money.

No such declaration is admissible against the defendants here, where the very issue is whether it was her property.

2 Whart. Ev. 1101, 1102.

It is a fundamental principle that where a declaration of a person on a certain occasion is put in evidence by the adversary, this only entitles the person whose declaration is put in evidence to offer all that was said on that occasion and not what was said on other occasions.

2 Whart. Ev. § 1108.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The following issues were sent by the Orphans' Court of Baltimore City, to the court of common pleas, for trial:

"1. Whether the sum of $6,588.07, which at the time of the death of Sarah Ann Brown was deposited in the Eutaw Savings Bank, or any part thereof, belonged to her estate?

MD.

"2. Whether the sum of $2,068.63, being the proceeds derived from the sale of certain property mortgaged by John Creagh and wife to Sarah Ann Brown, was part of the personal estate?"

At the trial of these issues, evidence was offered tending to prove that both of these sums belonged to Sarah Ann Brown; that an account was kept in the Eutaw Savings Bank, in the joint names of the said Sarah and her husband, William Brown, and the survivor, and subject to the order of either; and that the sum of $6,588.07, thus on deposit in the bank, was paid on the order of the husband after the death of his wife.

On the other hand, evidence was offered on the part of the appellees, tending to prove that the money in question belonged to William Brown, the husband; and further, that if the wife had any claim or title to the money, it was paid to the husband, and used by him with her knowledge and consent.

During the trial, the appellants offered to prove by the witness Taylor that a few days after the deposit of $5,000 in the savings bank, he had a conversation with Mrs. Brown in the presence and hearing of her husband, in which conversation she explained to witness why her husband's name had been placed upon the pass book of the bank, and to which explanation no objection whatever was made by the husband. The $5,000 thus deposited, was part of the sum of $6,588.07 paid to the husband after the death of the wife; and any explanation by her made in the presence and hearing of her husband, why it was deposited in their joint names and payable to the survivor, was clearly admissible. If no objection was made by him to such explanation, his silence might fairly be construed as an acquiescence in the truth of the statement made by the wife, and we do not see on what grounds the evidence was excluded. But the bill of exceptions does not set forth the explanation, to prove which the witness was offered; and for all that appears to the contrary, the explanation may have been wholly unimportant or immaterial.

To justify us in reversing the judgment, it must appear that the evidence objected to and excluded worked an injury to the appellants. As was said in Lawson v. Price, 45 Md. 183: "Before we can reverse the ruling excepted to, we must be able to see that the party really has grounds for exception, and may have been injured by what was done. For aught that appears, the answer of the witness may have been more favorable to the appellant than to the appellee." So here it is impossible for us to say that the appellants were in any manner prejudiced by the ruling below, because the record does not set forth either the purport or effect of the explanation offered in evidence.

We see no objection to the ruling in the second exception. The real issue before the jury was whether the money in controversy belonged to Sarah Ann, the wife, or to her husband; and the will of the wife in which she undertook to dispose of the money as her own was certainly not admissible as against the husband. It was nothing more or less than a declaration on her part that the money belonged to her; to make it admissible it must appear that the husband, with full knowledge, acquiesced or consented to such disposition on the part of his wife. The record does show that the will was executed in his presence, but it does not appear that it was read in his presence or that he had any knowledge of its contents.

In Edelin v. Sanders, 8 Md. 118, the objection was to the admission on the part of the defendant of his testator's will, whereby he disposed of certain property as his own, and which the plaintiff alleged had been conveyed to him, the testator, in secret trust. In disposing of this objection the court [p. 181] said: "Under no circumstances was the will of William Sanders competent testimony. To allow it to be given in evidence would be but to permit a party to testify in his own case and in his own behalf." And although a party is, under our Evidence Act, a competent witness in his own case, yet upon no principle can his unsworn declaration in his own behalf, not made in the presence of the party to be affected thereby, be offered in evidence.

But it is argued that if the will be not admissible as evidence in chief, it was admissible by way of rebutting the testimony on the part of the appellees. They had given in evidence the declarations of the wife, to the effect that the money in controversy belonged to her husband. Such declarations were admissible, upon the ground of being declarations against her interest; but her declarations made at another time in her own interest are not admissible by way of rebuttal.

We see no objection to the several instructions granted by the court. They presented the law of the case fairly to the jury. If the money in controversy did in fact belong to the wife as her separate estate, and was appropriated by the husband to his own use with her knowledge and consent, the law does not, from such appropriation, imply a promise on the part of the husband to repay it. To create a liability on his part there must be an express promise to repay or return the same.

Then again; although the money on deposit in the savings bank was part of the price paid by the City of Baltimore for the consideration of property belonging to the wife, yet if the same was paid by the city, to the husband, with the wife's knowledge and consent, and she recognized it as belonging to him and acquiesced in his dominion and control over it, and the money was afterward deposited in the bank in their joint names, payable to the order of either of them or to the survivor, then, in the absence of an express promise by the husband to treat the same as her separate estate, he had the right upon her death, to draw the money thus deposited as his own.

So, finding no error in the ruling of the court which will justify us in reversing the judgment, it must be affirmed.

NOTE.—A wife's consent to her husband's receiving her legacy without annexing any conditions, does not deprive her of the benefit of an agreement, under which the testator's executors pay him the legacy, whereby he promises to invest it for her sole use. *State v. NEW YORK.
COURT OF APPEALS.

Abraham HEWLETT et al., Appts.,

The court of appeals has no power to pass upon a question of fact arising upon conflicting evidence, in an action originating in a surrogate's court and reviewed in the supreme court; but only to determine whether there is any evidence upon which the decision of the court below might fairly and reasonably stand. Chapter 229, Laws 1883, amending subdivision 11 of section 3347 of the Code of Civil Procedure, has not enlarged the powers of the court of appeals in this respect.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a decision of the surrogate of the County of New York, overruling objection to the probate of a will. Affirmed.

The history of the case and the questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Memorandum of decision below, 80 Hun, 82.

Messrs. Edward Schenck and Henry L. Clinton, for appellants.

Mr. E. L. Fancher, for respondent:

The general term having affirmed the decision of the surrogate on the facts, there is no jurisdiction in the court of appeals to review those decisions on conflicting evidence.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1837; Matter of Ross, 87 N. Y. 514; Davis v. Clark, 87 N. Y. 628; Marx v. McGlynn, 88 N. Y. 357.

As there was sufficient evidence to authorize the decision of the surrogate, which was affirmed by the supreme court, it follows that this court should affirm the judgment.

Marx v. McGlynn, 88 N. Y. 369.

Even if the testimony presented a question of fact, upon which different minds might easily disagree, still this court must affirm the judgment of the surrogate and supreme court.

Matter of Darrow, 95 N. Y. 668.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Samuel Wood made his will in July, 1872. He was possessed of a large estate and, after giving considerable sums of money to his relatives, provided through trustees for the founding and endowment of an institution to be called "The Samuel Wood Benevolent Institute," and a hospital similar to the institution known as St. Luke's Hospital in New York; at the same time declaring the purpose and object of the institute to be "to assist and maintain" such of his relatives and kindred, with certain exceptions, as shall in the opinion and judgment of his trustees need assistance; and giving to those relatives a right to free beds, bedding, attendance, support and maintenance in the hospital during life, if they shall so long need assistance, and a decent burial after death.

On the 20th of March, 1875, he executed a codicil in due form by which he removed the hospital and the institute from the list of his beneficiaries, and named in their place "The Samuel Wood College of Music," which he desired to found. He dropped one S. from the list of executors, and substituted Elmer, the respondent, and Abraham Hewlett, in his place.

The testator died on the 20th of March, 1878. On the 26th of that month Hewlett presented the will and codicil to the surrogate of New York for probate, stating in his petition that he was a nephew, and the only heir and next of kin of the deceased.

No opposition was made to the will and it was admitted to probate on the 20th of April, 1878.

The executor S., above referred to, opposed probate of the codicil, but afterwards withdrew from the contest, and that instrument was also admitted to probate on the 10th of October, 1878.

On the 14th of that month Pearsall, one of the legatees under the will (claiming that he was cocontestant with S., and that the latter's withdrawal from opposition without notice to him rendered the decree irregular, and insisting that the codicil was invalid on the grounds: first, that the testator was of unsound mind and incompetent to make the same; second, that he was unduly and improperly influenced thereto by Elmer, one of the executors therein named, and other interested parties to him unknown), applied to have the probate of the codicil vacated and to be heard upon his objections.

Thereupon the surrogate made an order that he be allowed to contest the probate of the codicil, and with certain other persons proceed in regard thereto, and give such further or additional evidence in regard to it as they might be advised; and that the question of vacating the probate of said codicil be reserved until the close of said evidence, and the determination of such contest; and that, subject to the said right so given, the said decree admitting the said codicil to probate, and the letters testamentary issued thereon, should stand, with powers to the executors of the will to administer the estate under the will, so far as the same has not been modified by the said codicil.

Upon such testimony as the parties produced, it appeared to the surrogate, according to the recital in a decree made December 31, 1881, that the said Samuel Wood, at the time he executed the codicil was of sound mind and under no restraint "or influence of fraud;" and he adjudged that the decree of October, 1878, admitting the same, with the will, to probate as the will and codicil of said deceased, be ratified and confirmed.

The motion, therefore, to open the decree of October was denied and the letters issued thereon to Elmer were ratified and declared valid.

It was further adjudged that "the motion by counsel for said proponent, William Elmer, for allowance to his proctor and counsel be granted, and the amount thereof as well as allowances to the proctor and counsel for said contestant, Pearsall, be adjusted by an order to be herein entered at the foot of this decree."

The notice and petition of appeal recites that the only person intended to be made respondent is William Elmer. The appeal is from the whole of both decrees of the surrogate, viz.:

that of October, 1878, and that of December, 1881, except so much as relates to the probate of the will. The general term affirmed the decree in all respects.

We do not find in the record that the appellants here made any contest before the surrogate; and as it is conceded by all that the will is valid and must stand, it is exceedingly difficult, in view of the provisions of that instrument, to find in what manner they are, within the meaning of that term, aggrieved by the probate of the codicil. They might indeed share in the privileges of the institute and hospital, provided the trustees were of opinion they needed assistance; but an interest so contingent, and an enjoyment so dependent upon the discretion of another, can hardly constitute a right capable of enforcement in a court.

Moreover, the record before us shows that as to them the decision of October was final. It would seem therefore that the appeal might very well have been dismissed by the supreme court upon these grounds, which are also set up in the answer to the petition of appeal. The whole case, however, was considered by that court; and the appellants fail to satisfy us that there is any error in its decision.

In one of the printed briefs submitted to us in their behalf, we find a point made against that part of the decree of December which provides for costs to be paid the proponent Elmer, and costs to be paid the contestant Pearsall:

1. As to Pearsall: he is not a party to the appeal and the question affecting him cannot be considered.

2. As to Elmer: it does not appear what, if any allowance, has in fact been made to him; and the proceeding in that respect, so far as the learned counsel for the appellants have directed our attention to it, seems incomplete, and in its present condition is not the subject of review.

The remaining propositions in the same brief present a very material question; and if well founded, they show that upon the merits the surrogate and general term have, in some inexplicable way, been misled. These propositions are more than once repeated, and are placed upon the intelligible and plain assertions that by the undisputed evidence it is shown: 1, "That, prior to the execution of the codicil, decedent was in such a condition of mental enfeeblement or senile decay as to render him an easy prey to undue influence; 2, that taking advantage of decedent's mental condition, Elmer practiced upon him the grossest fraud and the rankest kind of undue influence, for the purpose of inducing him to make the codicil in question;" 3, that the execution of the codicil was the result of fraud and undue influence practiced upon him by Elmer; 4, that decedent continued in a state of mental enfeeblement or senile decay from the time of the execution of the codicil until his death.

Upon this statement a question of law is presented. If there is evidence leading to a different conclusion, it at most presents a case of conflict, and this alone, if our former decisions (infra) are correct, would not permit an interference with the judgment of the supreme court. In such a case the duty of weighing and comparing, and of drawing inferences from evidence, is imposed upon the surrogate, subject to review by the general term, whose judgment, as we have frequently held, is quite independent of any view we might take of the same matter. Davis v. Clark, 87 N. Y. 628; Matter of Ross, 87 N. Y. 514; Marz v. McGlynn, 88 N. Y. 357; Matter of Higgins, 94 N. Y. 554; Matter of Cottrell, 95 N. Y. 829; Matter of Darrow, Id. 668; Matter of Yates, 99 N. Y. 94; Matter of Valentines, 100 N. Y. 607 [S. C. 1 Cent. Rep. 76].

These cases are placed upon the ground that an appeal to this court does not bring up for review a question of fact depending upon conflicting evidence; that such question remained with the court below, it being for us only to determine whether there is any evidence upon which its decision might fairly and reasonably stand.

A second or supplemental brief, however, submitted in behalf of the appellants deals entirely with this exposition of the duty and jurisdiction of this court, and is to the effect that a recent and, in this connection, hitherto unnoticed statute (Laws 1883, chap. 229), requires a qualification of the doctrine heretofore asserted by us.

We might very well dispose of this appeal without discussing the last contention; for in answer to the proposition that the proponent utterly failed to support the codicil before the surrogate, and that wholly undisputed evidence was arrayed against it, we have found it necessary to examine the entire body of testimony. Our opinion of its efficacy and force, of its probative quality and its persuasiveness, in no degree differs from that of the courts below. A restatement of the evidence is not necessary, nor a fresh recital of the circumstances which established the proponent's case. It has been carefully analyzed by the surrogate, and his views are concurred in by the general term. With those courts we agree. We find that the codicil expresses the mind of the testator; that he was not impelled to it by duress, fraud or deceit; and with this conclusion we should, under ordinary circumstances, leave the case; but the question as to our jurisdiction and duty to examine such a point upon conflicting evidence, is of general importance. It has been fairly raised and argued upon an Act of the Legislature which is claimed to be expressly directed to that purpose. It will affect other cases, and its construction, therefore, should not be postponed.

The provision referred to appears as an amendment to subdivision 11 of section 3347 of the Act containing the Code of Civil Procedure, in chapter 22, title 2, entitled "Provisions Regulating the Effect and Application of this Act." As originally passed, that subdivision limited (with some exceptions) the effect of chapters 14 to 20, both inclusive, to an action or special proceeding commenced on or after the first of September, 1880, that being the day on which those chapters took effect (§ 3356).

In 1881 (Laws of 1881, chap. 681), subdivision 11 was so amended as to provide that all appeals taken from any order, sentence, decree or determination of a surrogate's court, made or entered in such court on or after the first day of September, 1880, in any matter or proceeding pending or undetermined in such court on the first day of September, 1880, shall be taken and perfected, heard and decided in conformity to the laws and practice regulating appeals from orders, sentences and decrees of surrogate's court in force in this State on the thirty-first day of August, 1880; and all appeals from any order, sentence, decree or determination of such court brought in conformity thereto since the first day of September, 1880, were declared to be "valid and effectual," with exceptions not material here.

The subdivision was again amended in 1888 (chap. 229), by inserting a provision that "All appeals to the court of appeals from any order or judgment of the supreme court affirming, reversing or modifying any such order, sentence, decree or determination of a surrogate's court, shall be taken and perfected, heard and decided in conformity to the laws and practice regulating appeals from orders, sentences and decrees of surrogates' courts, and the hearing and decision thereof, in force in this State on the thirtieth day of April, 1877."

This is the provision relied upon by the learned counsel for the appellants, in support of his contention as to the duty of this court to pass upon the facts according to the weight of evidence. We are unable to give it that effect. The former Code (Laws 1849, chap. 498, § 471) did not include appeals from surrogates' courts; and it was held that they remained subject to the Revised Statutes, and that upon appeal to this court from the judgment of the supreme court in a case arising before the surrogate, the facts and the law were both to be examined, upon the ground that such appeal was upon the merits, and authorized by the general language of section 11 of the old Code, which gave the court of appeals exclusive jurisdiction to review upon appeal every actual determination made at a general term of the supreme court, and was, says the court, "unrestricted by any other statute." Schenck v. Dart, 22 N. Y. 420.

So in Robinson v. Raynor, 28 N. Y. 494, a similar duty is maintained; "so far as questions are presented by the appeal." By the old Code (§§ 268, 272, 349), on an appeal from a decision by a single judge or referee, a review of a question of fact could not be had by the court of appeals; it was limited to the general term.

A decision by the surrogate, as we have seen, was unaffected by that Code; and hence there resulted, in regard to the same questions, a diversity of practice. In 1880 (chap. 245, § 1, sub. 4) the whole of the old Code was repealed, and by the new Code taking effect on the first of September, 1880, proceedings in the surrogate's court were regulated (chap. XVIII, § 2545), and the practice upon a trial by him of an issue of fact, and preparation of papers on which an appeal should be heard, assimilated to the proceedings upon and after trial by the court without a jury.

Exceptions might be taken to his rulings as upon such a trial as prescribed in article 3 of title 1 of chapter 10 of that Act. The provisions of that article relating to the manner and effect of taking such an exception, and the settlement of a case containing the exceptions, apply to such a trial before a surrogate; for which purpose, the decree is regarded as a judgment. And it also provided that an appeal from a decree or an order of a surrogate's court should bring up for review, by each court to which the appeal is carried, each decision to which an exception is duly taken by the appellant as prescribed in that section.

It should be noticed that these provisions are applicable to each court in which the appeal may be heard, and therefore to the court of appeals as well as to the supreme court. Particular provision was made in regard to appeals to the supreme court (art. 4 chap. 18, § 2570), as to who might appeal, within what time, and how and upon what papers, and upon questions of law, or fact, or both; and when upon the facts it was declared that the appellate court should have the same power to decide the questions of fact which the surrogate had, and might in its discretion receive further testimony or documentary evidence, and appoint a referee. It was evident that these provisions applied to the supreme court only, and we so held in Matter of Ross, supra.

The jurisdiction of the court of appeals is designated and created by law. It has no other. Batterman v. Finn, 40 N. Y. 340; Delaney v. Brett, 51 N. Y. 78; People v. Fowler, 55 N. Y. 675.

It was defined (§§ 190, 191, New Code) as it had been under section 11 of the old Code. By section 190 it was given among other things exclusive jurisdiction to review upon appeal every actual determination made at a general term, by the supreme court, where a final judgment had been rendered in an action commenced in that court or brought there from another court and, section 471 (supra) having been repealed, included of course a judgment rendered upon appeal from a surrogate's court.

This general jurisdiction, however, was by section 191 made subject to various limitations, exceptions and conditions and was further restricted by section 1387, which, defining what questions are brought up for review by the court of appeals, expressly declares that a question of fact arising upon conflicting evidence, cannot be determined upon such an appeal, unless where special provision for the determination thereof is made by law. This section not only superseded the provisions of sections 268, 272 of the old Code, relating to a review upon appeal, of questions of fact arising upon a trial before a single judge or a referee, but imposed limitations upon the court of appeals, applicable to the determination of the general term upon such questions on an appeal to it from a judgment rendered in any court, including the decree rendered by the surrogate upon the trial by him of an issue of fact, for as we have seen (§ 2545), for the purposes of review, such decree is regarded as a judgment.

It is now argued by the appellants that the amendment of 1883 (supra) abrogates the provisions of section 1387, so far as appeals from cases originating in surrogates' courts are concerned, and restores as by re-enactment the laws relating thereto, which were in force on the 30th of April, 1877. At the time of its enactment, section 1387 had been construed by us in repeated instances, beginning with Davis v. Clark, supra, and followed by Matter of Ross and Marr v. McGlynn, supra, in all of which we placed our decision expressly upon the prohibition contained in section 1387.

The Legislature of 1883 must be deemed to have had in mind the whole law, not only as expressed by the statutes, but by the decisions of the court concerning them; and it cannot be supposed that they intended by the later Act to interfere with the policy of the earlier one, which, dealing with the jurisdiction and powers of this court, emphatically declared that a question of fact arising upon conflicting evidence, cannot be determined by it, and expressly excepts such questions from those which an appeal brings up for review.

The Act of 1883 (supra) does not enlarge the appellate powers of this court but only regulates such appeals as by existing laws were permitted, and does not purport to add to the questions to be reviewed. In the absence of a contrary intention plainly expressed, it must be presumed that the Legislature did not intend to interfere with the prohibition so distinctly (§ 1337) imposed upon the court, and this view is supported by a consideration of the language of section 1333, where, anticipating that there might be a conflict in certain cases in the courts below, and consequent reversal of a judgment of the trial court upon a question of fact, the Legislature in the most formal and explicit words have declared that in such a case, authenticated in a prescribed manner, the court of appeals must review the determination of the general term upon the questions of fact as well as those of law.

It is not probable that less clear or unambiguous words would have been selected, if the purpose of the Act of 1883 (supra) had been to extend that jurisdiction over judgments of the surrogate's court, relieved of the condition expressed in section 1333, or by that Act as to such judgments to frustrate or destroy the limitations imposed by section 1337 (supra).

We see no reason, therefore, to depart from the decisions already made concerning our jurisdiction.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs to the respondent to be paid by the appellants.

Board of COMMISSIONERS OF EXCISE
OF the City of AUBURN, Respt.,
v.

Gurden F. MERCHANT, Appt.

1. The provision of Laws of 1857, chap. 628, § 11, that "Whenever any person is seen to drink in such shop * * * any spirituous liquors or wines forbidden to be drank therein, it shall be prima facie evidence that such liquors or wines were sold by the occupant of such premises * * * with intent that the same should be drank therein," applies only to cases where licenses have been granted to sell liquors in quantities less than five gallons, not to be drank on the premises, and to acts done while such a license was in force.
2. The rule of evidence prescribed by said section does not violate the constitutional guarantees of due process of law and trial by jury.
3. An instruction embodying said rule of evidence, in a case where the facts warrant its application, is good at common law.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of the Cayuga Circuit Court in favor of plaintiff, in an action for penalties for violations of the Excise Laws. Affirmed.

The material facts and the questions presented are set forth in the opinion.

Reported below, 34 Hun, 19.

Mr. N. C. Moak, with Mr. John D. Teller, for appellant:

The appellant contends that the provision of the statute (making the fact that a person is seen to drink liquor in a shop, etc., prima facie evidence that the liquor was sold by the occupant of the premises with intent that it should be drank there) is not applicable to actions of this character; and also that it is unconstitutional, as it has the effect to deprive an accused party of his right of trial by jury.

People v. Lyon, 27 Hun, 180.

It has been held in Massachusetts that an action to recover penalties under a similar statute was of a criminal character.

Commonwealth v. Newell, 5 Gray, 76; Commonwealth v. Tuttle and Commonwealth v. Burdick, 12 Cush. 502, 506.

It is contended that while the rule may be that the Legislature may establish the effect of certain evidence, and shift the burden of proof from one party to another, and declare what may be presumptive evidence of certain facts, it has not the power to make the lawful act of one person presumptive evidence of the unlawful act of another, without any proof of his knowledge, complicity or consent.

State v. Bewick, 13 R. I. 211; S. C. 23 Alb. L. J. 487; Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 444.

Mr. F. D. Wright, for respondent:

The plaintiff may make a prima facie case by circumstantial evidence.

Vide Abb. Tr. Ev. p. 774; State v. Hynes, 66 Maine, 114; Commonwealth v. Cotter, 97 Mass. 336; Vallace v. Ererts, 3 Barb. 553.

Evidence of keeping liquors for sale is competent on the question of sale of the same.

Abb. Tr. Ev. p. 774; State v. Wentworth, 65 Maine, 234.

So the fact that it was a place of resort and that "persons went in sober and came out drunk" is competent on the question of the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Abb. Tr. Ev. p. 774; Commonwealth v. Kennedy, and Commonwealth v. Van Stone, 97 Mass. 224, 543.

Sale by a servant is prima facie by the master.

Abb. Tr. Ev. p. 774; State v. Wentworth, 65 Maine, 234.

This statute as to prima facie evidence, so far as it applies to a criminal case, was criticised in People v. Lyon, 27 Hun, 180; and by a majority of the court held to be unconstitutional. But it is clear that the Legislature, in civil cases at least, has the right to declare what shall be presumptive evidence of any fact.

Vide Hand v. Ballou, 12 N. Y. 543; People v. Mitchell, 45 Barb. 212; Hickox v. Tallman, 88 Barb. 608; Donahue v. O'Connor, 13 Jones & S. 297; Howard v. Moot, 64 N. Y. 262; S. C. 5 Thomp. & C. 93.

It has also been held by express authority that where a person enters a tavern or saloon and calls for whisky and it is furnished to him, the law implies a sale.

Vide State v. Jarrett, 85 Mo. 357; Stack v. Lansing, 32 Hun, 420.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The main question to be determined in this case is whether this action should have been commenced by the present plaintiff or by the board of charities and police for the City of Auburn; and upon this question our views have been sufficiently expressed in the case just decided against Burtis, and we refer to the opinion pronounced in that case [ante, 235].

Upon the trial of this action the judge charged the jury: "The law provides in such cases as this that upon proof being made of the fact that liquor was seen to be drank on the premises, that is prima facie evidence that it was sold with intent that it was to be drank upon the premises."

To this portion of the charge defendant's counsel excepted, and the exception is now relied upon as pointing out error fatal to the judgment.

In section 11 of the Excise Act (chap. 628, Laws 1857) provision is made for licenses to store keepers and shop keepers, authorizing them to sell spirituous liquors in quantities less than five gallons, not to be drank upon the premises.

Then in section 12 it is provided as follows: "Such license shall not be granted unless the commissioners are satisfied that the applicant is of good moral character, nor until such applicant shall have executed a bond to the People of this State * * * conditioned that * * * he will not sell or suffer to be sold any strong or spirituous liquors or wines to be drank in his shop or house or in any out house, yard or garden, appertaining thereto; and that he will not suffer any such liquor sold by virtue of such license to be drank in his shop or house or in any out house, yard or garden belonging thereto; and whenever any person is seen to drink, in such shop or house, out house, yard or garden belonging thereto, any spirituous liquors or wines forbidden to be drank therein, it shall be prima facie evidence that such spirituous liquors or wines were sold by the occupant of such premises or his agent, with the intent that the same should be drank therein. On any trial for the offense last aforesaid, such occupant or agent may be allowed to testify respecting such sale."

It was undoubtedly this law to which the judge referred in his charge.

All the provisions in section 12 have reference to licenses to sell liquors in quantities less than five gallons, not to be drank upon the premises; and the rule of evidence prescribed applies only to cases where such licenses have been granted. The defendant had such a license from September 6, 1880, to May 1, 1881, when it was revoked.

Upon the trial the plaintiff gave evidence tending to show violations of the license by the defendant by the sale of liquor to be drank upon his premises between September 1, 1880, and June, 1881; and the proof of sales was limited to that period.

The charge of the judge was authorized by the statute, if applied to drinking liquor upon defendant's premises during the time he had the license; but it was not authorized if applied to the drinking of liquor there before September 6, or after May 1. There was no specific, definite evidence that any of the drinking took place before the first or after the latter date, and if the defendant desired to have the charge so qualified as to apply only to drinking which took place while the license was in force, he should have called the attention of the judge to the facts, and requested the qualification; and now the charge must be treated as if it applied only to the period covered by defendant's license.

Thus the charge was authorized by the words of the statute. But the learned counsel for the appellant claims that this provision of the statute is unconstitutional, upon the ground that it violates the constitutional guarantees of due process of law and trial by jury. We think the claim unfounded. The general power of the Legislature to prescribe rules of evidence and methods of proof is undoubted. While the power has its constitutional limitations it is not easy to define precisely what they are. A law which would practically shut out the evidence of a party and thus deny him the opportunity for a trial would substantially deprive him of due process of law.

It would not be possible to uphold a law which made an act prima facie evidence of crime over which the party charged had no control and with which he had no connection, or which made that prima facie evidence of crime which had no relation to a criminal act and no tendency whatever by itself to prove a criminal act. But so long as the Legislature in prescribing rules of evidence, in either civil or criminal cases, leaves a party a fair opportunity to make his defense and to submit all the facts to the jury to be weighed by them, upon evidence legitimately bearing upon them, it is difficult to perceive how its Acts can be assailed upon constitutional grounds. Affidavits, in town bonding Acts, and tax deeds, have been declared to be prima facie evidence of regularity and validity; and numerous statutes of similar character are to be found in this and other States.

In Commonwealth v. Williams, 6 Gray, 1, it was held in a criminal prosecution for a violation of an excise law that a statute which provided that the delivery of any spirituous and intoxicating liquors in or from any building or place, other than a dwelling house, "shall be deemed prima facie evidence of a sale" was constitutional and valid.

In State v. Hurley, 54 Maine, 562, it was held that an Act which provided that "whenever an unlawful sale" of intoxicating liquors "is alleged and a delivery proved, it shall not be necessary to prove payment, but such delivery shall be sufficient evidence of sale," was constitutional.

In Howard v. Moot, 64 N. Y. 262, Allen, J., said: "The rules of evidence are not an exception to the doctrine that all rules and regulations affecting remedies are at all times subject to modification and control by the Legislature. * * * It may be conceded, for all the purposes of this appeal, that a law that should make evidence conclusive which was not so necessarily in and of itself, and thus precluded the adverse party from showing the truth, would be void, as indirectly working a confiscation of property or a destruction of vested rights. But such is not the effect of declaring any circumstance or any evidence, however slight, prima facie proof of a fact to be established, leaving the adverse party at liberty to rebut and overcome it by contradictory and better evidence."

Here the act, which is made prima facie evidence of an illegal sale, takes place upon the premises of the person charged; has some relation to and furnishes some evidence of the alleged illegal sale; and occurs in a place where liquors are authorized to be kept and sold. To make drinking the liquor, in such a place and under such circumstances, prima facie evidence of an illegal sale to the person drinking, violates no constitutional guarantee. It leaves a party ample opportunity to make his defense.

It is specially provided, what is now the general law, that the party can be a witness in his own behalf; and thus it can never be difficult for him to show what the facts really are. The burden of proof is not even really changed. The statute enables the prosecutor to make a prima facie case by proof of the drinking. But the defendant can show the circumstances attending the drinking; his relations thereto, and any other facts tending to absolve him from liability; and then, on the whole case, the burden still rests upon the prosecution to establish the alleged sale.

The defendant has the full benefit of jury trial and due process of law and a full and fair opportunity free from any undue hindrance or embarrassment to make his justification and defense. Hence, the charge resting upon the statute was not erroneous.

But the statute need not be invoked to uphold the charge. Under the circumstances of this case the drinking was good, common-law evidence of a sale in violation of the statute. The defendant kept liquor for sale and was shown to be engaged in selling it, to be drank upon his premises, quite indiscriminately to persons calling for it.

It is against all experience that he gave it away or that persons came there to drink liquor bought elsewhere. It was in his power to prevent the drinking which took place from glasses presumably furnished by him. Evidence of the drinking under such circumstances was certainly prima facie proof that the liquor was bought to be drank there and sufficient to justify the charge.

We are therefore of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Re PETITION OF Bradish JOHNSON to Vacate an Assessment, etc.

1. The determination of the commissioners appointed under the Act of 1872, chap. 580, "In relation to certain local improvements in the City of New York," that a contract is free from fraud, is conclusive as to the validity of the contract. (Re Kendall, 85 N. Y. 302, followed.)

2. Surveyors' fees are a proper item of expense to be included in an assessment for a local improvement. (Re Merriam, 84 N. Y. 607, and other cases, followed.)

3. The expense incurred by a gas company in removing and relaying its pipes, consequent upon the construction of a sewer, is a proper item of expense to be included in the assessment for the sewer, where a city ordinance imposed the duty of such removal and relaying upon the company, and provided for the insertion of the expense thereof in the assessment. (Re Deering, 93 N. Y. 361, distinguished.)

CROSS appeals from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, modifying an order of Special Term by reducing an assessment for the construction of sewer in Seventeenth Street, in the City of New York, as to one item, and otherwise affirming the order. Affirmed, except as to the modification.

Statement by Danforth, J.:

The petitioner was the owner of property affected by the assessment; and by petition alleged "That said assessment is irregular and void, for the following reasons:

I. Because there is included in said assessment, and assessed upon his lots, the cost of work for which no contract was made, in conformity with the provisions of section 91 of the Charter of 1873; nor any bids made for doing said work or any part thereof, or any competition therefor.

II. That the work, for the expense of which said assessment is imposed, was done without any authority of law, and there are included therein expenses not authorized by law."

Upon trial it appeared that the whole assessment was $255,251.17, and included surveyors' fees, $22,870, and $1,206.53, awarded the Manhattan Gas Light Company. The contract contained fixed prices for rock excavation, but none was required or done; and "that it was before the commissioners appointed under chapter 580 of the Laws of 1872; and was by them certified as free from fraud."

At special term the assessment was vacated; but upon appeal the general term modified the order. Both parties appeal to this court.

Mr. P. A. Hargous for petitioner:

The certificate of the commissioners under the Act of 1872, chap. 580, did not validate the assessment so that a valid assessment could be laid and imposed, when a substantial error existed in the assessment.

A distinction should have been made in the case of Re Kendall, 85 N. Y. 302, viz.: that the contract was validated as between the city and the contractor, and could therefore form the basis of a valid assessment, provided there was nothing included in the assessment on the property which was contrary to law and constituted a substantial error.

The certificate is only binding as between the city and the contractors.

Re Burmeister, 76 N. Y. 174.

The award to the Manhattan Gas Company, for expenses in removing and replacing the pipes, is an improper charge.

Re Deering, 93 N. Y. 361.

The ordinances of the city cannot make any provision for the assessment of property owners. This is the duty of the Legislature, and no legislative Act authorized it.

Re Houghton, 20 Hun, 395.

Messrs. E. Henry Lacombe, D. J. Dean and G. L. Sterling, for the Corporation of the City of New York:

This being a case neither of fraud nor reparation, the alleged irregularity in the letting of the contract is of no importance in view of the certificate of the commissioners under chapter 580 of the Laws of 1872.

Re Marsh, 21 Hun, 582; 83 N. Y. 481; Re Astor, 53 N. Y. 617; Re Burmeister, 76 N. Y. 174; Re Kendall, 85 N. Y. 302.

The contract, even if made in disregard of legislative limitations, has been ratified by subsequent legislation. By chapter 556 of the Law of 1880 this particular contract was recognized by the Legislature; and a further payment of money thereunder to the contractor, upon certain conditions, directed.

Brown v. Mayor, 63 N. Y. 239-244.

There is no specification in the petition showing any particular illegal charge.

In Re Eager, 46 N. Y. 109, and Re Roberts, 81 N. Y. 62, it is held that a reason not stated in the petition cannot be inquired into and that the petitioner must be confined to the special allegations in his petition.

See also Rich's Case, Horn's Case and Miller's Case, 12 Abb. Pr. 118, 124, 121.

The items included for surveyors' fees are proper charges.

Laws 1865, chap. 331, §§ 9, 10, 11, amended by Laws 1866, chap. 551, § 1; Re Merriam, 84 N. Y. 607; Re Pelton, 85 N. Y. 657; Re Lowden, 89 N. Y. 548; Re Roberts, 95 N. Y. 674.

The expense of removing and relaying the gas pipes was a necessary incident of the work. Rev. Ord. 1866; pp. 243, 244; Rev. Ord. 1880, §§ 166-171, pp. 105, 106.

The proposition that in these cases all the presumptions are in favor of the City is indisputable.

Re Hebrew Ben. Orphan Asylum, 70 N. Y. 476; Re Bassford, 50 N. Y. 512; Re Williamson, 3 Hun, 65-68; Bigelow v. Boston, 120 Mass. 326.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

So far as the petitioner's appeal touches the validity of the contract it must fail, because of the action of the commissioners, and for reasons which led to our decision in Re Kendall, 85 N. Y. 302, where they are fully stated, and in regard to surveyors' fees, Re Merriam, 84 N. Y. 607; Re Pelton, 85 N. Y. 651; Re Lowden, 89 N. Y. 548, are against him.

On the other hand the appeal by the corporation should succeed. The question presented by it relates to the item of $1,206.53 awarded to the Manhattan Gas Light Company, "for the expense it may be (the contrary does not appear) of removing and relaying their gas pipes, in consequence of the construction of the sewer in question, and in performance of a duty to do so imposed upon them by a city ordinance. Revision 1866, p. 243, § 16; Id. 1880, pp. 105, 106, §§ 166, 171.

The same ordinance declares that all expenses or damage incurred or sustained by such company shall form a portion of the expenses of such sewer and be assessed and collected in the same manner as the other expenses thereof. Its disallowance is not justified by our decision in Deering's Case, 93 N. Y. 361.

The assessment then in question was for regulating and grading a street; and an item similar to that now under consideration was rejected because the occasion which required it was not within the ordinances above referred to. It is otherwise with the case now before us. If the item was for a purpose different from that suggested, it was the duty of the petitioner to point it out, and establish an error if one existed. Re Eager, 46 N. Y. 109.

It is not even alluded to in the petition, and the proof is only that such an item forms part of the general sum.

The learned counsel for the petitioner calls our attention to the Re Lilienthal, 28 Hun, 641, and to the Houghton Case, 20 Hun, 395.

In the first, the opinion of the court does not appear; and we have no means of knowing the circumstances of the case or the view taken of them. The other seems to have turned upon a provision of the contract then in question.

In the case before us the contract is not produced, nor is there evidence that it contains the provision on which reliance was placed in the case cited.

So far therefore as the order of the general term modifies the order of the special term it should be reversed and the order of the special term affirmed; but in other respects the order of the general term should be affirmed and the petition dismissed, with costs to the City of New York.

PEOPLE of State of New York, Respts.,

Frank MONDON, Appt.

1. Where a coroner's inquest is held before it has been ascertained that a crime has been committed or before any person has been arrested charged with the crime, and a witness is called and sworn, his testimony (should he afterwards be charged with the crime) may be used against him on his trial; and the mere fact that at the time of his examination he was aware that a crime was suspected and that he was suspected of being the criminal will not prevent his being regarded as a mere witness, whose testimony may afterwards be given in evidence against himself.
2. But if, at the time of the examination of a person before a coroner's inquest, it appears that a crime has been committed and that he is in custody as the supposed criminal, he is not regarded merely as a witness, but as a person accused, and he is to be treated in the same manner as if brought before a committing magistrate; and an examination not taken in conformity with the statute cannot be used against him on his trial for the offense.

3. Hence where, after the finding of the body of one killed by violence, a person was arrested, without warrant, as the suspected murderer, taken before a coroner's inquest, informed that he was charged with the murder, and the alleged instrument of death was produced, and he was examined on oath before the coroner as to circumstances tending to connect him with the crime, and he denied all knowledge of the crime—the testimony thus given was not a voluntary confession and (it not appearing that he was informed of his rights or that he was not bound to answer questions tending to criminate him) evidence thereof was not admissible upon the prisoner's trial for the murder, and its admission was reversible error. (People v. McMahon, 15 N. Y. 384, followed; People v. McGloin, 91 N. Y. 241, distinguished.)
4. Section 395 Code Crim. Proc., providing that a confession can be given in evidence unless made under influence of fear produced by threats or upon a stipulation for immunity from prosecution, applies only to voluntary confessions and does not change the statutory rules relating to the examination of prisoners charged with crime. (Ruger, Ch. J., and Earl, J., dissenting.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, affirming a conviction of murder in the first degree rendered at the Herkimer Oyer and Terminer. Reversed.

Reported below, 38 Hun, 188.

The question presented and the facts connected therewith are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. Clay Hall, for appellant.

Mr. Eugene E. Sheldon, with Mr. A. B. Steele, Dist. Atty., for respondents.

Rapallo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant was convicted (at a court of oyer and terminer held in Herkimer County in May, 1885) of the crime of murder in the first degree, for killing one John Wishart, and was sentenced to death. On appeal to the supreme court the conviction was affirmed at a general term held at Syracuse in November, 1885. Boardman and Hardin, JJ., delivered opinions for affirmance, and Follett, J., delivered a dissenting opinion. The case now comes before us on appeal from the judgment of affirmance.

Numerous exceptions were taken at the trial; and after a careful examination we concur in the conclusions reached by the supreme court as to all of the points raised on behalf of the appellant, except the one upon which the learned judges who heard the case at general term differed in opinion; and we shall therefore confine our discussion to that point.

The question in difference was the admissibility in evidence, upon the trial of the prisoner, of statements alleged to have been made by him on his examination under oath at the coroner's inquest, held upon the body of the deceased after it had been found, which was a considerable time subsequent to the killing. The evidence connecting him with the crime, aside from his alleged confessions to members of his family and afterwards to the officer having him in custody, was circumstantial, but no question as to its sufficiency arises here.

After the finding of the body of the deceased, the defendant was arrested, without warrant, as the suspected murderer. While he was thus in custody, the coroner impaneled a jury and held an inquest; and the defendant was called as a witness before the inquest and was examined by the district attorney and by the coroner.

The prisoner was an ignorant Italian laborer, unfamiliar with the English language. He was unattended by counsel and it does not appear that he was in any manner informed of his rights, or that he was not bound to answer questions tending to criminate him. He was twice examined; on the first occasion the examination was taken by questions put either by the district attorney or by the coroner, and the result written down by the coroner who then read the evidence over to him, line by line, and asked him if he understood it and if it was the truth, and he said it was; and the coroner then reswore him to the deposition.

The coroner testifies that he came to the conclusion that the defendant did not understand English well enough to be examined; that on taking the evidence which was signed by him, no interpreter was used; that the interpreter was used on a subsequent day; that the defendant made no corrections or suggestions while the deposition was being read to him; that he (the coroner) became satisfied, after taking defendant's testimony on the first day, that it ought to be taken through an interpreter and thought they might get it a little better and a little fuller.

The court thereupon reserved its decision as to the admissibility of the evidence until the opening of the court on the following day.

The coroner was then asked various questions as to what the defendant had stated at the coroner's inquest; as to his having been on the ground where the body of deceased was found; as to when he had last seen the deceased alive; as to where deceased was then going; whether he was alone; as to the whereabouts of the defendant on the day the deceased disappeared; as to threats made by deceased to have the defendant arrested for marrying the daughter of deceased, while having another wife living; as to disputes between deceased and defendant on that subject; and other questions tending to establish the theory of the prosecution as to the motive of the defendant in committing the murder.

Some of the statements of the prisoner on his examination, as testified to by the coroner, confirmed the theory of the prosecution as to the hostile feeling between the prisoner and the deceased, and the quarrels which had taken place between them; but the others were denials of implicating circumstances.

Each of the questions thus put to the coroner, as to what the prisoner had testified to, was specifically objected to. The objections were overruled and exceptions duly taken.

The deposition taken by the coroner, as before stated, was not offered in evidence; but the coroner in giving his testimony referred to it to refresh his recollection with respect to the testimony given by the defendant on the inquest. The coroner also testified that a club which was found near the body of deceased was produced at the inquest, before the taking of testimony began; that the defendant had then been informed that he was charged with the murder of deceased, and on the production of the club exclaimed: "Me no kill old John with that club;" and appeared nervous and excited.

It thus appears that when the prisoner was called upon to make his statements upon oath before the coroner, he stood in the attitude of an accused person, and was required to answer for himself, as a party, and not as a mere witness to aid the coroner in investigating the cause of the death of the deceased.

The cause of death was evident. The body had been examined, with the marks of violence plainly apparent: the bruised head, the fractured skull, and the broken club lying near it, with hair still adhering to it. It was evident that a crime had been committed. From the time that a felonious homicide was established the proceedings assumed the form of a criminal investigation, Hendrickson v. People, per Gardiner, J., 10 N. Y. 49.

By section 777 of the Code of Criminal Procedure it became the duty of the jury, if the death was occasioned by criminal means, to find who was guilty thereof; and on such finding the coroner was empowered to issue his warrant for the arrest of the guilty party, if not already in custody. From that time the prisoner occupied the position of a person accused of crime; and his situation was similar to that of such a person before an examining magistrate. "And although the tribunal might be different, yet, upon principle, his rights would be the same in both cases." 10 N. Y. 48.

In Teachout v. People, 41 N. Y. 9, Woodruff, J., in commenting upon the case of McMahon v. People, says: "The coroner was in such case substantially in the place of an examining magistrate; and the fact that the prisoner was held under an arrest without warrant could not make his protection against such an inquisition less imperative;" and at page 12 the same learned judge says that declarations made under examination, with such a charge depending, should be excluded except where obedience to the statutory precautions is observed.

The admissibility of examinations in evidence upon the trial of the offender, has been passed upon in many English cases, but the whole subject has been so thoroughly discussed in three cases in this court that it is not necessary to refer particularly to the English authorities.

In Hendrickson v. People, 10 N. Y. 13, the wife of the defendant died suddenly in the morning; and in the evening of the same day a coroner's inquest was held. The defendant was called and sworn as a witness upon the inquest. At that time it did not appear that any crime had been committed, or that the defendant had been charged with any crime or even suspected, except so far as the nature of some of the questions asked of him might indicate such a suspicion. On his subsequent trial, on an indictment for the murder of his wife, the statements made by him at the coroner's inquest were held admissible, upon the ground that he was not examined as a party charged with the crime; that it had not even appeared that a crime had been committed; and that he had simply testified as a witness upon the inquiry as to the cause of the death.

In People v. McMahon, 15 N. Y. 384, the defendant was arrested by a constable, without warrant, on a charge of having murdered his wife. The constable took him before the coroner, who was holding an inquest on the body, by whom he was sworn and examined as a witness. It was held that the evidence thus given was not admissible on the prisoner's trial for the murder, and his conviction was reversed upon that ground. In the judgment all the judges who heard the case concurred.

The next case is Teachout v. People, 41 N. Y. 7. In that case the defendant appeared at the coroner's inquest, in pursuance of a subpoena to testify, and voluntarily attended. He was not under arrest, but was informed by one Dalley that it was charged that his wife had been poisoned and that he would be arrested for the crime. Before he was sworn he was informed by the coroner that there were rumors that his wife came to her death by foul means, and that some of those rumors implicated him, and that he was not obliged to testify unless he chose. He said he had no objection to telling all he knew. The learned judge delivering the opinion precludes it by a reference to these facts, as showing that the statements made were voluntary in every legal sense; and held that a mere consciousness of being suspected of a crime did not so disqualify him that his testimony, in other respects freely and voluntarily given, before the coroner, could not be used against him on his trial on a charge subsequently made, of such crime. On that ground he held the evidence properly admitted, at the same time referring with approval to the McMahon Case, and distinctly limiting the rule of exclusion to cases within its bounds.

The present case is identical in all its essential features with the McMahon Case. In both cases the prisoner had been arrested without warrant, as a suspected murderer. While under arrest he was taken by the officer having him in charge, before the coroner's inquest, and examined on oath as to circumstances tending to connect him with the crime.

The present case is even clearer than the McMahon Case, for here the homicide had been shown before he was examined, the prisoner was informed that he was charged with the murder, the alleged instrument of death was produced, and the prisoner was interrogated as to his motive for the alleged killing, his whereabouts, and other inculpatory matters.

There has been no case overruling the McMahon Case, and we are not referred to any decision, either in this country or in England, at variance with it, although there are many which sustain it and even go further in the direction of excluding examinations under oath.

before a magistrate, of persons afterwards put upon trial on criminal charges. Rez v. Lewis, 6 Carr. & P. 161; Rez v. Davis, 6 Carr. & P. 177; Reg. v. Wheatland, 8 Carr. & P. 238; Haworth's Case, 4 Carr. & P. 254, note.

The court at general term in the present case seemed to regard the case of People v. McGloin, 91 N. Y. 241, as sustaining the course pursued by the prosecution, and consequently overruling the McMahon Case, but a brief examination will show that there is no analogy between the two cases. The case of McGloin was not that of the examination of a prisoner on oath before a magistrate before whom he was taken involuntarily while in custody, and interrogated by the magistrate, who to all appearance had power to require him to answer; but it was a clear case of a voluntary confession. The prisoner was not taken before any magistrate. While under arrest he said to the inspector of police, who had him in charge, that he would make a statement. The inspector then said he would send for Coroner Herman to take it. The coroner was then sent for and came to police headquarters and took down in writing the confession dictated by the prisoner, the coroner asking no questions and not acting in any official capacity, but as a mere amanuensis, to take down the confession and prove the contents. Whether sworn or unsworn is immaterial, as the confession was in no respect compulsory, but was voluntarily offered by the prisoner. It was not taken before a magistrate, upon a judicial investigation against the person accused of the commission of the crime. It lacked this essential element of the McMahon Case, and is in no respect in conflict with it.

Section 395 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is also referred to as superseding the McMahon Case. That section provides that "A confession of a defendant, whether in the course of judicial proceedings or to a private person, can be given in evidence against him, unless made under the influence of fear produced by threats; or unless made upon a stipulation of the district attorney that he shall not be prosecuted therefor."

The rule thus established is founded upon the common-law rule on the subject of confessions, but is much more definite and stringent. The rule as laid down in Hawkins is stated to be that "A confession, whether made under an official examination or in discourse with private persons, which is obtained from a defendant, either by the flattery of hope or by the impression of fear, however slightly the emotions may be implanted, is not admissible in evidence."

By the section of the Code quoted, the fear which is required to exclude the confession must be a fear produced by threats, and the hope must be based upon a stipulation of the district attorney, promising immunity from prosecution for the crime confessed. But I do not apprehend that this provision was intended to apply to any but voluntary confessions, or to change the statutory rules relating to the examination of prisoners charged with crime. The Criminal Code retains the provisions of the Revised Statutes applicable to such examinations, which provisions are framed with reference to the constitutional provision that no person shall, in any criminal case, be compelled to be a witness against himself. Art. 1, § 6.

In all the cases in which reference has been made to the subject, it seems to be conceded that an examination of a person arrested on a criminal charge, conducted in violation of the statutory provisions, would not be admissible in evidence against him on his trial for the offense. To take a prisoner before a magistrate, swear him, subject him to a minute interrogation as to the circumstances relied upon as evidence of his guilt and then use such an examination on his trial, would be a departure from our system of criminal jurisprudence which should not be tolerated; and whether the investigation were conducted before a committing magistrate or before a coroner's jury could make no substantial difference, provided it appeared that a homicide had been committed, and the prisoner was brought before the inquest as an accused person, and the object of the inquisition was to ascertain his guilt.

The McMahon Case held distinctly that an examination thus conducted before a coroner's jury could not be used on the trial of the prisoner; and after that decision has stood for nearly a quarter of a century as the law of the State it would require, for the purpose of overruling it, something much more definite than anything that can be found in the Penal Code or the Code of Criminal Procedure. There is nothing indefinite in the doctrine of that case as defined and limited in the Teachout Case; nor am I able to see that an adherence to it would in any way embarrass the administration of criminal justice in this State; while on the other hand it is not difficult to see that a departure from it would be subversive of some of the fundamental principles of our criminal jurisprudence. Nor is there anything in the exclusion of such evidence inconsistent with section 395 of the Code.

The evidence sought to be excluded is not a confession, certainly not a voluntary confession, but an official examination on oath of the prisoner while in custody, in which, although he admits some facts in regard to the relations between him and the deceased, he denies all knowledge of the crime; he denies having seen the deceased after he saw him on the railroad track on the day when he left his home; and he denies ever having been on the ground where the body was found.

These denials were much more important to the prosecution than any of the admissions contained in the examination, for they were met by the evidence of the prisoner's subsequent admissions to sheriff Brown, which, if true, showed that his previous statements under oath before the coroner's inquest were false.

This mode of examining and involving a prisoner arrested on a charge of crime is not sanctioned by the provision of section 395 of the Penal Code, which declares voluntary confessions made "in the course of judicial proceedings" admissible in evidence. Those words do not necessarily refer to a judicial examination of the prisoner, upon the subject of the charge made against him. The object of section 395 is to declare what confessions shall be deemed voluntary, and therefore admissible, whether made out of court to a private person, or in court, or in the course of any judicial proceeding between any parties. The examination of a prisoner upon oath before a magistrate, upon the subject of the charge made against him, is condemned in the McMahon Case and those upon which it rests, in the Teachout Case and by the statutes which prohibit such examinations. Code Crim. Proc. §§ 188, 198, 196; 2 R. S. 708, §§ 14-16.

The three cases which have been cited: Hendrickson's, McMahon's and Teachout's, draw the line sharply, and define clearly in what cases the testimony of a witness examined before a coroner's inquest can be used on his subsequent trial, and in what cases it cannot. Where a coroner's inquest is held before it has been ascertained that a crime has been committed, or before any person has been arrested charged with the crime, and a witness is called and sworn before the coroner's jury, the testimony of the witness (should he afterwards be charged with the crime) may be used against him on his trial; and the mere fact that at the time of his examination he was aware that a crime was suspected, and that he was suspected of being the criminal, will not prevent his being regarded as a mere witness whose testimony may be afterwards given in evidence against himself. If he desires to protect himself he must claim his privilege. But if at the time of his examination it appears that a crime has been committed and that he is in custody as the supposed criminal, he is not regarded merely as a witness but as a party accused, called before a tribunal vested with power to investigate preliminarily the question of his guilt, and he is to be treated in the same manner as if brought before a committing magistrate; and an examination not taken in conformity with the statute cannot be used against him on his trial for the offense.

On this ground the judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered.

Earl, J., reads dissenting opinion for affirmation, in which Ruger, Ch. J., concurs; Miller, J., not voting.

Earl, J., dissenting:

There was no difference of opinion in the supreme court and there has been none here, as to any of the questions involved upon this appeal, except as to the reception in evidence of the defendant's statements made at the coroner's inquest; and we all agree that this conviction should be affirmed, unless that evidence was incompetent.

The defendant was under oath when he made these statements, and under arrest without warrant, and had been informed that he was charged with the murder of Wishart; and hence the claim is made that the case of People v. McMahon, 15 N. Y. 884, is a precise authority for the exclusion of the evidence.

In that case it appeared that the defendant was arrested by a constable, without warrant, upon suspicion of being the murderer of his wife, and was taken before the coroner who was holding an inquest on her body; and he was there sworn and examined as a witness; and it was held that his evidence thus given was not admissible on his trial for the murder.

But that case was criticised and distinguished in the case of People v. Teachout, 41 N. Y. 7, where it was held that statements made by the defendant under oath, at a coroner's inquest upon the body of the person murdered, were admissible against him upon his trial for the murder, although he knew at the time he was sworn that it was suspected that the deceased was poisoned, and that he himself would probably be arrested for the crime, and was informed by the coroner that rumors implicated him and that he had a right to refuse to testify.

In both cases the prisoner was charged with the crime, and gave evidence knowing that he was so charged. In the latter case the defendant was not under arrest but was informed before he gave his evidence that he was going to be arrested for the crime. The fact that the prisoner was not under arrest does not distinguish that case from the former case. There can certainly be no difference in the evidential value of statements made under oath by one under arrest and charged with crime, and similar statements made by one charged with crime after he has been informed that he is going to be arrested.

The reasoning of all the cases on the subject shows that there can be no difference in principle or in law between such statements, and no ground for their exclusion in the one case which does not apply to the other.

The only circumstance, therefore, which distinguishes the latter case from the former is that in the latter case it appeared that the coroner, before the defendant was sworn, informed him that he was not obliged to testify unless he chose, and that the defendant said he had no objection to telling all he knew.

For aught that appears in this case, the defendant was informed, by the coroner or someone else, of his right to refuse to testify; that he perfectly understood his rights and in every sense voluntarily took the oath and made his statement. The district attorney had no occasion to prove these facts, as neither his attention nor the attention of the court was called to the absence of such proof or the necessity to make it.

It does not appear how the defendant happened to come before the coroner nor what information he had as to his rights before he was sworn. When evidence of these statements was offered at the trial, the only ground of objection stated in any case was that they were immaterial. The only ground of exclusion was that the defendant had not been informed, before he was sworn, of his right to refuse to be sworn and to testify; and that ground of objection should have been specially stated, as, if it had been, it might have been obviated by proof. We must now assume that that ground did not exist or was waived. Such is the rule in civil cases and it has been also applied in criminal cases. People v. Murphy, 63 N. Y. 590.

If we could see that the evidence was of vital and controlling importance in this case, or if we entertained any doubt of the defendant's guilt, we might be disinclined to this view of the case. But a careful reading of the evidence leaves upon our minds no reasonable doubt of his guilt; and the statements made by him before the coroner could have had neither an important nor a controlling influence upon the minds of the jury.

The relations between Wishart and the defendant, showing a motive for the murder, and his threats to kill him, were fully proved by other witnesses. His statements tended, if believed, to exculpate him; and the most material of them became important only as they were by other evidence shown to be untrue. There was much evidence of false statements made by him, when not under oath, after the disappearance of Wishart, of a character similar to those made before the coroner; and there was evidence, apparently reliable, that he confessed the murder.

Under such circumstances, assuming that the law remains now as it was when the cases above referred to were decided, we see no reason for holding that any error was committed by the reception of the statements in evidence; and for this we invoke the latter case as authority.

But this case is of such serious importance that we are unwilling to rest our decision entirely upon a ground which might seem to be narrow and technical, and therefore we proceed further.

Radical changes have been introduced into the law of evidence since the decision of the McMahon Case. A prisoner may testify in his own behalf, and section 895 of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides as follows: "A confession of a defendant, whether in the course of judicial proceedings or to a private person, can be given in evidence against him unless made under the influence of fear produced by threats, or unless made upon a stipulation of the district attorney that he shall not be prosecuted therefor; but is not sufficient to warrant his conviction, without additional proof that the crime charged has been committed."

This language is plain and broad and makes every confession competent no matter how made or how obtained, with the exceptions mentioned. The defendant's statements were made in a judicial proceeding and this section is ample warrant for their reception in evidence upon his trial.

Confessions of prisoners, in judicial proceedings and to private persons, may be made or obtained under such circumstances as to deprive them of much value as evidence, but they may always be proved unless excluded by the exceptions mentioned; and then their weight, under proper instructions from the court, must be determined by the jury.

There is nothing in the previous history or condition of the law as to confessions which limits the meaning of this section or restricts the import of its general phraseology. That law was in a very unsatisfactory condition and many of its rules rested upon no philosophical or reasonable basis. The general rule was that the confessions of a prisoner in reference to the crime for which he was put upon trial, whenever and wherever made, were admissible in evidence against him, and were the most effectual and satisfactory proofs of guilt.

To this rule, however, there were exceptions. If the confessions were obtained or induced by threats or promises, they were excluded. The threats and promises might be quite slight, insignificant and indirect, and yet the cases are numerous where they were held sufficient to render confessions obtained by them incompetent as evidence.

There was a difference of opinion among learned judges as to whether the threats and promises, to be effectual for the exclusion of the confessions, must have proceeded from the prosecutor or some public officer having the prisoner in custody or some authority over him, and not from a private person having no connection with the prosecution. If the confessions, however, were made after the threats or promises might be supposed to have ceased to have any influence upon the mind of the prisoner, they could be received in evidence. So, while it was necessary to the admissibility of a confession that it should have been voluntarily made, that is that it should have been made without the appliances of hope or fear, from persons having authority, yet it was not necessary that it should have been the prisoner's own spontaneous act. It might be obtained or induced by spiritual exhortations; by promises of secrecy, even confirmed by an oath; by causing the intoxication of the prisoner; by trick, deception or artifice; by illegal arrest; by promises of some collateral benefit; and yet none of these practices made the confession incompetent or required its exclusion.

These rules were uncertain, difficult of application. It applies to all confessions whether made in a judicial proceeding or to private persons, and its language is just as broad, comprehensive and sweeping in reference to one class as the other. The two classes of confessions were known in the law before that section was enacted. Judicial confessions were defined to be such as were made before a magistrate or in court, in the due course of legal proceedings, and all other confessions made to private persons were defined to be extrajudicial. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 216, 217.

Within the meaning of the Code, and the law as it before existed, these were confessions made in a judicial proceeding. The law as to judicial confessions was, before the Code, in as much confusion and uncertainty (and needed reformation as much) as the law in reference to extrajudicial confessions; and this may be shown by reference to a few reported cases.

In People v. Hendrickson, 10 N. Y. 13, the subject of judicial confessions was much investigated and discussed. In that case the prisoner's wife died from poisoning, and a coroner's inquest was held to ascertain the cause of her death. The prisoner was sworn and examined as a witness at the inquest, and there made certain statements as to his movements on the night of his wife's death and the circumstances attending it. He was subsequently indicted for her murder; and upon his trial the statements he made at the inquest were offered in evidence against him. They were objected to as inadmissible but were held to be competent evidence, upon the ground that the prisoner had not, when he made them, been charged with the murder. But it is clear that he was suspected of the murder and knew that he was so suspected.

Judge Selden wrote a dissenting opinion, holding that the statements were incompetent, upon the ground that such statements, made by one suspected of guilt and conscious thereof, were too unreliable to be received as evidence. The learned judge seems to have been unconscious that his reasoning would exclude all confessions of a prisoner made after being charged with the crime, and even after he was conscious that he was suspected of the crime. But one judge concurred in the view that the statements were not competent evidence.

When the McMahon Case came before the same court, more than three years later, the judges comprising the court had been so far changed that only three of those remained who had taken part in the decision of the Hendrickson Case; and Judge Selden being one of these, wrote the opinion in which four of his associates concurred, and the same line of reasoning which had failed to convince in the Hendrickson Case prevailed. The statements of the prisoner made at the coroner's inquest were held incompetent, because at the time he made them he was charged with the crime. The ground of the decision was that a judicial oath, administered when the mind is agitated and disturbed by a criminal charge, may prevent free and voluntary mental action, and that thus the statements cannot be relied upon as evidence of guilt.

But what difference in reason can there be between the value of statements as evidence when made by a person charged with crime and when made by one who knows that he is suspected of crime and is conscious of guilt? Why should such statements, when made under the sanction of an oath voluntarily taken, be excluded, when they would be received if made under precisely the same circumstances not upon oath?

When the Teachout Case came to be decided more than twelve years after the McMahon Case, the composition of the court had been entirely changed, no one of the judges remaining who had participated in the decision of the prior cases. In that case the prisoner was not under arrest when he made his statements under oath before the coroner's jury; but he was informed that he was suspected of the crime and that he would be arrested for it, and the coroner told him that he had a right to refuse to testify; and the statements were held competent evidence. What difference could it make with the value and reliability of the statements, as evidence, that the prisoner was not under arrest when he made them, while he was informed that he was suspected and was to be arrested? Upon the reasoning of Judge Selden in both of the prior cases, it was wholly immaterial that he was informed that he had the right to refuse to testify.

In the Hendrickson Case, the learned judge said: "A statement made under oath before a coroner's jury, while the party is under arrest upon suspicion of guilt, is equally voluntary as if made as a witness in a case with which he has no connection;" and "It is certain that the statements of an accused person, made under oath, are never excluded on account of any supposed violation of the immunity of the party from self crimination."

In the McMahon Case, he said: "The statement, although made under oath and upon a judicial examination as to the crime, may still be admitted, if at the time it was made the person was not himself resting under any charge or suspicion of having committed the crime."

"That the idea of immunity or privilege does not lie at the basis of this rule of exclusion is proved by the fact that the evidence is equally inadmissible, although the person voluntarily consents to be sworn."

In the Teachout Case, the reasoning of Judge Selden in the two prior cases was emphatically repudiated; but without distinctly overruling the McMahon Case the court found a distinction which was regarded as of no importance by Judge Selden.

It is, indeed, quite difficult to perceive what difference in reason or in principle can be caused by the fact that the person was informed of his privilege not to testify, a fact which most persons know and which they must all be presumed to know; and it is even more difficult to understand how the statements of a person are in their nature more trustworthy and reliable after he has been so informed than they would be without such information.

The McMahon Case was, several years later, regarded by a learned judge as overruled by the Teachout Case. People v. Montgomery, 13 Abb. N. Y. 207, 251.

But even if that judge was in error it may well be doubted whether the rule laid down in the McMahon Case survived the legislation and the public policy thereby announced, which allowed prisoners to testify in their own behalf.

As we have seen the statements were there excluded because such statements, made under an oath voluntarily taken by a prisoner charged with crime, are in their nature too unreliable to be received as evidence. That ground of exclusion was utterly repudiated by the legislation referred to. If the sworn statements of a person before a coroner's jury, after he was charged with crime, were too unreliable to be received as evidence, much more would his sworn statements be unreliable, made upon his trial after indictment, when the question of his life or death was under investigation and to be immediately determined. It cannot be supposed that the Legislature meant to make that evidence, which in its nature was so infirm and worthless that it would be unsafe for a jury to rely upon it as a basis for their judgment. It would be quite an absurd spectacle to see a court exclude the sworn statements of a prisoner made before a coroner's jury, and at the same time receive his sworn statements made upon his trial for the crime.

Such was the state of the law as to judicial confessions when the section of the Code referred to was framed. The rule as finally settled, in order to make statements made by the prisoner under oath at a coroner's inquest (after he was charged with the crime) competent evidence against him upon his subsequent trial, required that it should be shown that he was advised of his right not to be sworn before he made the statements. If not so advised his statements so made were incompetent. But if the public prosecutor believed that the person was guilty, and fully intended to arrest and indict him, he had only to conceal from him his belief and intention and omit to charge him with the crime and then, although he was conscious of his own guilt and thus under the embarrassment created by such consciousness, he could examine him to any extent and procure from him, while he was unadvised and unaware of his peril, damaging statements to be used against him upon his trial. A rule so absurd in its operation is of little use for the protection of persons charged with crime, and the court should not be astute to preserve it.

It must be conceded that the law makers intended to make and did make a radical change, by the section referred to, in the law in reference to extrajudicial confessions; and it is not unreasonable to suppose that they intended an equally sweeping change in the law in reference to judicial confessions. They evidently meant to abolish all the fine distinctions which before existed, and establish a plain and simple rule; and they wrote in the section all the exceptions which they intended to preserve, and no court should interpolate more. If it had been intended that judicial confessions should not be received in evidence against the person making them, unless he had been advised of his privilege not to make them, that exception, it is fair to presume, would have been made in the section. That section too, it may be observed, is in the line of all modern legislation upon the subject of evidence, the tendency of which is to permit all relevant and material evidence to be placed before the triers of fact, there to receive the consideration it deserves.

It cannot well be claimed that these statements were not a confession within the meaning of the section. It is true that they were not a confession of crime but rather exculpatory; a denial of the crime. But such statements have always, in all the books, been classed under the head of confessions. Whatever one says about the crime with which he is charged which tends to connect him therewith or makes evidence against him in reference thereto, whether he so intends it or not, has always been treated as a confession.

In the Hendrickson Case, Judge Parker said that "The law seems to be that the rule as to confessions applies not only to direct confessions, but to every other declaration tending to implicate the person in the crime charged even though in terms it is an accusation of another or a refusal to confess."

If the section of the Code referred only to formal or actual confessions of guilt, it would leave much the larger part of judicial statements made by prisoners entirely unprovided for.

The constitutional guarantee that "No person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself," was not violated in this case. Statements of prisoners made under oath have never been excluded on that ground. On the contrary, that ground of exclusion was expressly repudiated by Judge Selden in the McMahon Case. The defendant had been in this country for more than two years. All persons within the jurisdiction of the State are supposed to know its laws; and in the enforcement of this rule no distinction is made between foreigners and natives. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 111; Best, Ev. 48, 452.

We must assume that he knew that it was his privilege to decline to be sworn, and that he voluntarily took the oath and made the statements. It was not claimed upon the trial that he was ignorant of his privilege, or that he was under any compulsion when he took the oath.

He was therefore in no sense compelled to be a witness against himself.

The view we have taken of section 395 of the Code is sanctioned by the case of People v. McGloin, 91 N. Y. 24.

If the reasoning of Judge Selden in the Hendrickson and McMahon Cases was sound, the confessions there received should have been excluded; but they were held competent evidence both at common law and under the section referred to.

We are, therefore, of opinion that no error was committed in the reception of the statements of the prisoner in evidence and that the judgment should be affirmed.

1. Unsecured claims of employees of a railroad corporation, for their services in operating the road, after default under a general mortgage thereon and before the appointment (in proceedings to foreclose such mortgage) of a receiver to operate the road during the pendency of such proceedings, do not have a preference over the mortgage lien; and the receiver should not be decreed to pay such claims or to issue his certificates therefor. (So held where the foreclosure proceedings were begun before the passage of the Act of 1886, chap. 376, in reference to the wages of employees of corporations for which a receiver has been appointed.)
2. A deficiency in the expenses of operating the road by the receiver in foreclosure, where the necessity of the expenses does not appear, should not be given a preference over the claim of a prior mortgagee of the road, who was not a party to the application for a receiver.

APPEAL by plaintiff and by the Farmers Loan & Trust Company, one of the defendants, from parts of an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming an order of the Allegany Special Term, authorizing the receiver of a railroad corporation, appointed in a foreclosure proceeding, to pay certain claims. Reversed.

Reported below, 40 Hun, 80.

The defendant, the Tonawanda Valley & Cuba Railroad Company, is a corporation created in 1881, under the laws of the State of New York and by and through the consolidation of the corporate property and franchises of the Tonawanda Valley & Cuba Railroad Company, the Tonawanda Valley Railroad Company and the Tonawanda Valley Extension Railroad Company. Prior to this consolidation the Tonawanda Valley Railroad Company had issued mortgage bonds and had secured the same by a mortgage of all its property and franchises to the defendant, the Farmers Loan & Trust Company.

By the joint agreement for said consolidation it was provided that the consolidated company should assume the payment of the principal and interest of such bonds as were outstanding, subsequent to the consolidation and on or about September 1, 1881, the consolidated company made its mortgage of all its property and franchises, to James D. Fish, as trustee, to secure the payment of an issue of its first mortgage bonds; thereafter said Fish resigned his position as such trustee and the plaintiff herein was appointed trustee in his stead.

On September 1, 1884, default was made in the payment of interest due on the last mentioned bonds, and thereafter, on November 29, 1884, this action was brought by the plaintiff, as trustee as aforesaid, for the foreclosure of the mortgage securing the same, and for the appointment of a receiver pendente lite.

Bird W. Spencer was, on the application of the plaintiff, at the commencement of this suit, appointed receiver at the defendant Railroad Company, pendente lite, and thereupon took possession of the property of the Corporation and assumed control of its operation, as provided in the order of appointment.

The defendant, the Farmers Loan & Trust Company, appeared and answered the complaint, alleging the priority of certain outstanding bonds secured by the mortgage made to it as aforesaid.

Thereafter and on October 19, 1885, on the petition of the receiver to be allowed to issue certificates to make payments on account of the operation of the road, and after a reference as to the facts, the order now under review was made at Special Term, providing among other things that he issue certificates to the employees and servants of the road, for labor and services in operating the road prior to his appointment and since September 1, 1884; and for deficiency for supplies, etc.

Messrs. Thos. G. Hillhouse and O. P. Buel, for plaintiff, appellant:

The court below erred in authorizing the issue of receiver's certificates of indebtedness having priority over the existing mortgages, for the payment of employees of the railroad whose claims had matured prior to his appointment, or for deficiency for supplies.

Mr. Herbert B. Turner, for Farmers Loan & Trust Co., defendant, appellant:

The power to appoint a receiver has been classed under the head of the quia timet jurisdiction of chancery. The remedy is a provisional or auxiliary one, exercised as an adjunct to the principal relief sought in the case.

High, Receivers, §§ 1-11; Bispham, Equity, § 576; Jones, R. R. Securities, § 458.

In England the power exists only by virtue of statute, the equity courts having declined to exercise it before authority to do so was expressly conferred by Parliament.

But in the United States the power of a court of chancery to assume control of a railroad by the appointment of a receiver has been frequently exercised. The inherent authority of our courts of equity is deemed sufficient without legislative aid.

Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall. 203 (88 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 447).

A receiver has no greater right than a mortgagee to improve the mortgagor out of his estate.

Jones, R. R. Securities, § 533.

In Denniston v. Chicago, etc. R. R. Co. 4 Biss. 414, claimants for materials furnished an insolvent road were held not entitled to payment out of a fund in court arising from a sale of the corporate property, until the bonds were paid.

Material men who suffer their property to go into and become a part of the road consent to its being covered by the mortgages, and can acquire no lien to the prejudice of the mortgagees.

Galveston, etc. R. R. Co. v. Cowdrey, 11 Wall. 482 (78 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 206).

In Meyer v. Johnston, 53 Ala. 237; S. C. 9 Am. Ry. Rep. 454, the court held that floating indebtedness contracted for betterments and for the purpose of paying interest on the bonds could not take precedence of the claims of the bondholders secured by a prior mortgage; and this not only as to the corpus of the railroad's estate, but even as to the income, in the application of which no such prior claim could be recognized.

In the Peoria & Springfield Case, the Supreme Court of Illinois refused to allow the payment, even to an innocent holder, of a certificate issued for indebtedness incurred before the receiver was appointed. Scott, J., says:

"Under the facts there can be no pretense, had the claim been presented by the payee named in the certificate, that he would have been entitled to have it paid out of any funds in the hands of the receiver." "Equitably the payee had no claim whatever on the trust property, and as the holders occupy his shoes they stand in no better position in a court of equity when a fund is being administered."

Mr. Edward C. Randall, for employees, respondents:

The contract of the mortgages of the railroad differs from the ordinary mortgage contract on land; the mortgages are different in form and substance; they cover different property and rights of property. The one is a mortgage not only of land but of a valuable franchise connected therewith, granted to corporate bodies by the Legislature; the other is upon the land alone, and the rules of law which govern it are not applicable to the former.

Duncan v. Trustees of Ches. & Ohio R. R. Co. 9 Am. Ry. Rep. 386.

The receiver is a person appointed by the court, upon application of the mortgage bondholders, to operate, manage and preserve the property pendente lite; he is the arm of the court. It is the duty of the court to operate, manage and preserve the trust fund when, upon application of the bondholders, it assumes control; and to do any and all things requisite and necessary to insure such preservation; and for that purpose the court may authorize the issue of certificates which shall constitute a lien upon the property prior to the mortgages.

Jones, R. R. Securities, §§ 538-550; Meyer v. Johnston, 53 Ala. 237.

I deem the following general propositions established, from the adjudications bearing on this case:

I. That when the bondholders took their security they impliedly agreed that the current expenses should be paid out of its current receipts before they had any claim thereon; by this receiver they sequestered all future income, and must be held to their original undertaking.

Burnham v. Bowen, 111 U. S. 776 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 596).

II. That the service of these employees has preserved the trust fund before and since the appointment of the receiver and enabled it to retain its business, and has resulted in substantial advantage to the mortgage bondholders; and that they are now estopped from objecting to payment therefor.

Douglas v. Cline, 12 Bush, 608.

III. The labor we performed before the appointment of this receiver was necessary for the maintenance and was essential for the preservation of the trust property; and it is the duty of the court to provide for the payment of such labor before as well as after the property came to its hands.

Burnham v. Bowen, supra.

IV. To preserve and manage the property, the receiver must be enabled to retain in his service the employees he found in the service of the road when he took possession, and it is the duty of the court to assist him so to do; and this can only be done by providing for the payment of what is due them.

Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 236 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 339).

V. The labor done by these employees, and the benefit the bondholders have received in the increased value of the trust fund, and the necessities of the case, place the payment of such labor in the category of payments necessary for the preservation of the mortgaged property.

Miltnerberger v. Logansport, etc., R. Co. 106 U. S. 286 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 117).

VI. The bondholders must be held to do what the Company would have done if left in possession. The bondholders knew that these liabilities must be incurred. At any moment during all the three months the employees were working, they could have taken possession of and arrested the administration of this Company. Their interest was in default. Had this receiver not been appointed, this labor claim would have been paid. Their silence and inactivity must be construed as an estoppel.

Dow v. Memphis, etc., R. R. Co. 20 Fed. Rep. 260, 768.

VII. When the Company failed to pay interest, Sept. 1, 1884, and no interest having been paid since May, 1884, the Company being bankrupt and in default, the right of the bondholders to take possession was fully consummate; and their failure so to do made the officers of the Company agents of the bondholders to operate said road and employ such labor. They have ratified the acts of the Company, accepted the benefits and proceeds thereof, and are equitably bound to pay therefor.

Duncan v. Trustees of Ches. & Ohio R. R. Co. 9 Am. Ry. Rep. 386.

VIII. The referee reports as a fact that when the receiver took possession of this railroad he took $1,400 of the earnings of said road into his hands, earned prior to his appointment, which was a part of the current fund, earned in operating said road by these employees. The receiver in his petition shows that the money has been expended by him in operating, managing and preserving this trust fund. Upon this money the employees had an equitable lien; and of so much of the earnings there has been a diversion, for which the court must make restitution beyond question. But we say we can go further. Where is the money earned by this road in September, October and November, 1884? It did not go where it was equitably bound to go; if it had, we would have been paid. I think we can assume that it was paid in the operation, management and betterment of said road; and we think that there has been therefore a diversion of the income of said road.

Fosdick v. Schall, supra.

IX. It is not necessary that the income should be diverted to the payment of bonded interest. The circumstances of the rendition of this labor created an equity superior to the mortgaged bondholders.

Union Trust Co. v. Souther, 107 U. S. 501 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 488).

X. The same equity that will entitle us to payment from income will entitle us to pay from the corpus.

Union Trust Co. v. Souther, supra.

XI. The equities of the employees were superior at the time of the appointment of the receiver, and they are no less so now.

XII. The mortgagees must be deemed to have assented to reasonable temporary credits, as necessary to preserve and manage the property, and whatever is necessary to accomplish this result must be taken as assented to by the mortgage bondholders. Such temporary credits before the appointment of the receiver must be recognized by mortgagees, and payment provided therefor.

Blair v. St. Louis, H. & K. R. Co. 22 Fed. Rep. 471.

XIII. If the court, upon application of the bondholders, had not arrested the administration of the road, we would have been paid in full. Such appointment cannot defeat our rights. The mortgagees must now do what the Company would have been bound to do if left in possession.

Barton v. Barbour, 104 U. S. 126 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 672).

XIV. The mortgage bondholders have received the benefit of this labor in betterments placed upon their property in the increased value of the property and its franchises. The employees' equities are superior to the mortgagees' and as such are entitled to compensation.

Mittenberger v. Logansport, etc., Ry. Co. supra; Jones, R. R. Securities, §§ 534-538.

The Constitution gives courts of equity the power and makes it their duty to protect, manage and preserve the trust fund. As a necessary incident to that duty is the right to provide the means of carrying the same into effect.

Jones, R. R. Securities, § 537; Meyer v. Johnston, 9 Am. R. Rep. 454.

The omission to provide for the payment of labor claims in the original order is no bar to their subsequent allowance.

Blair v. St. Louis R. R. Co.; Mittenberger v. R. R. Co. and Union Trust Co. v. Souther, supra.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appeal in this case is by the plaintiff and by the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, one of the defendants, from so much of an order of the supreme court as authorizes Spencer, as receiver of the property, real and personal, easement, rolling stock and equipment, leases, franchises and all other rights and property whatsoever of the defendant, the Tonawanda Valley & Cuba Railroad Company, covered by the mortgage or deed of trust dated September 1, 1881, referred to in the complaint in this action, to pay or issue his certificates of indebtedness for the payment of the following items and amounts, namely: $3,400.21 to the employees and servants of the railroad aforesaid, for labor and services in operating it prior to said receiver's appointment and subsequently to September 1, 1884; and also $3,000 for deficiencies for supplies; and from so much as makes the certificates when issued a lien and charge on all the property of the defendant Railroad Company, prior to the lien of the several mortgages or deeds of trust upon the said railroad or upon any part thereof.

Notwithstanding the argument of the respondents' counsel, we are unable to discover any principle upon which the claims of the employees, for labor performed before the appointment of the receiver, can be so extended as to diminish or impair or postpone the lien of the mortgage, for the enforcement of which the action was brought, or the lien of the mortgage set up by the Farmers Loan and Trust Company. Both are prior in point of time to the respondents' claims; and we are referred to no statute which displaces them.

The Legislature has given the laborer a remedy in certain cases, against the stockholders of a corporation, upon default of the corporation to meet its obligations (Laws, 1860, chap. 140, § 10; of 1864, chap. 282, § 16); but the decree in this case goes much further and requires their payment out of the property of other creditors.

The argument in its support is that the value of the mortgage lien has been enhanced by the labor of the workmen.

It is easy to see that under such a plea the lienor might be entirely defeated, and the foreclosure of his mortgage rendered inoperative and useless. Such a result except upon his consent, the courts have no power to sanction. It is going a great way in that direction to permit, as it is true courts sometimes have permitted, a receiver of an insolvent railroad corporation to pay for materials and labor procured by him after his appointment, necessary to the running of the road it may be, but not to the winding up of the affairs of the corporation. The propriety of that practice we are not called upon to review; but notwithstanding the research of the respondents' counsel, no case has been cited where an unsecured creditor, however meritorious the consideration of his claim, has been given priority over a lien contracted for and in force when his debt was created.

When, as in this case, the plaintiff procures the appointment of a receiver, with power to control and operate the mortgaged railroad, he cannot well object to the depreciation of his security by expenses incurred for these purposes, but he may properly seek to have excluded any previous ones. Here the claimants are mere general creditors, with no special equities in their favor against prior creditors, nor have they an equitable lien upon any fund in court.

If there were any who occupied a different position, their rights are fully protected as against the plaintiff by the order appointing the receiver, who was directed to pay all the debts and balances due to the laborers theretofore employed by the defendant Railroad Company, for labor or services done, or due for supplies furnished in the operation of the railroad, and for which they have a lien. A different relation is established by the Act of 1885, chap. 376, which requires a receiver of such a corporation to pay the wages of its employees and laborers in prece to footreher debts or claims; but that statute was not in force when the proceedings now under review were had; and therefore, even if applicable to a receiver in a foreclosure case, cannot be invoked to sustain the order appealed from.

Here the appellants have the prior lien by mortgage; and upon general principles, from which the circumstances of this case require no departure, are entitled to a preference. Vatable v. N. Y., Lake Erie & West. R. R. Co. 96 N. Y. 79.

As to the other items, viz.: deficiencies for supplies. If the appeal stood alone upon the notice of the plaintiff it might be that under the order appointing the receiver, it should be allowed to stand. That order directs him in effect to maintain and keep in repair, and operate the railroad and to pay the necessary expenses of so doing. It was made on plaintiff's request and plaintiff must abide by it. But with the other appellant it is different.

The Farmers Loan & Trust Company was not a party to the application for a receiver, and is not found to have acquiesced in it. The finding of the referee is that "The receiver, as such, while operating the road has incurred obligations to the amount of $4,742 for supplies delivered for the use, and operating the road, consisting of coal, oil, hardware, repairs done by the Erie Railroad Company at its shops; freight and ticket balances, etc., a statement of which appears in exhibit "J" attached to the petition in this proceeding, and is under the head of 'Accounts payable April 1, 1885.' This the receiver calls his 'deficiency account,' and it does appear that he has no funds out of which to realize the money to pay this account, or any portion of the same."

We find no exhibit J in the case, but under "accounts payable April 1, 1885," a statement of names of creditors and amounts, but no statement of the consideration or cause of indebtedness, and nothing therein or in the finding of the referee to show that the debts or obligations were necessarily incurred. No brief has been submitted for the receiver or other party, in support of this last item; and we discover no ground on which it can stand.

We think, therefore, so far as appealed from, the order of the general and special terms should be reversed; and the petition of the receiver, in respect to the items embraced in the appeal, denied, with costs, to the appellants to be paid by the receiver as such, and not individually.

All concur except Miller, J., absent.

1. Where, in an action seeking to hold certain parties (here, the members of a firm) liable as copartners with the party (here, a corporation) to whom goods had been sold, it appears from the contract between defendants and the vendee that, as between themselves, they were not copartners, it is essential to a recovery to show that defendants held themselves out as copartners with the vendee, and that the vendee obtained credit on that account.
2. Evidence of declarations by the parties sought to be held liable as partners, going to show that they had become owners of the corporation vendee and were sustaining its credit, does not tend to prove that a copartnership

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of New York at a General Term, affirming a judgment at a Trial Term in favor of plaintiff in an action for goods sold and delivered. Reversed.

The action was brought against Hall and his partners, doing business under the firm name of Hall, Nicoll & Granbery (the present appellants), and against the United States Reflector Company, the complainant alleging that defendants were copartners, and as such jointly liable.

This claim was attempted to be sustained at the trial, mainly upon a written agreement between the firm of Hall, Nicoll & Granbery and said United States Reflector Company, as follows:

"This agreement, made and entered into in the City of New York, this 22d day of April, 1880, between Bolton Hall, Benjamin Nicoll and David W. Granbery, all of the City of New York, composing the firm of Hall, Nicoll & Granbery, parties of the first part, and the United States Reflector Company, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Connecticut, party of the second part, witnesseth; that,

"Whereas, said parties of the first part contemplate assuming the control of the said United States Reflector Company, when, if ever, they shall be satisfied that the business of said company is a profitable one and that it fully realizes their expectations; and,

"Whereas, it is expedient that some arrangement should be made, whereby the profitability of said business may be determined by them, and the representations made by said company as to the character and volume of its business may be proven to the satisfaction of the said parties of the first part;

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and of the mutual promises, covenants and agreements each to and with the other made as hereinafter set forth, and of the sum of one dollar each to the other in hand paid, the parties to this agreement do covenant, promise and agree to and with each other in the way, manner and form following, to wit:

"First. The said parties of the first part shall furnish the money necessary to execute the orders of The United States Reflector Company for goods manufactured and to be manufactured by it, in accordance with the claims and specifications of any and all the letters patent to it belonging or otherwise, by making advances of money to said company on such of said orders as they, the said parties of the first part, shall approve of; and when and so long as the said The United States Reflector Company shall be indebted to the said parties of the first part for money paid to it by their said firm, in discounting the bills and notes of said company, received by it in the ordinary course of business, as set forth in section 5 of this agreement, then in that case it shall be obligatory upon said company; and the said company does hereby covenant, promise and agree to allow the said parties of the first part at their option to make such advances on each and every order that it may receive for its manufactured and to be manufactured goods, and to submit each and every order to said firm for that purpose, and to pay for such advance as hereinafter set forth; but when and so long as the said the United States Reflector Company shall be indebted to the said parties of the first part for money paid to it by said firm, in discounting the bills and notes of said company as set forth in said section 5 of this agreement, then in that case it shall not be obligatory upon said company to allow said parties of the first part to make such advances; but the said company may at its option apply to said firm for that purpose.

"Second. The said the United States Reflector Company shall and will assign, transfer and set over to said Hall, Nicoll & Granbery, at the time any such advance is made, the bill or order upon which they, the said parties of the first part, shall make such an advance as herein above set forth, with full power to collect and sue for the same and to receipt therefor on collection.

"Third. The said parties of the first part shall in all cases collect every bill or order so assigned to them as aforesaid, and upon which they have made an advance to said company as herein above stated; and out of the money arising from the payment thereof the said parties of the first part shall retain the amount advanced by them thereon as herein above mentioned, together with 6 per cent interest thereon from the date of such advance, and in addition thereto the amount of 25 per cent of the face of every such bill or order where the profits to the said company on the cost of making up the bill or order is 100 per cent, and in the same proportion when the said profit is less; but in no case the said parties of the first part shall receive less than 10 per cent on the amount advanced by them in addition to the amount so advanced on any bill or order as hereinbefore mentioned.

"Fourth. If the said company shall have on hand materials sufficient to make up the whole or part of any order or orders, the said parties of the first part will advance to the said company on the said material, estimated according to its market value, money sufficient to execute said order or orders on the same terms, at the same rates and in the same method as stated in the first, second and third articles of this agreement.

"Fifth. The said parties of the first part shall and will discount all such notes, bills, checks, drafts and accounts belonging to said the United States Reflector Company and received by it in the ordinary and usual course of its business, as they, the said parties of the first part, shall approve of, but not otherwise, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

"Sixth. The said the United States Reflector Company shall and will not, during the continuance of this agreement, borrow money on their orders or order for the goods manufactured or to be manufactured by, under and in accordance with any letters patent to it belonging or otherwise, or allow its bills or notes to be discounted by any person or persons whomsoever other than the said parties of the first part.

"Seventh. This agreement shall be terminated at any time whatsoever, at the pleasure and option of the said parties of the first part, by a written notice to the company to that effect, served on its treasurer; and on the service of said notice, in the way and manner aforesaid, this agreement shall then cease and determine, and the parties of the first part hereto shall be absolutely and forever discharged and released from any obligation or liability hereby created, except that they, the said parties of the first part, shall have the right and they are hereby empowered to collect any bill or order upon which they have advanced, as provided in the first article of this agreement, and which may not have been collected by them at the time of the termination of this agreement as herein provided, and to receive and to retain out of the proceeds of said collection the amounts which, under the third article of this agreement they are entitled to.

"Eighth. Unless sooner terminated as hereinbefore provided, this agreement shall continue in full force and effect until the first day of February, 1881, and be binding on the parties hereto and their legal representatives and successors."

Independently of this agreement, evidence was adduced by the plaintiff and received by the court, under defendants' objections and exceptions, of declarations made by the defendants to the plaintiff and others to prove the liability of defendants Hall, Nicoll & Granbery; which declarations the plaintiff contended, and the court held and so instructed the jury, were competent and pertinent to establish such liability.

The jury found a verdict for plaintiff upon which judgment was entered. Defendants composing the firm of Hall, Nicoll & Granbery appealed to the general term, where the judgment was affirmed; and they appealed to this court.

At about the time the bill of goods in question was sold, another was sold to the same parties by the firm of Cassidy & Son, upon which a suit was brought against these defendants and a verdict and judgment given for plaintiffs. Upon appeal to the court of appeals the judgment was reversed (97 N. Y. 159), the court holding that the agreement in question and the acts and declarations of the parties were insufficient to establish a partnership.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. William H. Scott, for appellants:

As the action was not brought upon any original promise or any guaranty, but upon the claim that a partnership existed, the declarations of defendants are insufficient to uphold the plaintiff's right to recover.

Cassidy v. Hall, 97 N. Y. 170.

But assume for the sake of the argument that the whole testimony justifies the view that it was the understanding of the parties that Hall, Nicoll & Granbery were to pay for the goods; still the result would not be changed, in consideration of the conceded fact that the plaintiff also looked to the United States Reflector Company for payment of the bill, and that, in the first instance, the goods were charged and the bill presented to it, it being well settled by the decision in this State that "When the whole credit is not given to the person who comes in to answer for another, the promise is collateral; and in all such cases there must be an agreement in writing containing a sufficient consideration to support it."

The reason of the rule is obvious, that where credit is given by third persons on the faith of an apparent partnership the law will not permit them to become losers on account of any secret agreement or understanding of the apparent parties.

Representations, conduct, deportment and circumstances calculated or likely to induce the belief that the parties are partners will render them liable to creditors doing business with them under the impression so created.

There are some cases in which the doctrine of estoppel may be rested upon the broad ground of public policy.

Poillon v. Secor, 61 N. Y. 461.

If a lender of money to a firm stipulates for a right to control the business or the employment of the assets or to wind up the business, or if his advance is risked in the business or forms part of his capital in it, he ceases to be a mere lender and becomes, in effect, a dormant partner.

The doctrine that a person holding himself out as partner and thereby inducing others to act upon the faith of his representations is liable to them as if he were in fact a partner rests upon the principle of estoppel.

Pickard v. Sears, 6 Adol. & Ell. 469; Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Welsb. Hurl. & G. 654.

It is wholly immaterial whether the person holding himself out as a partner does or does not share the profits or losses.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court: This action was brought against the defendants as copartners, doing business as such under the name and style, as a firm, of the United States Reflector Company. Unless such a copartnership in fact existed, or was so represented to exist as to involve liability to third persons dealing upon the faith of the representations, the cause of action pleaded was wholly unproved and judgment should have gone for the appellants. The actual relation existing by their mutual agreement between the firm of Hall, Nicoll & Granbery, and the corporation organized and known as the United States Reflector Company was proved upon the trial. That agreement was in writing, entirely undisputed; and there is no pretense that as between the firm and the corporation any other agreement establishing their relations inter sese was at any time made.

We have already decided that the contract referred to did not make the firm and the corporation copartners and liable as such. Cassidy v. Hall, 97 N. Y. 159.

The plaintiff, therefore, under his pleading, could only recover upon the ground that although not in fact partners, yet Hall, Nicoll, & Granbery held themselves out as such, and the reflector company obtained credit on that account. The facts relied upon were very nearly those which in Cassidy v. Hall we held to be insufficient. They do show a sale to the corporation upon the verbal guaranty of the firm, the former being principal debtor, and the latter surety or the reverse; but they do not show or tend to prove a representation of an existing copartnership.

The plaintiff examined George Bridge, who was in the employ of the corporation and who applied to purchase for it the cross and gas fixtures sued for. Before attempting the purchase the witness told Hall that no one would trust the reflector company, to which Hall replied: "You must tell everybody the same as I have told you; we are the reflector company."

This indicated no partnership. It suggested something quite different. The inference which it justified was that the firm had become the owners of the corporation and were sustaining its credit, but not that a copartnership had been formed. The witness further explains that he was authorized by Hall to say that the corporation was "now in good condition" and that "Hall, Nicoll & Granbery were its backers." These representations were made to plaintiff, but he declined to sell upon them. In some form he evidently wanted the direct responsibility of the firm and was unwilling to sell without it. Finally Bridge, by the authority of Hall, promised that the firm would pay the bill; and thereupon the sale was made. The goods were delivered to the reflector company, charged to it, and the bill sent to it for payment.

Many letters from Hall to Bridge were produced. They showed a continued interference by the firm in the management of the business of the corporation, but an interference natural and proper under the written agreement which contemplated an effort to restore the company's prosperity and build up its business.

The plaintiff himself was called and gave his version of the representations leading to the sale. These were that the reflector company was backed and owned by Hall, Nicoll & Granbery, and was in good condition; that they controlled its business and furnished the money; and that if he sold to it he should have his pay. The effort was to bolster up its credit by an assurance of the firm's interest in it and determination to aid it; but there was not a word leading to any inference or encouraging any belief that the firm and the corporation had formed a copartnership which was to be the proposed purchaser. On cross examination he shows that he perfectly understood the real relation existing and was not misled by even the suggestion of a partnership. He says: "I asked Bridge what relation Hall, Nicoll, & Granbery were to the reflector company, and where they were getting their money (Hall, Nicoll & Granbery) if they became security for the cross." Bridge answered that they controlled the company, not that they were partners with it; that all orders were submitted to them; that bills were paid and collected by them; that they bought for the company and reimbursed their advances from collections made by them. Other circumstances and incidents were shown, most if not all of which were considered by us in the Cassidy Case. Upon the question of partnership we are unable to see any substantial ground of difference between that case and the present one.

But there is another and graver question involved, although not raised in the appellants' brief. The firm did promise to pay this debt, as an inducement to the sale by the vendors. Whether that promise was original or collateral and whether the firm may not have become principal debtors for the goods is a very serious inquiry upon the evidence. Apparently that is the question which the court submitted to the jury upon the facts; and although outside of the pleadings, it was covered by the proof. But to that proof an objection was interposed by the defendants.

When the promise, "We will pay that bill," was first sworn to by Bridge, the defendants' counsel moved to strike it out, upon the ground that the whole theory of the action was a partnership; that what Hall said tending to induce that belief was pertinent, but the promise sworn to "seems without the limits of the pleadings." The court admitted the evidence "as against Hall" and the defendants excepted.

The promise to pay, even if original, was thus admitted only as against Hall, and the ruling cannot stand as a basis of the firm's liability as purchasers and original debtors. The question of pleading was squarely raised, and thereafter, without an amendment of the complaint, proof of the firm's liability founded upon a basis other than that stated in the pleadings could not be given and acted upon. To sustain the unpleaded cause of action the admission of the evidence was error which can only be cured by deeming the promise to pay merely evidence bearing upon the question of partnership. And although quite singularly, the court submitted this unpleaded cause of action to the jury, stating the inquiry to be, whether "Hall meant himself to be the purchaser, together with the United States Reflector Company," and adding that if the jury so found "the plaintiff would be entitled to a verdict, because the goods were sold, not only to the United States Reflector Company but to Mr. Hall," and although this charge evoked no objection or exception from the defendants, yet we cannot ignore the fact that the evidence to sustain this unpleaded liability was objected to for that reason; and its erroneous admission, both as against the firm and as against Hall, cannot be resorted to, even to save what may be a very just verdict.

Possibly, on a new trial the pleadings may be so amended as to present the very serious question of the primary liability of the firm outside of a partnership; but as the case stands the judgment rendered was erroneous.

Judgment reversed; new trial granted, costs to abide the event.

APPPEALS from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Kings Special Term in favor of plaintiffs in an action for an injunction, and to establish a priority in orders drawn on a county treasurer. Reversed.
Memorandum of decision below, 35 Hun, 668.

Statement by Earl, J.:

On the 11th day of December, 1880, the Counties of Kings and Queens entered into a contract with the defendants Swift & Van Aken, to build a swing bridge over Newton Creek which separates those counties. The contract price was $7,500, one half of which was to be paid by each county. The turn table of the bridge was to be the Blanchard and O'Rourke patent turn table.

The contract also contained the following provision: "Should the engineer at any time during the progress of the work be of the opinion that the work is being unnecessarily or unreasonably delayed, or that the contractor is willfully violating any of the conditions of this specification and shall certify so in writing, then the committee shall have the power to notify the contractor to discontinue all work or any part thereof under this contract. And thereupon the said contractor shall discontinue said work or such part thereof as the engineer shall designate; and the committee shall thereupon have the power to purchase, by contract or otherwise, as they may deem advisable, such quantity of material and to employ such labor and to use such material as they may find upon the line of such work, and to do any work that may be necessary to fulfill this contract or such part thereof as may be deemed necessary, and to charge the cost of such labor and material to the contractor; and the expense so charged shall be deducted out of such moneys as may be then due or at any time thereafter become due the contractor under this contract."

Swift & Van Aken entered upon the performance of the contract and after they had made some progress therewith they were paid by the two counties $3,000. Afterward, before the completion of the contract, they gave orders upon the county treasurer of Kings County sufficient in form to operate as equitable assignments, which orders were dated and filed at the times mentioned below:

To William Conselyea for $950, dated October 8, and filed October 10, 1881; to the same for $600, dated October 11 and filed October 15, 1881; to Drew & Bucki for $1,000, dated and filed October 20, 1881; to Blanchard & O'Rourke for $1,250, dated December 28, and filed December 29, 1881.

Thereafter the bridge was completed and accepted by the two counties and the sum of $4,000 remained due from them for the construction thereof, one half thereof from each county. The county treasurer of Kings County was willing and ready to pay the $2,000 to the persons entitled thereto.

This action was commenced in May, 1882, by William Conselyea, since deceased; and the plaintiff claimed priority of payment out of the sum of $2,000, due from Kings County, for the reason that his orders bore the earliest dates and were first filed with the county treasurer; and he prayed judgment that the county treasurer be restrained from paying any part of the sum to either of the other defendants, and that he be ordered first to pay the sum of $1,550, the amount of his two orders, to him.

The defendants, the firms of Blanchard & O'Rourke, and Drew & Bucki, both answered, each claiming priority of payment out of the fund in the hands of the county treasurer.

The action came to trial at a special term and the court ordered judgment that Blanchard & O'Rourke be first paid the sum of $250, out of the fund; that the plaintiffs who had been substituted in the place of William Conselyea, deceased, be next paid the sum of $1,550, and that the balance of $2,000 be paid to Drew & Bucki.

From the judgment thus ordered Blanchard & O'Rourke and Drew & Bucki appealed to the general term and from affirmance there to this court.

Mr. James Troy, for appellants Blanchard & O'Rourke:

It is claimed in the case by these appellants that the agreement between Blanchard & O'Rourke and Swift & Van Aken was violated on the part of the latter when they obstructed the former in the performance of the contract, by not performing the work necessary to be performed to enable Blanchard & O'Rourke to proceed, and in ignoring the demands of Blanchard & O'Rourke in this respect. Blanchard & O'Rourke were not in default, because obstructed by Swift & Van Aken.

Weeks v. Little, 11 Abb. N. C. 415; Stewart v. Kaeltas, 36 N. Y. 388; Howell v. Gould, 2 Abb. Ct. App. Dec. 418.

If Swift & Van Aken ever had an interest and property in the unfinished turn table, it was abandoned to Blanchard & O'Rourke by the breach and rescission. As to right to rescind, see Graves v. White, 87 N. Y. 463; Bigler v. Morgan, 77 N. Y. 812; Morris v. Rexford, 18 N. Y. 557; Battle v. Rochester City Bank, 3 N. Y. 88; Murray v. Harway, 56 N. Y. 846; Bowen v. Mandeville, 95 N. Y. 237.

The proceedings taken to procure the money by the presentation of bill, etc., were merely resorted to as the most convenient means of obtaining the money from the counties, and did not affect the right of Blanchard & O'Rourke.

Mr. Tunis G. Bergen, for appellants Drew & Bucki:

The drawee in this case was a public officer, the county treasurer. In such a case formal acceptance was not necessary, but from the time of filing the treasurer became the trustee for the payee.

People v. Comptroller, 77 N. Y. 48; Hall v. Buffalo, 1 Keyes, 193; Field v. Mayor, 6 N. Y. 179.

When equity is called on to examine the consideration, it is submitted that the rule of equity is this: "As between persons having only equitable interests, if their interests are in all other respects equal, then priority in time gives the better equity." In other words, priority of time is not the first ground of preference.

1 Pom. Eq. Jur. p. 455.

On grounds of public policy alone, the court should protect those who render service as against those who simply buy an order on such a fund. Courts of equity in this State have protected such interests on grounds of public policy.

The principle was laid down in Bliss v. Lawrence, 58 N. Y. 442; and in Stover v. Eycleshimer, 3 Keyes, 620.

Mr. J. Stewart Ross, for respondents:

The orders delivered to plaintiff by the defendants Swift & Van Aken for a valuable consideration, were assignments pro tanto of the fund to which they referred; and after the orders were filed with the county treasurer, he was bound to apply the fund, as it accrued, to the payment of the orders and to no other purpose.

Brill v. Tuttle, 81 N. Y. 454 and cases cited (reversing 15 Hun, 289); People v. Comptroller, 77 N. Y. 45; Atty. Gen. v. Continental Life Ins. Co. 71 N. Y. 325; Munger v. Shannon, 61 N. Y. 251; Parker v. Syracuse, 81 N. Y. 376; Muir v. Schenck, 3 Hill, 228; Greentree v. Rosenstock, 61 N. Y. 583; Freund v. Importers, etc. Bank, 76 N. Y. 352.

What is required by the authorities to give validity to an equitable assignment is a valuable consideration.

See Tallman v. Hoey, 89 N. Y. 539.

In the case of Jones v. Mayor, 90 N. Y. 387, the consideration was a prior indebtedness, and was held to have been a good consideration for such an assignment.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only claim the plaintiffs have to share in the fund in controversy, and to have priority therein is based upon the two orders taken by their testator, for the first of which he paid $850, and for the second of which he paid $595. There was no evidence that the money thus advanced bore any relation to or had any connection with the bridge or its erection; and the plaintiffs claim priority of payment solely on the ground that these orders are prior in date to the other orders.

Blanchard & O'Rourke base their claim to priority of payment upon facts found by the judge at special term as follows: they were the owners of a certain patent for the construction of bridge turn tables which were known and designated as "Blanchard & O'Rourke patent turn tables;" and as such patentees they had the exclusive right to construct and use such turn tables; and Swift & Van Aken, by their contract with the two counties, were bound to furnish such a turn table.

For the purpose of performing their contract with the counties, Swift & Van Aken entered into contract with Blanchard & O'Rourke to furnish, supply and erect one of these turn tables for the price of $2,500, of which $2,000 was to be paid when the turn table should be complete, in running order, and accepted as such; and the balance, $500, when the bridge should be accepted by the counties.

By the contract of Swift & Van Aken with the counties, it was provided that the work on the bridge should be commenced within ten days and finished within sixty days after the completion and delivery of the central pier; and if there was delay beyond that time, they agreed to pay as liquidated damages to the counties the sum of $50 per day for every day of such delay, the amount to be retained from the contract price stipulated to be paid by the counties.

By the contract between Swift & Van Aken and Blanchard & O'Rourke it was provided that the turn table should be completed within the time specified for the completion of the bridge.

After the making of the two contracts mentioned, and in or about the month of July, 1881, the central pier for the bridge having been completed and delivered, Swift & Van Aken entered upon the performance of their contract, and in that month, after doing some work thereon, they refused to proceed further under their contract until a payment was made to them which they were not entitled to, as the engineer in charge on behalf of the counties refused to certify therefor. Whereupon, the joint committee of the two counties duly authorized thereto took entire charge of the supervision of the work, and the engineer ceased to act further; and the committee, on the 21st day of July, for the purpose of inducing Swift & Van Aken to proceed with the work, although nothing was actually due them under the contract, reported a resolution to the boards of supervisors of the two counties, recommending a payment of $3,000 to them on their contract, which sum was paid, upon such recommendation, by the counties.

On the reporting of such recommendation by the committee, Swift & Van Aken resumed work on the bridge; and on the passage of the resolution to make the payment recommended, they again ceased work. When such sum was paid to them they again resumed work on the bridge; and immediately thereafter again ceased work, and left the bridge unfinished, and thereafter absolutely failed and refused to proceed any further with the work, or to complete their contract.

Blanchard & O'Rourke duly proceeded with the erection of the turn table, and performed their contract in respect thereto, so far as the condition of the work to be performed by Swift & Van Aken permitted; but they were unable to fully complete and erect the turn table, for the reason that Swift & Van Aken had not, when they ceased to work, progressed to an extent sufficient to enable them to complete the same or further proceed therewith. Although they repeatedly demanded and required Swift & Van Aken to proceed with the erection of the bridge, so as to permit them to proceed with the erection of the turn table, they continually refused so to do, and in violation of their contract, hindered, delayed and prevented them from finishing the turn table and completing their contract. Swift & Van Aken were thus in default from July to October, 1881; and Blanchard & O'Rourke were not at any time in default.

In the month of October, while Swift & Van Aken were thus in default, there was a meeting of the joint committee at which Swift & Van Aken refused further to perform their contract, and declared their inability so to do and their intention absolutely to abandon the performance thereof. Whereupon, Blanchard & O'Rourke notified the committee that they would not proceed with the building of the turn table unless payment of the amount which they were to receive therefor should be assumed by the committee and thus secured to them; and they being then and there in possession of the work and material already used by them in the building of the turn table so far as the same had progressed, declared their intention unless so secured, to remove the materials and not to furnish the counties with the turn table or to permit the construction or use thereof. Whereupon, the committee, having full power and authority so to do, requested them to erect the turn table and promised and agreed that on the completion thereof the counties would pay them the sum of $2,500, and then and there, with the consent and concurrence of Swift & Van Aken, that sum was reserved, set apart, assigned and appropriated from the amount still unpaid to Swift & Van Aken, under their contract with the counties to and for the payment of Blanchard & O'Rourke upon the completion of the turn table; and the boards of supervisors of the two counties thereafter duly ratified the agreement.

Blanchard & O'Rourke, relying upon the agreement, thereupon agreed to proceed with the work, and did accordingly thereafter finish and complete the same. Swift & Van Aken did not thereafter proceed with the contract with the counties; and no money ever fell due to them thereunder, except as hereinafter stated. Blanchard & O'Rourke, with the consent of Swift & Van Aken, finished the contract of the latter with the counties and permitted them to have the ultimate benefit thereof and to receive the amount unpaid on the contract after first deducting the amount of $2,500, so appropriated, assigned and set apart for paying for the turn table.

On the 29th day of December, 1881, the committee in pursuance of the agreement to pay Blanchard & O'Rourke for the turn table on the completion thereof and for the purpose of carrying out the agreement, duly certified to the boards of supervisors that the sum of $5,000 was due to Swift & Van Aken, on account of their contract, one half thereof payable by each county; that $1,250 of the same was to be paid by each county to Blanchard & O'Rourke, before any other sum should be paid to any other person, and that the balance, $750, was to be paid by each county to Swift & Van Aken. The boards of supervisors severally adopted resolutions of the same tenor and effect.

On the 28th day of December, Swift & Van Aken delivered to Blanchard & O'Rourke an order on the treasurer of Kings County, requesting him to pay them the sum of $1,250, out of any moneys due or to grow due on their contract, which order was filed with the treasurer on the next day. That order was so given in furtherance of the agreement made between the joint committee and Blanchard & O'Rourke, with the consent and concurrence of Swift & Van Aken; and it and the bill presented therewith and the auditing thereof, and other proceedings in relation thereto, were resorted to and had in compliance with the agreement, and were mere matters of form resorted to and adopted for the purpose of obtaining the money in the usual and most expeditious way under the agreement and not otherwise, and were in no way intended to impair the rights of Blanchard & O'Rourke to the money under the agreement.

The trial judge not only found the foregoing facts, but he also found as conclusions of law, that there was nothing due to Swift & Van Aken from the counties, under their contract with them at the time they gave any of the orders involved in this action; that the counties and Swift & Van Aken had the legal right at any time during the existence of the contract between them to alter, modify or change the same in any way, provided it was done in good faith and without intent to defraud; that the agreement made between the committee and Blanchard & O'Rourke and Swift & Van Aken was made in good faith and for the best interest of the counties and of the other parties thereto, and was in all respects a valid and essentially necessary change and modification of the original contract; that at the time of making such change and modification of the contract Swift & Van Aken were in default in performance thereof, and then and there refused to proceed therewith or further to perform the same; that such refusal and the consent of Swift & Van Aken then given to the agreement between the counties and Blanchard & O'Rourke were a waiver of the notice required to be given to Swift & Van Aken under their contract on their failure to proceed therewith with reasonable diligence; that on such refusal and waiver the committee had the right and power, on behalf of the counties and under the contract between them and Swift & Van Aken, to proceed with and procure the erection of the turn table and charge the expense thereof to Swift & Van Aken and deduct such expense from the moneys yet unpaid on the contract; that Swift & Van Aken unreasonably hindered, delayed and prevented Blanchard & O'Rourke in the erection and completion of the turn table in violation of the contract between them; that Blanchard & O'Rourke did not, at any time or in any way violate the terms of such contract; that on such violation of the contract by Swift & Van Aken, Blanchard & O'Rourke had the legal right to abandon their contract and absolutely refuse to proceed further therewith, and also to remove and retain such materials as were still undelivered by them and were in their possession or under their control, and refuse to permit the further construction or the use of their patent turn table; that without such turn table the bridge could not be built or used as planned and projected; that Blanchard & O'Rourke had the right to make the agreement above mentioned with the counties, and the agreement was ratified and confirmed, and was in all respects valid and binding upon the counties and upon Blanchard & O'Rourke, and was and is unaffected by the former contract between them and Swift & Van Aken.

If some findings of fact are more favorable to Blanchard & O'Rourke than others, they have the right upon this appeal to claim the benefit of those which are most favorable to them, and so we have repeatedly held. Schwinger v. Ray- mond, 83 N. Y. 191; Bonnell v. Griswold, 89 N. Y. 122.

It is impossible for us to perceive how, upon the facts found, a conclusion adverse to the claim of Blanchard & O'Rourke can legally or justly be reached.

The orders taken by Conselyea and by Drew & Bucki did not operate as assignments of any money then due, as none was then due under the contract. They operated as assignments of money which was expected to become due and which might become due under the contract. If after they were given, by the default of Swift & Van Aken or by force of provisions contained in the contract no money should become due to Swift & Van Aken, the orders would become inoperative.

The fact that the orders were given did not deprive the counties of the right to take any action in good faith under the contract which they deemed proper and necessary to secure its performance and to protect their interests. The orders did not bind them, except as to payments which might become due to Swift & Van Aken under the contract.

Before any money was earned or paid under the contract and before the orders were given, the engineer employed by the counties was discharged and the joint committee assumed the supervision and direction of the work under the contract, and by the consent of Swift & Van Aken were substituted in his stead.

After Swift & Van Aken had for some time been in default in their performance of the contract, they declared their inability to further perform, and absolutely refused further performance. Then the counties had the right to make any arrangements they could for the completion of the bridge, and deduct the expenses to which they should be subjected from the price stipulated in the contract. With the assent of Swift & Van Aken they agreed with Blanchard & O'Rourke that they should complete the bridge, and that if they would do so they would pay them the $2,500 which they were to have for the turn table. At that time Blanchard & O'Rourke were absolved from further performance, and they had the right to remove all their materials and thus the bridge could not have been completed as planned. Relying upon the promise of the counties they resumed work, completed the contract of Swift & Van Aken and their own contract, and gave the counties the benefit of their patent turn table.

The $2,500 never became payable to Swift & Van Aken but became payable only under the new agreement; and thus the orders given to Conselyea and to Drew & Bucki never applied or attached thereto. The effect of the agreement was to procure the performance of Swift & Van Aken's contract, but at an expense to the counties of the $2,500, which they agreed to pay and were bound to pay, and which they could deduct from the contract price.

It matters not what form the subsequent transactions between the counties and Swift & Van Aken took. The order was given to Blanchard & O'Rourke, and the bill against the counties was made out and audited in the name of Swift & Van Aken; but all this was done to carry out the new agreement which had been made and without any intent to affect in any way the rights of Blanchard & O'Rourke thereunder.

The court below held that Blanchard & O'Rourke were entitled to priority of payment only for the sum they expended in the completion of the contract of Swift & Van Aken after the new agreement; and as that sum was $500 (one half payable by each county) that they could have priority only for $250, on the fund now in question.

But that is only a partial view of the case. They had the right to remove all their materials and to absolutely refuse to construct and put up the turn table; and in consideration of the new agreement they left their material, gave the counties the benefit of their turn table and expended the $500. For all this they were entitled to have the $2,500 promised to them.

Therefore we are of opinion that Blanchard & O'Rourke were first entitled to have $1,250 out of the $2,000 held by the treasurer of Kings County.

For the purposes of this appeal we might stop here. But with the view to the new trial, something more may with propriety be said as to the rights of priority as between the plaintiffs and Drew & Bucki. The latter claim priority of payment over the plaintiffs, because the materials they furnished for which the order was given to them were actually used in the construction of the bridge, while there is no proof that the money paid by Conselyea was in any way used in the construction of the bridge or had any relation thereto. This claim is not well founded. It is sufficient that plaintiffs' orders were founded upon a sufficient consideration. That made them effectual as assignments.

While the money paid was not actually used upon the bridge, it might have been used to support the assignors, or to keep off their creditors or to maintain their credit while they were engaged in the performance of their contract. It might be a very embarrassing inquiry to trace the connection which money thus advanced could have with the performance of any contract. Its relation to the contract might be very remote and yet just as useful as if actually used in its performance.

If courts should enter upon the inquiry to which we are invited by Drew & Bucki, they would have very embarrassing equities to adjust; and great uncertainty would nearly always attend such assignments. Suppose money or materials were advanced or furnished to be used in the performance of a contract, but were not actually thus used or only so used in part, and orders were taken for the consideration thus furnished, sufficient in form to operate as equitable assignments; how, under the rule claimed by Drew & Bucki, could the equities of several assignees be adjusted? We think the wiser rule is to treat all assignments of the kind we are now considering, founded upon sufficient considerations, as standing upon the same footing, and we find no case which sanctions any other rule.

Drew & Bucki claimed that they obtained an order from Swift & Van Aken in June, 1881, before any of the other orders were given, which was filed with the county treasurer and mislaid or lost; and that their present order dated October 20, 1881, was taken for the same amount in the place of the former one, and they gave evidence tending to sustain this claim. But there was no finding or request to find in reference to the former order. If upon the new trial they can satisfy the court that such an order was given, and that the last order was given as a substitute for that, then they will be in a position to claim priority over the plaintiffs.

It will not be sufficient for Drew & Bucki to prove that at the time they furnished these materials Swift & Van Aken promised to pay them out of the money which should become due to them upon the bridge contract. Such a promise does not operate as an equitable assignment of the fund, or give an equitable lien thereon. Williams v. Ingersoll, 89 N. Y. 508, 518.

We are therefore of opinion that the judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, costs to abide event.

Re ESTATE OF Elisha W. ENSIGN, Deceased.

1. A divorced wife, however innocent, has no right to a distributive share in the personal estate of her divorced husband, upon his death intestate. Hence, a divorced wife, who had been divorced on her own application (for the adultery of her husband) and who had released all interest in her former husband's real estate, is not entitled to notice of proceedings to probate his will.
2. No intention to permit an innocent divorced wife to share in the personal estate of her divorced husband, on his death intestate, is to be inferred from the terms of 2 R. S. p. 146, § 48, providing that "A wife being a defendant in a suit for a divorce brought by her husband, and convicted of adultery, shall not be entitled to dower in her husband's real estate, or any part thereof, nor to any distributive share in his personal estate."
3. The true theory of the statute is that, from the date of the decree, no existing and vested rights are forfeited except by the express mandate of the statute, but that no future marital right or obligation can arise for or against either the divorced husband or wife.

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fifth Department, affirming a decree of the Surrogate's Court of Erie County dismissing proceedings for the revocation of the probate of a will, and confirming the probate thereof. Affirmed.

Reported below, 37 Hun, 152.

The following are the facts, substantially, as found by the surrogate:

Elisha W. Ensign, a resident of the City of Buffalo, County of Erie, N. Y., died October 1, 1877, leaving personal property in said county. He left surviving, as his sole heirs at law and next of kin, his brother Charles Ensign and his sister Cornelia Hamilton, both of full age, residing in Buffalo, N. Y.

October 6, 1877, Charles Ensign presented to the surrogate of Erie County his petition showing that Elisha W. Ensign left a last will and testament dated December 1, 1866, and praying that such instrument might be proved, allowed and admitted to probate as the last will and testament of Elisha W. Ensign.

The petition was duly filed and Cornelia Hamilton appeared and consented thereto, and on the same day the instrument was proved and admitted to probate as the last will and testament of Elisha W. Ensign, and letters testamentary issued to Charles Ensign, executor, named therein. Charles Ensign died December 8, 1880; and on proceedings instituted by Cornelia Hamilton, she was appointed administratrix with the will annexed of Elisha W. Ensign.

May 24, 1867, Elisha W. Ensign was married to the petitioner in these proceedings, Jennie Ensign Martin, at Cincinnati, Ohio. They lived and cohabited as man and wife at New York City from the year 1868 to and including a portion of the year 1875. November 10, 1869, issue was born of such marriage which died within twenty-four hours of its birth.

On proceedings by the petitioner for divorce, commenced October 28, 1875, in the Court of Common Pleas in New York City, a decree of absolute divorce on the ground of the adultery of said Elisha W. Ensign was obtained December 18, 1875. Said decree of divorce ordered Elisha W. Ensign to pay as alimony the sum of $25,000 in semi-annual installments of $2,500 with interest, etc., and also directed Elisha W. Ensign to pay off a mortgage of $18,500, etc.

December 28, 1878, the petitioner executed under seal, in consideration of the payment to her of $10,000 by Charles Ensign, executor, etc., being the balance due of said alimony, to Charles Ensign as executor and to Cornelia Hamilton as sister and principal residuary legatee of Elisha W. Ensign, deceased, a release of all her dower and right and title of dower in and to all the lands and real estate of which said Elisha W. Ensign died seised.

In the month of December, 1877, the petitioner intermarried with one Edward Martin, whose wife she now is.

Thereafter said Jennie Ensign Martin instituted these proceedings to set aside the probate of the will of Elisha W. Ensign, alleging that she had not been served with any notice of the proceedings to probate such will and had never appeared therein (which facts were admitted in respondent's answer), and claiming to be entitled to a distributive share of the testator's personal estate had he died intestate.

The surrogate dismissed the appellant's petition, upon the ground that she was not entitled to notice of any of said proceedings, and that she was not and would not be entitled to any distributive share of the testator's personal estate had he died intestate.

Mr. Louis Marshall, for appellant.

Mr. S. S. Rogers, for respondent.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court: A statutory construction, unchallenged for more than half a century, is assailed on this appeal.

That a divorced wife, however innocent, has no right to a distributive share in the personal N. Y.

estate of her divorced husband, upon his death intestate, has been conceded until a very recent period, but is now asserted to have been all the time a mistake which should at last be corrected.

A single provision of the statute relating to divorce gives color to the construction sought. Where the decree is founded upon the misconduct of the wife it is expressly provided that she "shall not be entitled to dower in her husband's real estate, or any part thereof, nor to any distributive share in his personal estate." [2 R. S. p. 146, § 48; 8 R. S. 5th ed. p. 237, § 61].

On the theory that this was a needed provision to bar the guilty wife of dower it is argued that it was thought also a needed provision to bar distribution; and the inference is drawn that without such prohibition, or where by reason of the divorced wife's innocence it could not apply, the Legislature supposed she would be so entitled and intended to leave her, when free from fault, in the possession of both rights to their full extent.

But it is quite evident that we have here an unnecessary and superfluous provision as it respects dower. In a previous part of the Revised Statutes (1 R. S. p. 741, § 8) it had already been declared that in case of a divorce dissolving the marriage contract for the misconduct of the wife she shall not be endowed. This provision was needed to cut off the inchoate dower of the wife in property of the husband acquired prior to the decree, and was useless beyond that, and so operative for that purpose only. The added provision of section 48 was therefore needless. It is conceded to have been a mere "repetition" having no excuse except that of over caution, which is sometimes as dangerous as neglect. In the same statute there is a second instance of the same superfluous legislation. It is provided that the dissolution of the marriage contract shall not affect the legitimacy of the children. 3 R. S. 5th ed. §§ 56, 57.

In Wait v. Wait, 4 N. Y. 95, it was said of this provision: "No one, however, will pretend that such a provision, though for greater caution it may have been wise to adopt it, was in fact necessary;" and the court admitted that this needless case bore "to some extent" upon the prohibition of dower in section 48.

There were thus, concededly, two instances of needless caution in the statutes under consideration, and others ought not to surprise us. Ascertaining that the clause relating to dower was useless we may expect to find that equally true of the following one relating to distribution. The revisers omitted it in their draft, but the Legislature added it. All that time no right to distribution had ever been conceded to the divorced wife, but the law had been administered to the contrary; and with the full knowledge of that fact in the mind of the Legislature, it is difficult to conceive an intent to change the rule in so important a matter, left to be evidenced merely by an indirect inference and not affirmatively and expressly declared.

The rule as it then stood rested upon very clear and definite grounds. The Statute of Divorce began with a provision permitting a marriage to be annulled for specific reasons. In such case no marital rights could exist on either side, since the decree adjudged that a lawful marriage had never existed. But then came provisions for a dissolution of the marriage contract. In such case the contract is ended and terminated by the decree of the court. The relation of husband and wife, both actual and legal, is utterly destroyed and no future rights can thereafter spring out of or arise from it. Existing rights, already vested, are not thereby forfeited, and are taken away only by special enactment as a punishment for wrong. But future rights, dependent upon the marital relation and born of it, there can be none.

Thus, the wife's dower at the date of the decree is vested as an inchoate right, at least as against the husband, whether she be innocent or guilty, by the concurrence of marriage and seisin. It has fastened upon the land and follows it as an incumbrance and would become consummate upon the death of the husband in either event, but for the express mandate of the statute which forfeits it where the wife is the guilty party. But the wife, although blameless, acquires no dower right in lands conveyed to the husband after the divorce, because he was not seised during the coverture. Kade v. Lauber, 16 Abb. Pr. N. S. 288.

The coverture is ended and cannot serve to found a new right after its destruction. The existing inchoate right remains because it has already accrued, has not been forfeited by guilt, and does not depend upon the continuance of the marriage relation, but independent of that continuance becomes consummate by the death of him who was the husband when it sprang into being.

For the same reason (that future rights, dependent for their origin on the marriage relation, cannot arise after its dissolution—and which prevents the innocent wife from having dower in her husband's after acquired lands) it follows that she can have no distributive share in his personality. At the date of the decree she has no existing right in his personal estate. That is his. No fraction of it and no lien upon it are hers. He may sell it without her consent, give it away if he pleases, and bequeath it at his own free choice. If it remains his at his death, then the wife, if the marriage relation exists and has not become sundered, becomes "the widow" named in the Statute of Distribution; and at that moment for the first time arises her right in the personal estate dependent upon the existence of the marriage at the husband's death.

Administration is given, first, "to the widow." The law contemplates the possible existence of but one, and makes no provision for a struggle of priority between two or more. To "the widow" is given one third of the personal estate; and all the other provisions, allowing her occupation of her husband's house, and setting apart for her specific articles of household use, indicate the understanding of the Legislature that she only was "the widow" who held to the deceased at the date of his decease the relation of wife. Otherwise the statutes, meant to be both just and generous, become fomenters of discord and plan for bitterness and war.

The divorced wife is not "the widow." She may be the lawful wife of another man and the deceased may have lawfully remarried in another State, or by permission of the court in this; and it would follow, if the appellant is right, that a woman may be a widow although her lawful husband is living, and that an intestate may leave two widows with equal rights to administration and distribution. Suppose that with unusual activity he should leave four, how would each have one third of the personality?

And were the children of any account in the scheme of distribution? In one event "the widow" is entitled to the whole surplus. The appellant's counsel solves the struggle by applying to the later wives, with a sort of grim humor, the maxim caveat emptor; but the suggestion is not quite adequate to unsettle the law and unite at desired points a severed bond.

When the court dissolves the marriage contract at the suit of the innocent wife, it is authorized to decree the payment to her of a suitable allowance. And why is that? If any marital right continues after the divorce, the wife remains entitled to her support and may enforce it in the ordinary way. On the contrary the statute recognizes that when the marriage tie is broken and the relation ended, no future rights will remain to the wife and no future obligations bind the husband which have their root in the marriage relation.

The court is authorized to give by its decree, in the form of an allowance, a just and adequate substitute for the right of the innocent wife which the divorce cuts off and forbids in the future. The tribunal granting the decree investigates the husband's financial condition, takes proof of the value of his property, and then makes a suitable allowance for her life, and so puts the decree and its power in the place and room of what is lost in the future.

If because the wife is innocent the marriage relation in any degree subsists as against the husband, we must confront the anomaly of a contract adjudged to have been dissolved and yet remaining not dissolved as to one of the parties, and read in the decree that both sides are freed from the obligations of the marriage contract when the court pronouncing it knows it to be false, since some obligations of the husband will remain.

The distinction drawn on behalf of the appellant between rights and obligations does not relieve the difficulty, for it is impossible to conceive of a right of the wife which does not impose upon the husband a corresponding obligation. The true theory of the statute is that from the date of the decree, no existing and vested rights are forfeited except by the express mandate of the statute; but since the marriage contract ends and the relation terminates, no future marital right or obligation can arise for or against either. In place of them stands the decree of the court, looking beyond the bond it is about to sever, recognizing the inevitable consequences to follow the uplifted arm and providing for the innocent wife or husband by its own mandate that reparation which, after the decree, is possible from no other source.

Nothing decided in Wait v. Wait, supra, upon which the appellant so much relies, is at all to the contrary. The question there was over the right of the innocent wife to dower in the lands of which her husband was seised before the divorce and, therefore, during coverture. The argument against that right assumed, as not open to contradiction, that the divorce ended the marriage so that none of its future rights or obligations could survive, and then sought to show that the wife's inchoate dower was a mere possibility or expectation, having no tangible existence until in the future following the decree. This court met the argument exactly at that point and asserted as the sufficient answer, what we have already pointed out: that the wife's dower, by the concurrence of marriage and seisin attached to the land as a fixed and vested right not to be shaken off unless by her consent or some declared forfeiture or decree of the sovereign power; and then argued that the dissolution of the marriage operated prospectively only, and so had no retroactive effect upon a right already vested. Observe that the ground taken was not that the marriage relation in any respect survived the divorce. If it had been, the argument founded upon the character of the inchoate dower as a vested right would have been pointless and unmeaning. And while there are in the opinion expressions indicating a belief in some sort of continuance of the marriage relation after the decree, they were unessential to the decision and were not the ground upon which it stood.

The further argument of the appellant rests upon the statute against bigamy and our construction of it in People v. Faber, 92 N. Y. 146.

The statute relating to divorce prohibits the guilty defendant from marrying again, and a clause to that effect is usually inserted in the decree. This was needless and another instance of superfluous care, if the marriage relation survived the divorce as against the guilty party; and the express prohibition is here an argument against that theory of equal character and force with that derived by the appellant from section 48.

But in spite of the prohibition and because the divorced husband no longer had a wife living, it was held in People v. Hovey, 5 Barb. 117, that his after marriage, although punishable as a contempt, did not constitute the crime of bigamy. We overruled that decision, but not at all upon the ground that the divorced wife remained the culprit's wife, in any sense or respect; but for the reason that the statute, by its express words, disclosed an intention to make the crime of bigamy consist not only in marrying a second time while the first wife was living, but in so marrying while under the prohibition of the law, and during the life of the woman who had been the wife before the decree of divorce. We construed these specific words as intended to force such a case into the meaning of the statute which without them would not at all have embraced it, and without them they would have led us to affirm People v. Hovey. Surely nothing was further from our thoughts and from the careful reasoning of the opinion than an idea that the divorced wife remained a wife, as to the defendant, and that he was a bigamist for that reason. We held him to be such because the statute put him "in the situation" of one having a wife living, "for the purpose" of enforcing the statutory provision.

The recent legislation which permits a divorced husband, prohibited from remarrying, to do so after five years and with the consent of the court, and the class of cases which affirm the validity of such second marriage in another State over whose boundaries our own prohibition does not extend, are alike inconsistent with any doctrine which makes the marriage relation as to either of the parties remain in existence after the dissolution of the contract and the severance of the bonds. With the exception of a single case in the supreme court, itself overruled, the statutes and decisions are in entire harmony with the practice and the rule which has so long prevailed. We are of opinion that it should not be changed.

The judgment should be affirmed with costs.

George SELDEN et al., Appts.

Statements by the owner of a mortgage, as to a third person's being authorized to receive payments thereon for him, not made to the party liable on the mortgage and not made to be communicated to him or to influence his conduct, will not estop the owner of the mortgage from afterwards denying the authority of such third person to receive payments.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Kings Special Term in favor of plaintiff, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

Memorandum of decision below, 84 Hun, 631.

The title to the mortgage became by assignment vested in plaintiff's intestate; and the title to the lands became vested in defendants. The matter in controversy respected the validity of of an alleged payment made by defendants to one Martin Evans, December 1, 1881, amounting to $1,005.83. Defendants claimed that Evans was plaintiff's agent authorized to receive this payment on account of the mortgage; and that even if he had not actual authority, yet the plaintiff had so conducted herself as to lead the defendants to this belief. The court found the facts adversely to both of these claims and held that the payment was ineffectual, as Evans had no authority to receive it on behalf of plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Estes & Barnard, for appellants:

Where a party has, by his declarations and conduct, induced another to act in a particular manner, he will not afterwards be permitted to deny the truth of his admissions, if the consequences would be to work an injury to such other person.

Mr. Charles J. Patterson, for respondent:

The court has found upon sufficient evidence that Evans had no actual authority to collect anything upon the principal of the mortgage, and that he never had possession of the papers. Under the settled rules applicable to cases of this character these facts are conclusive against the defendant's appeal.

Smith v. Kidd, 68 N. Y. 130; Dunlap's Paley, Agency, p. 274.

What was said to Wyckoff could not in any view create an estoppel in favor of Selden.

A statement can only create an estoppel in favor of the individual to whom it is made.

Mayenborg v. Haynes, 50 N. Y. 675.

To create an estoppel the party must have made a statement which was designed or calculated to mislead another to his injury. The party sought to be estopped must have been guilty either of fraud in willfully misleading, or of negligence in not observing that his words would mislead the other.

Estoppels are strictly construed and the meaning of the words used will not be enlarged by construction to uphold an estoppel in pais.

Herman, Estop. p. 346, § 334.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The execution and validity of the bond and mortgage were admitted; and the first question upon the trial was whether the sum secured by it had been paid. That was determined against the defendants by the trial judge, and his decision is not now controverted. It appeared, however, that the defendants, with intent to have it applied upon the mortgage, delivered money sufficient to make the payment to one Evans, under the belief that he was agent for the plaintiff and authorized to receive it; and the principal point now made is that the evidence required the judge to find from the words and conduct of the plaintiff that she induced the belief upon which the defendants acted and so was estopped from denying that the payment to Evans was, as to the defendants, sufficient to discharge the debt. This too was a question of fact, to be determined by the trial judge; and upon it he found against the defendants.

The general term was of opinion that his conclusion was justified by the case made, and we think the testimony permits no other result. The mortgage was executed in May, 1875, to mature on the 30th of August, 1876, with interest, payable semi-annually; the plaintiff as administratrix became its owner in July, 1876. The defendants resided in Pennsylvania, and before October 28, 1881, bought the premises of one Lyons, subject to the mortgage. Wyckoff Brothers were the agents of Lyons in the fall of 1881, and at his request one of that firm called upon Mrs. Maguire to see if she wanted the principal. "She said she didn't want the principal, she wanted the interest." "I asked her," he says, "if she held the mortgage; she said she did; then I asked her again about the principal and she replied she didn't know much about that; also that she didn't know much about the papers, as Mr. Evans had charge of them."

Asked by defendant's counsel: "When you asked her whether she wanted the principal or not, did she say anything about seeing Evans then, or whether she had got to see him?" he said: "Yes, sir, I stated that she said Evans had charge of matters in regard to receiving and collecting interest, always. In the former part of my statement, I said that she said she didn't want the principal, she wanted the interest. I remember that she said she would have to see Evans about it."

Lyons testified, in substance, that while his wife owned the property, he had a general conversation with the plaintiff, in which she said Evans was her agent, and had her papers, and would act for her. These alleged conversations are denied by Mrs. Maguire. It is quite immaterial to inquire who of these witnesses should be credited.

The trial judge has found that Evans was not in fact the agent of the plaintiff for the purpose of receiving the principal of the mortgage; that he did not have the bond and mortgage, and that the defendants were not misled to the contrary by anything the plaintiff said or did. But however the plaintiff's statements, as testified to by the defendant's witnesses, are interpreted, they cannot help their case. They were not made to the defendants nor were they made to be communicated to them.

It so happened that Wyckoff afterwards was employed by the defendants. That was an accidental circumstance, not anticipated by the plaintiff and not sufficient to give the character of an estoppel to her statements, in favor of the defendants. They were not intended to influence their conduct, and however understood, could not be extended beyond the party to the transaction in relation to which they were made. Mayenborg v. Haynes, 50 N. Y. 675.

They were competent as evidence, but could have no greater effect. Some exceptions have been argued, but they seem to us without merit.

The judgment should be affirmed.

RE WILL OF ELIZA B. BECKETT.

1. Declarations of the maker of a holographic will, made previous to the time of its execution and publication, in conversations with the persons who subsequently witnessed the will, may be admitted to aid in showing a publication within the statutory requirements, where such previous declarations are closely connected with the act of publication by words used by the testator at the time of publication.
2. A devise of "all the money I die possessed of in several banks and bonds" is not void for indefiniteness.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

A PPEAL by Robert C. Walsh and others, next of kin of Eliza B. Beckett, deceased, from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, reversing a decree of the Surrogate's Court of New York County, refusing to admit an alleged last will to probate. Affirmed.

Reported below, 85 Hun, 447.

The decedent was a widow and had an annuity of $12,000 per annum, and a power to dispose, by will or instrument in the nature of a will, of a sum of $25,000 out of her husband's estate. After her death the following was offered by the devisees named therein as her last will and testament:

"October 5, 1881.

My Last Will and Testament:

I leave and bequeath to my niece, Alice McBlair, all the money I die possessed of in several banks and bonds, besides all I bequeathed to her in my former will. I leave $200 to my niece, Ellen Laffan, to use for the purpose I have explained to her in writing, and which she has promised to attend to faithfully. In case of the death of Alice, I desire all I have left to her to be divided equally between all my nieces, excepting $1,000 for the suffering poor to the care of Father Doherty, Holy Innocents Church.

(Signed in the presence of two witnesses.)

Eliza B. Beckett.

Marie Deen,

104 East 54th Street.

Louise De Cassini."

This paper was wholly in the handwriting of the decedent, excepting the signatures of the witnesses.

The heirs at law contested the allowance of this alleged will to probate, on the ground among others of want of publication of the same as required by law. The surrogate refused to admit the alleged will to probate. Devisees appealed to the general term where the decision of the surrogate was reversed. Thereupon contestants appealed to this court.

Mr. Frederick S. Wait, for appellant Ellen Laffan:

There is no sufficient proof of a declaration made at the time by the testator, that the paper in dispute was her will.

A scrap of paper cannot be probated, in the absence of the "former will." A codicil referring to a will operates as a republication; and the two are to be regarded as but one instrument, speaking from the date of the codicil.

Payne v. Payne, 18 Cal. 291; Moore v. White, 6 Johns. Ch. 860; Murray v. Oliver, 6 Ired. Eq. 55; Simmons v. Simmons, 26 Barb. 68, 75; Haven v. Foster, 14 Pick. 540; Negley v. Gard, 20 Ohio, 310; Van Alstyne v. Van Alstyne, 28 N. Y. 375; Hosea v. Jacobs, 93 Mass. 68.

A codicil imports, not a revocation but an addition to or explanation or alteration of a prior will, in reference to some particular; and assumes that in all other particulars the will is to be in full force and effect.

Boyd v. Latham, Busbee, Law (N. C.), 365.

It is an established prima facie rule of construction that an additional legacy, given by a codicil, is attended with the same incidents as the original legacy.

Tilden v. Tilden, 13 Gray, 108; Snow v. Foley, 119 Mass. 102.

The declarations of the decedent, made prior and subsequent to the time of the signing of the paper in dispute, were incompetent as the issue was simply as to the sufficiency of the execution of the paper.

Messrs. Joseph S. Auerbach, Charles Francis Stone and Richard W. Stevenson, for appellants Robert C. Walsh and others:

The statute requires (and no case has in anywise changed the requirement of the statute) that the testator, at the time of subscribing or acknowledging his subscription, shall in the presence of the witnesses declare the instrument so subscribed to be his last will and testament. No former or subsequent declaration is sufficient.

Gilbert v. Knox, 52 N. Y. 125; Woolley v. Woolley, 95 N. Y. 281.

The information should be distinct and unequivocal.

Rutherford v. Rutherford, 1 Denio, 86.

The declaration must be unequivocal.

Lewis v. Lewis, 11 N. Y. 226.

The declaration made by Mrs. Beckett was equivocal and would be satisfied by a deed executed voluntarily. It did not inform the witnesses that it was a will, by excluding every other instrument from the mind. From the expression they did not know that the testator did not suppose the instrument was a deed.

Lewis v. Lewis, 11 N. Y. 227; Ex parte Beers, 2 Bradf. 164.

The fact that the will was holographic makes no difference in this case.

Messrs. Anderson & Mann, for Isabella Walsh and others, appellants:

Referred to the following decisions as to what constitutes a sufficient declaration:

Woolley v. Woolley, 95 N. Y. 281; Seymour v. Van Wyck, 6 N. Y. 120; Mitchell v. Mitchell, 16 Hun, 97; S. C. 77 N. Y. 596; Lewis v. Lewis,

The issue in this case is as to the proper execution of the codicil. The declarations of Mrs. Beckett, whether written or verbal, are not competent evidence on this issue.

Waterman v. Whitney, 11 N. Y. 157; Johnson v. Hicks, 1 Lans. 150; Marx v. McGlynn, 4 Redf. 455.

It is not important that the witnesses should subscribe in presence of each other. It is enough that each subscribe in the presence of and at the request of the testatrix.

Hoystradt v. Kingman, 22 N. Y. 372; Willis v. Mott, 86 N. Y. 492.

A literal compliance with the provisions of the statute is not required. A substantial observance of them will be regarded as sufficient.

The testatrix need not in words declare the instrument to be her will; but it is enough if by words or acts she makes the fact known to the witnesses, and they sign at her request.

In Van Hooser v. Van Hooser, 1 Redf. 371, it was held that if the witnesses knew that the paper was the testator's last will and testament, from the communications made to them by him or in his presence, it is sufficient.

In Simmons v. Simmons, 26 Barb. 77, it was held that the substance of the testator's intention is to govern.

In Vaughan v. Burford, 3 Bradf. 78, the will was in three lines, drawn by a witness, and read over to the testator and not a word said.

In Re Pepoon, 91 N. Y. 260, probate of the will was sustained where it was evidently intended as a legal and valid declaration of the intention of the testator, although the witnesses to it did not by their evidence fully establish that the statutory requirements were complied with.

See also Rugg v. Rugg, 88 N. Y. 592; Re Keltum, 52 N. Y. 517.

In Von Hoffman v. Ward, 4 Redf. 244, a will was held properly published and executed where all that the testator said when the will was read over was: "Evidently I give all I possess to my mother." There was no evidence of any declaration of its being a will made by the testator to the witnesses. It was very brief and executed within a few hours of the testator's death and not prepared by him or by his special directions.

In Nipper v. Groesbeck, 22 Barb. 670, the testator said: "Bring me the will and I will write my name;" and this was held a publication.

The will being entirely in the handwriting of Mrs. Beckett is of itself a declaration by her that it is her last will and testament.

Gombault v. Public Administrator, 4 Bradf. 226; Ray v. Walton, 2 A. K. Marsh. 71.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence in this case establishes that both of the subscribing witnesses understood from the words and acts of the testatrix, uttered and done at the execution of the will, that she knew the paper she was signing to be testamentary and desired them to act as witnesses thereto. Miss Deen swears that she knew the paper to be a will from the words addressed to her by the testatrix, and similar means of knowledge attached to the language in which she requested the signature of Miss De Cassini.

It is entirely certain that the testatrix understood the character of the paper which she executed; that she did exactly what she intended to do and without the possibility of mistake or imposition, for the will was a holograph; in her own handwriting from the declaration "My last will and testament" with which it began to and including the words "Signed in the presence of two witnesses" which immediately preceded her own signature.

While the primary and principal purpose of the statute requiring a publication at the time of the testamentary act was thus nearly secured and the danger of error or fraud reduced to a minimum, its bare possibility remained and the command of the statute still required obedience, since holographic wills are in no manner excepted from its terms. But in such a case criticism of the terms and manner of what is claimed to have been a sufficient publication need not be so close or severe as where the question whether the testatrix knew that she was executing a will depends solely upon the fact of publication.

It has often been held that a substantial compliance with the statute is sufficient. It requires no literal adherence to its own words and phrases, but permits the necessary information to be given in any manner adequate to the desired result. Where the testator cannot speak at all or only with difficulty he may communicate his knowledge by signs or by words to some listeners unintelligible. He must communicate it, however; but if he does that in a manner capable of conveying to the minds of the witnesses his own present consciousness that the paper being executed is a will, that must necessarily be sufficient.

At the time of the execution of the will in controversy the testatrix did not once call it a will but spoke of it as a paper. To a stranger, the expression would fail to indicate what kind of a paper she understood it to be; and if no more than that was communicated to the witnesses it was not sufficient. But to them the indefinite and general expression was made definite and descriptive of a will by her own words connecting the expression with a previous conversation and referring the memory of the witnesses to it.

Miss Deen had been a subscribing witness to an earlier will of the testatrix, which the latter had declared to be such in express terms. The witness knew the relations subsisting between Alice McBlair and the testatrix. While Alice was a niece, she had been brought up from early infancy by Mrs. Beckett as a daughter, and loved and cared for as such. The witness knew also of the illness which had afflicted Alice and, for the time at least, had left her insane. Before Miss Deen was sent for to sign the will she had been told by Mrs. Beckett that the latter desired to make an alteration of the previous paper on account of Alice's sickness. Being sent for by a note she found the testatrix with this will before her. She asked Miss Deen if she would sign that paper on account of Alice's sickness; that she wanted to make alterations of a previous one on that account; and that "she was sorry to trouble me again to sign the paper."

The witness could hardly fail to correctly interpret Mrs. Beckett's meaning. In substance it was that the paper before her was intended as an alteration of a previously executed will, made necessary by the sickness of Alice; and that the signature of the witness was again, for a second time, desired for a similar paper, and in the same capacity as at first. Miss Deen did so understand it. She swears to that explicitly, and explains how and why it was that she knew from the words of the testatrix that the latter understood the testamentary character of the paper being executed.

Substantially the same thing is true of Miss De Cassini except that she was not asked what she understood from the language of the testatrix. At the Grand Union Hotel in New York, the night before starting for Litchfield, Mrs. Beckett told the witness that she was going to make a will; asked Miss De Cassini who she was, to see if she was "reliable;" told her about Alice and that all she had intended to give her; and then asked Miss De Cassini if she would be willing to sign that paper for her. The witness promised. She knew at the end of the conversation that Mrs. Beckett was intending to make a will for the benefit of Alice to which she, Miss De Cassini, had promised to be a witness. She was reminded of that promise soon after, while she was at Litchfield, and told that the case might come into court some day, but she need not be afraid. And finally when the will was ready for execution, testatrix said: "This is the paper I spoke to you about signing."

It is impossible not to see, taking the whole conversation together, that Miss De Cassini must have understood the testatrix to declare that the paper she signed was the will which she had said she intended to make, and to which,

as a witness, she had asked Miss De Cassini to promise her signature.

But it is objected that a declaration dependent upon a previous conversation for its meaning will not answer the requirement of the statute; and that the words of publication must at the time be complete in and of themselves. It may be that an imperfect and indefinite declaration cannot be made sufficient, by proof of a previous conversation not connected with the factum by the words of publication used. But here they were so connected by the very language of the testatrix, at the time of execution. She herself so referred to the previous conversations, so connected them with the paper then present as to make them an essential part of the communication, almost as completely as if she had formally repeated them. Looking at the substance of what occurred, and giving great importance to the fact that the will was a holograph, we are disposed to concur with the general term in holding that due publication was proved.

But there is a further difficulty to be considered: the testatrix had executed a previous will, which has not been found and cannot as yet be produced. No fact in the case points to its destruction by the testatrix, but every circumstance indicates that she never revoked or intended to revoke it. Under her deceased husband's will she had a power of appointment to the extent of $25,000, which she could exercise in favor of her sisters or her nieces; but which, without her testamentary action, would leave that sum a constituent part of her husband's estate. The witness who drew the missing will is quite sure that she exercised that power of appointment, and asserts as the result of his memory that the sisters of the deceased, who are the present contestants, were not named or provided for in the will which he drew.

The will before us provides: "I leave and bequeath to my niece, Alice McBlair, all the money I die possessed of in several banks and bonds, besides all I bequeathed to her in my former will."

It is objected that this bequest is uncertain and indefinite and the property intended cannot be selected out and inventoried. So far as it passes by this will it is capable of identification. It transfers whatever money the testatrix had at her death which was on deposit or stood to her credit in any banks or was invested in and represented by bonds.

That is certain which may be rendered certain; and an inquiry as to her bank accounts and an examination of her securities would disclose what and how much would pass by the will. The added phrase "besides all that I bequeathed to her in my former will" tends to make the bequest independent of and separate from that contained in the former will. The word "besides" means in addition to, over and above, outside of, and separately from, what had been previously given. And the later bequest is so absolute and without condition, so surely intended to stand by itself and dictate its own effect that it may be operative, whether the earlier provision is known or unknown. Re Greig, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 72,

Nor does it alter the case to say that the sisters are thus unprovided for. It is quite doubtful whether the previous will gave them anything; but if it did provide for them out of the $25,000, its loss is alike their misfortune and that of Alice; and the latter should not lose what is given to her for that reason.

But they are not wholly unprovided for. They themselves tell us in their counsel's brief, that Mrs. Beckett had accumulated over $40,000, of which $30,000 was in banks and in bonds, and the balance in the hands of various parties, and in the form of furniture and silver ware. Something like $8,000 or $10,000 is thus apparently left undisposed of for the next of kin, and their struggle here is to secure the whole, at the expense of the manifest and clear intention of the testatrix. We think the effort should not succeed.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur except Miller, J., absent.

Mary B. LYON, Exrx., et al., Appts.,

v.

Charles W. HERSEY et al., Resp'ts.*

The owners of a tract of standing hemlock entered into a contract by which they sold all the hemlock bark growing thereon, the bark to be cut and removed by vendees in quantities not exceeding a certain amount per year, the period being unlimited; the contract, after a description of the premises upon which the bark was grown, read as follows: "Said lots being in the vicinity of Moose River Tannery, said bark to be used in carrying said tannery on;" at the time of making the contract vendors were owners of said tannery, but subsequently it was conveyed to the vendees of the bark, and thereafter was accidentally destroyed. Held, that the clause "said bark to be used in carrying said tannery on," was neither an exception, reservation, condition nor limitation, and that the destruction of the tannery did not, as matter of law, annul the contract so as to entitle the vendors to retain the bark then uncut or to recover possession of that cut by the vendees under the contract but not removed.

APPPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Lewis Special Term in favor of defendants in a suit to have a contract declared ended, which authorized the cutting of hemlock bark from the land of plaintiffs' testator. Affirmed.

Memorandum of decision below, 35 Hun, 663. The facts and questions raised are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. D. Adams, for appellants:

This action is brought by the owners of the land. They assume, under the power of the sale in the will, that the executors could sell bark on the tree. They insist that the expression in the contract "said bark" "from Brantingham lots" "to be used there in carrying said tannery on" is a limitation and not a condition, for the executors could not make a condition under the power, as owners might.

Gerard, Titles, 2d ed. p. 124.

The suit is to declare the contract at an end by force of the limitation, and terminated May 15, 1883, when the Moose River Tannery was destroyed; also for an injunction.

44 N. Y. 489; 70 N. Y. 247.

It is a proper action for this relief.

Willard, Eq. Jur. 303; 73 N. Y. 516-524.

If the executors had given a deed of this bark, using the same language, no effect could be given to the language except as a limitation. The executors, under the power could not make a valid condition subsequent, in favor of the owners. Effect must be given to the restriction as a limitation, or not at all.

Gerard, Titles, 2d ed. p. 124.

For the doctrine of limitations and conditions, see Id. 102, 520; 4 Kent, Com. *126, 127; 9 N. Y. 35; 44 N. Y. 489; 70 N. Y. 247; 18 Pick. 527.

As to such a cause of action as this, the grounds of it and the relief given, see 18 Ves., 184; 6 Johns. Ch. 497; 2 Story, Eq. 929; 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 266, followed in 24 Hun, 384; High. Inj. 1st ed. § 727.

Defendants cannot use this bark at the new tannery upon the ground that it is not very far from the old one, nor can they substitute the new for the old. In attempting to do so they are wrong doers.

Thomas v. Oakley, 18 Ves. 184. See 6 Johns. Ch. 497; 2 Story, Eq. § 929.

An injunction is now granted in all cases of timber, coals, ores and quarries, where the party is a mere trespasser; or where he exceeds the limited rights with which he is clothed.

18 Ves. 184; 6 Johns. Ch. 497; 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 266, 269.

All the above cases hold that defendant was a trespasser and wrong doer, in acting beyond the provisions of the contract. As such wrong doers the defendants in this action are liable for the value of the peeled bark on the premises when this action was begun.

3 N. Y. 379; 14 Barb. 638; 2 Abb. N. Y. Dig. p. 516, 295; 9 Hun, 571.

There is no analogy between this contract and deeds of water power which refer to machinery to measure the quantity of power intended to be conveyed.

Groat v. Moak, 94 N. Y. 115.

Mr. Francis Kernan, for respondents:

The contract does not limit the use of the bark to carrying on the tanning business in the old tannery building. If that building is destroyed, the bark may be used in carrying on the tanning business in another tannery building owned by the holders of the contract, and situated in the same place or village, and on the same side of the river as the old.

2 Kent, Com. Marg. p. 556; Cromwell v. Sedden, 3 N. Y. 253; Wakely v. Davidson, 26 N. Y. 394.

The intent of the parties to a contract is to be ascertained not only by the language employed, but by the surrounding circumstances and the subject matter; and the intent as thus ascertained is to prevail.

*See S. C. ante, 126. Decision in relation to damages on injunction.

The decision and reasoning of the court in analogous cases proves that the construction of the contract claimed by plaintiffs is not correct and that ours is correct.

The case cited from 18 Vesey, and mainly relied upon by the counsel for the plaintiffs in the court below, is plainly distinguishable from the case under consideration. In that case the defendant had a right to quarry and take stone from plaintiff's land "for all the purposes of Newton farm." He supplied all the purposes of Newton farm, and was taking stone also for other purposes.

See Thomas v. Oakley, 18 Ves. 184.

Euger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint in this action was framed to procure a decree annulling an executory contract between certain of the plaintiffs as executors of the estate of Lyman R. Lyon, vendors, and the firm of C. J. Lyon as vendees, for the sale of the hemlock bark on the Brantingham Tract in Lewis County; and to determine the ownership of that portion of such bark as was then cut, but not removed from the premises.

The action is based upon the claim that the destruction of the Moose River Tannery rendered the performance by the vendees of an alleged implied agreement to use it therein impossible, and therefore that the title to such bark as then remained unused reverted to the owners of the land. The question arises under a clause in the contract following the description of the premises upon which the bark was grown reading as follows: "Said lots being in the vicinity of Moose River Tannery, said bark to be used there in carrying said tannery on."

At the date of the contract in January, 1871, some of the plaintiffs were the owners as trustees under the will of Lyman R. Lyon, of an undivided three eighths of said tannery; and Chester J. Lyon, also an executor, was the owner of the remaining five eighths; the whole consisting of a tannery and about 1,000 acres of land.

The said executors were also trustees with power of sale, under the will of Lyman R. Lyon, of the Brantingham Tract upon which there was then growing about 80,000 cords of bark. The contract provided, among other things, that "For the aforesaid bark on the tree, second parties agree to pay first parties fifty cents per cord; said bark to be paid for before removal from the land, unless otherwise satisfactorily arranged, and to remain the property of the estate until paid for." "The second party are not to cut more than 3,000 cords on the Brantingham Tract, per year," and are "to have the right and privilege to enter upon said lands to fell and cure said bark and remove the same, as is usually done by tanners."

entered upon the performance of the contract and by themselves and their assignees continued to cut, peel and draw away bark in each year for use in the Moose River Tannery, until May 15, 1883, when the tannery building was accidentally destroyed by fire. There then remained about 6,000 cords of bark uncut on the described premises. On June 12, 1883, the plaintiffs served a written notice upon the defendants claiming the right to terminate the contract by reason of the destruction of such tannery.

The customary period for cutting bark extends from June 1, to August 1, in each year, after which it is piled in the forest for airing and remains there until snow falls, when it is drawn to market for use the following season. If kept over the season its strength deteriorates and its value becomes diminished. It was customary for parties buying bark to make contracts for cutting and piling it as early as April or May, and in the present case it was proved that the defendants had entered into such contract at that time. They had thus, in good faith, incurred a large liability in the performance of their obligation to buy the bark before any question arose as to their right to cut and carry it away. The work of stripping the bark in question commenced about the first of June and had continued nearly two weeks before the vendors attempted either to put an end to the contract or to repossess themselves of the bark cut. On the first of August upwards of 2,500 cords of bark had been cut and piled upon the ground ready for the curing process, at an expense to the vendees of several thousand dollars.

In the year 1879, by virtue of a sale in partition of the Moose River Tannery property, the interest of the plaintiffs therein had become divested, and the defendants, or some of them as purchasers on such sale became the owners thereof and have ever since retained such ownership. The defendants, or some of them, also became the owners in 1879 of a large tract of land with a tannery thereon adjoining the Moose River Tannery property, and prosecuted the business of tanning in both of said tanneries up to the time of the destruction of the latter tannery.

Previous to the commencement of this action the defendants had claimed that the destruction of the Moose River Tannery did not annul their contract and that they had the right under it to cut bark on the Brantingham tract, for use in other places than the Moose River Tannery. The plaintiffs, on the contrary, claimed that the destruction of the tannery ipso facto annulled the contract and that thereby they became entitled to annul the contract and retain the title and possession of all bark uncut and recover possession of such as remained unremoved therefrom; and the logical effect of their contention would include all bark unused which had been previously paid for and removed from the premises by the vendees.

In discussing the questions presented it will tend to obviate the confusion produced by some misleading analogies, if we eliminate therefrom the consideration of the cases cited relating to exceptions and reservations in conveyances, since for obvious and well recognized reasons the language of this contract creates neither of those forms of estates. Craig v. Wells, 11 N. Y. 815,

The appellants' claim, if at all tenable, can be supported only by demonstrating that the clause in question created either a condition or a limitation.

We do not consider it very material whether it is one or the other, since if either it would terminate the defendants' interest, and the same result would be attained. If a condition, it must necessarily be a condition subsequent, for it could be called into operation after the possession and title of the property had changed and a diversion of its use by its vendees to a prohibited purpose had been attempted. Bouv. Inst. § 743.

Counsel on the argument upon both sides treated the provision as creating a limitation alone; but we are unable to agree with them and can see in it none of the qualities of such an estate.

The difference between a limitation and a condition is defined to be that in order to defeat the estate in the latter case it requires some act to be done, such as making an entry, to effect it; while in the former the happening of the event is in itself the limit beyond which the estate no longer exists, but it is determined by the operation of the law without requiring any act to be done by anyone. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 20.

It is also said that a condition brings the estate back to the grantor or his heirs; a conditional limitation carries it over to a stranger. The grantor or his heirs alone having the right to defeat the estate by entry for condition broken, a condition terminates an estate; a limitation creates a new one. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 22.

The attempt is here made, after an absolute grant of the bark, to cause the remaining bark to revert to the owners of the land in accordance with the rule governing broken conditions, instead of carrying it over to the new estate as a limitation requires. Even if such a rule could be applied, it would affect only so much of the property as was used in violation of the condition, and could not relate to that which had not been taken in possession and the right to which still rested in covenant. It is unnecessary, however, to pursue the distinctions and analogies between these different estates, as we are of the opinion that there is here neither condition nor limitation.

In the construction of all contracts under which forfeitures are claimed, it is the duty of the court to interpret them strictly in order to avoid such a result, for a forfeiture is not favored in the law. Bouv. Inst. §§ 730, 1814; Duryea v. Mayor, 62 N. Y. 594; Lorillard v. Silzer, 86 N. Y. 578.

While no particular form of words is necessary to create a limitation or condition, it is yet essential that the intention to create them shall be clearly expressed in some words importing ex vi termini that the vesting or continuance of the estate or interest is to depend upon a contingency provided for. Craig v. Wells, 11 N. Y. 315; Bouv. Inst. § 753.

It will be observed that there are in this contract no express words importing a limitation or condition; and if it is held to contain either, it must be inferred from some supposed intention of the parties drawn from other provisions in the contract, or from the nature of the act provided for, or the circumstances surrounding the subject of the agreement. These are all legitimate sources of information from which to derive an understanding as to the intent of the parties and may properly be resorted to for that purpose. Barruso v. Madan, 2 Johns. 145; Cunningham v. Morrell, 10 Johns. 208.

It is also said that the ordinary technical words by which a limitation is expressed relate to time, and are durante, dum, donec, etc.; but that the use of any of these terms, ordinarily expressive of a condition or a limitation would be an unsafe test of the true nature of the estate. The word "proviso" or "provided" itself may sometimes be taken as a condition, sometimes as a limitation and sometimes as a covenant. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 21.

It would seem to be quite clear that the object designed to be secured by the insertion of the clause in question was to provide for the continuous employment of the tannery in the business of tanning, and was adopted mainly if not altogether for the benefit of the vendors or the owners of the tannery property. No limit is assigned for the duration of the estate or the quantity sold. It is all of the bark in the Brantingham Tract, to be taken in quantities not exceeding 8,000 cords per year.

The period during which the right was to extend was unlimited and would not be less than ten years, and might be extended for an indefinite term. The vendors were the owners of a large interest in the tannery property, and had a material interest in giving it continuous employment, and thus adding to its value; while the vendees would not seem to have any object in restricting their own control over the property purchased.

We cannot therefore assent to the interpretation that the object of the parties would be satisfied by the use of the bark in the vicinity of the tannery referred to. The real question, therefore, is whether that object was intended to be secured by a limitation or by a covenant.

The language of the contract is: "said bark to be used there in carrying said tannery on." If any contingency is here expressed as one upon which a right depends, it cannot be one other than a use contrary to the one pointed out. The plaintiff has assumed that the destruction of the tannery, as matter of law, rendered the use of the bark therein impossible, and therefore ipso facto terminated the defendants' rights under the contract.

This contention cannot be sustained. There is nothing in the case to show that the defendants did not intend to rebuild the tannery; and nothing to preclude them from doing so and using the bark in the renovated structure. An interpretation which should confine the use of the bark to the particular building existing in 1871 would be unreasonable and motiveless, as no object of the vendors could be served by such a use which would not be equally promoted by its employment in another building of similar capacity in the same location.

Neither did the expressed intention of the vendees to use the bark in another locality set in operation the limitation, if one existed, or authorize the vendors to consider the contract at an end. In order to have such an effect, the notice must be of an intention not to perform some act amounting to a condition precedent; and this we have seen is not such a condition.

Bogardus v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co. 101 N. Y. 323 [S. C. 2 Cent. Rep. 150].

We therefore return to a consideration of the event, if any, which the parties had in mind as a limitation in framing their contract. As we have said, there is nothing indicating an intention to limit the duration of the estate or the quantity sold, the words importing simply a restriction of the use to be made of the bark. The language imports that its actual use at a place other than the one prescribed should be the event upon which the claim in question should have its operation; and there is nothing in the circumstances of the case tending to show any other intention. Such a use would necessarily destroy the subject of the contract or deprive it of its merchantable value, and render its ownership after that event a matter of no importance.

It cannot therefore be reasonably contended that such a contingency would be regarded by its vendors as a desirable occasion for its reclamation or the right of its possession after that time as a profitable thing to be secured. Long before this contingency could occur it was provided that the vendees should pay for the bark and become entitled to its ownership and possession; and there is nothing in the language of the contract or the circumstances of the case to show that the vendors entertained any expectation that their interest in the property would survive the transfer of the title. The contract provided for the sale of all the bark on the Brantingham Tract; and express provision is made for the retention of the title and possession, as security for the purchase price; but no language indicates an intention to reserve it for any other purpose.

The pecuniary interest of the vendors in the improved property was slight as compared with that of the vendees; and in the absence of language plainly expressing such an intention, it is not reasonable to impute to them a design to subject it to a forfeiture, after it had been made valuable almost wholly by their expenditures upon it.

Neither can it be reasonably claimed that the parties contemplated that bark cut, paid for and drawn to the tannery in strict conformity to the contract, before its destruction, should by that event be forfeited to the vendors, however great the lapse of time which should follow thereafter.

In view of all the circumstances we must, therefore, hold that the parties intended by the clause in question only such security as a covenant afforded for the performance of the stipulation in question.

The case of Thomas v. Oakley, 18 Ves. 184, cited by the plaintiffs, has no application. There the owner of a quarry sold so much of the stone therefrom as was needed for "all the purposes of Newton Farm." This language is descriptive merely and constitutes the only definition of the property intended to be sold; and it was properly held that the vendees acquired no right to stone to be used for other purposes than Newton Farm.

In the present case, however, the right to take all of the bark on the Brantingham Tract was contracted for, and the only limitation of quantity was that contained in the proviso restraining the right to peel to 3,000 cords a year.

Groat v. Moak, 94 N. Y. 115, was a case arising under a reservation in a grant of water power, and is obviously inapplicable to this case.

The case of Craig v. Wells, 11 N. Y. 315, 322, seems to us quite decisive of the questions raised here. There a water power was granted, with a prohibition against its use for any other purpose than certain uses specified in the deed. It was held that the language of the grant did not constitute either a condition, limitation, reservation or exception; although if construed in connection with certain bonds executed therewith it was said that a covenant might be implied from a consideration of the several instruments simultaneously executed. Selden, J., says in relation to the language then under consideration, that "It is a mere limitation of the use which the grantee shall make of the thing granted; a naked prohibition. No right to the use of the water is saved to the grantor. This prohibition is inconsistent with the title conveyed by the deed and is clearly void. If one conveys land in fee simple, and neither excepts any part, nor reserves anything to himself out of it, but restricts the grantee to a particular use of the land, this restriction is void, as repugnant to the proprietary rights of an owner in fee. Such a restriction may be imposed and would be good as a condition or a covenant, but in no other form." See also Congregation Shaaer Hash Moin v. Halliday, 50 N. Y. 664.

It is claimed by the respondents that the subsequent acquisition of the Moose River Tannery by the vendees in the contract deprived the plaintiffs of any interest in the performance of the stipulation in question, and amounted to a surrender of their right to insist upon its performance. We think, however, that a subsequent change in the condition of the parties did not reflect any light upon the intention existing in regard to it at the time of its execution, and therefore has no bearing upon its interpretation. If the clause in question be regarded as a covenant, such change might affect the damages, if any, recoverable for a breach thereof; but in the absence of an express agreement to affect, a modification would not have any other effect.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Elizabeth HERDTFELDER et al., Respts.

1. One who, in a suit brought after a decedent's death to foreclose a mortgage made by decedent in his lifetime, has obtained a judgment for deficiency against decedent's executors, in their representative capacity, cannot maintain an action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of real estate made by decedent in his lifetime and to subject such real estate to his judgment for deficiency.
2. The reclamation of real estate conveyed by a decedent in his lifetime in fraud of creditors, and its sale for payment of his debts, must be accomplished in the statutory method by the decedent's executors, whose action may be compelled by the surrogate; and this, although one of the executors is the grantee in the fraudulent conveyance.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York Special Term dismissing the complaint in an action to set aside certain conveyances as fraudulent. Affirmed.

Reported below, 33 Hun, 57.

Statement by Earl, J.,

The complaint in this action shows the following facts: in 1873 George Herdtfelder, for the purpose of securing the payment of $4,000 with interest, executed and delivered to the plaintiff his bond, and as collateral thereto a mortgage upon real estate, executed by himself and the defendant Elizabeth, his wife. Subsequently, in the years 1874 and 1875, Herdtfelder and wife conveyed certain real estate by several deeds to the defendant Heinlin and certain other real estate by several deeds to the defendant Kreuder; and subsequently in the lifetime of Herdtfelder, Heinlin and Kreuder by several deeds conveyed the same real estate to the defendant Elizabeth, and all these conveyances were without consideration and made with intent to hinder, delay and defraud the creditors of George Herdtfelder. He died September 21, 1876, leaving a last will and testament, in which he nominated his wife and Frederick Pink and Charles T. Stephan as executors. The will was admitted to probate and the three executors named duly qualified as such and took upon themselves the duties of executors.

Thereafter in April, 1877, the plaintiff commenced an action to foreclose his mortgage, in which the executors and others were made defendants. There was a judgment of foreclosure and a sale and a deficiency of $3,126.96, for which a judgment was entered and docketed against the executors. In September, 1878, the executors made their final accounting in the surrogate's court, in which the plaintiff's claim upon his judgment was admitted. The whole value of the estate in the hands of the executors was the sum of $528.45, which was wholly inadequate for the payment of the debts of the testator.

This action was commenced on the 29th day of January, 1879, against Elizabeth Herdtfelder, Heinlin and Kreuder; and the judgment prayed for in the complaint is that the several conveyances above mentioned be adjudged fraudulent and void as to the plaintiff, and that a receiver be appointed to sell the real estate conveyed or so much thereof as may be sufficient to satisfy plaintiff's judgment.

The defendants Elizabeth and Heinlin appeared and answered, putting in issue the allegations of fraud. The defendant Kreuder did not answer.

The action was brought to trial at a special term and before any evidence was given, the counsel for the defendants moved to dismiss the complaint, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and the court granted the motion and gave judgment to the defendants dismissing the complaint. From that judgment the plaintiff appealed to the general term, and from affirmation there to this court.

Messrs. Coudert Brothers and Paul Fuller, for appellant:

The creditors' judgment, being against executors, was a sufficient basis for the action without any execution. In the present case, there was no judgment recovered against the debtor before his death, as was the case in Adsit v. Butler, 87 N. Y. 585; nor was there an absence of any judgment at all, as in Allyn v. Thurston, 53 N. Y. 622; Estes v. Wilcox, 67 N. Y. 264.

Where a judgment has been recovered against the debtor who thereafter dies, execution may be issued against his estate by leave of the court and of the surrogate.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1890, 1881.

Therefore the courts hold the plaintiff not excused from issuing it.

Adsit v. Sanford, 23 Hun, 49; affd. in 87 N. Y. 585; Schmitz v. Langhaar, 88 N. Y. 511-512.

Where the levy cannot be made it is excused. Stewart v. Beale, 7 Hun, 421; Estes v. Wilcox, 67 N. Y. 266.

In the present instance, although it is true that the deficiency judgment did not create a lien on the property of the deceased, yet the filing of this bill in equity and of the notice of lis pendens did create such a lien.

Ocean Nat. Bank v. Olcott, 46 N. Y. 19, 22; Beck v. Burdett, 1 Paige, 308.

By this equity action the creditor perfects his lien and is placed within the requirements of Southard v. Benner, 72 N. Y. 426, to wit: he is in a situation to subject the property to the payment of his judgment, upon the removal of the obstacle by the judgment prayed for in the bill.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1823.

A decree that the deficiency be paid out of the estate in their hands in due course of administration was the only judgment that could be had against the executors.

Glacius v. Fogel, 88 N. Y. 440; Leonard v. Morris, 9 Paige, 90.

And a judgment so rendered in a foreclosure suit against the executors of a deceased mortgagor is "a final adjudication between the parties, by a competent tribunal, as to their rights, conclusive in another court."

Glacius v. Fogel, supra.

No other judgment could be rendered, the mortgagor having died before the mortgage became due.

Glacius v. Fogel, 88 N. Y. 439; Leonard v. Morris, 9 Paige, 91, 92.

No other judgment being possible, equity will not leave the creditor powerless, and the action will be maintained.

Geery v. Geery, 63 N. Y. 256; Babcock v. Booth, 2 Hill, 183.

Equity recognizes such an action as the present as virtually auxiliary to administration in the surrogate's court, the fact being evident that the relief sought could not be had in such court.

Chipman v. Montgomery, 63 N. Y. 221.

No authority to sue was necessary. The present action was brought in January, 1879, while section 1628 of the Code, under which the special term dismissed the action, did not take effect until September 1, 1880.

See Code, § 3356.

Moreover, section 1628 is not applicable to an equitable suit like the present; it merely forbids another action at law, to recover a debt which can be recovered in an action of foreclosure.

Equitable, etc. Society v. Stevens, 63 N. Y. 844; Scotfield v. Doscher, 72 N. Y. 498; Vanderbilt v. Schreyer, 91 N. Y. 396.

The action was properly brought by the creditor and not by the executor, under the Statute of 1858.

Mr. Isaac Kugelman, for respondents:

The judgment set forth in the plaintiff's complaint is a part of a mortgage debt; and this action cannot be maintained without leave of the court in which the foreclosure action was pending.

Code, § 1628.

This is not only the rule as established by the Code, but was the law before.

2 R. S. 199, § 153.

The want of authority to sue is not a defense necessary to be pleaded and proved affirmatively by the defendant; but on the other hand, the fact that leave to sue was granted must be alleged.

Scotfield v. Doscher, 72 N. Y. 491.

A judgment against executors or administrators of a deceased party is not binding upon nor does it in any way affect the real estate of the decedent; nor can such real estate be sold by virtue of any execution issued upon such judgment.

2 R. S. 6th ed. p. 733, § 12; Code Civ. Proc. § 1823. See Osgood v. Manhattan Co. 8 Cow. 612; Sparkler v. Davis, 8 Cow. 132; Baker v. Kingsland, 10 Paige, 366, 368.

Until the creditor has obtained a judgment at law for his demand against the debtor, and the return of an execution unsatisfied, an action in equity cannot be maintained to set aside conveyances as fraudulent and void.

Dunlery v. Tallmadge, 32 N. Y. 457; Beardsley Scythe Co. v. Foster, 36 N. Y. 561. See also Allyn v. Thurston, 53 N. Y. 622; Estes v. Wilcox, 67 N. Y. 264; Adee v. Bigler, 81 N. As against Mrs. Herdtfelder, the grantee in the conveyance sought to be set aside, and the children of George Herdtfelder, the plaintiff is only a contract, not a judgment creditor.

Laws 1887, chap. 460, § 72.

Chapter 172 of the Laws of 1843, amending the Act of 1837, makes the judgment against the executors prima facie evidence of the debt before the surrogate, on an application to sell the decedent's estate for the payment of his debts.

Judge Folger in Sharpe v. Freeman, 45 N. Y.

802, in commenting upon these statutes, so far as the effect of a judgment against the executors, says: "This still excludes the idea that it is evidence in any other court, or that the debt is yet a judgment debt." "It excludes the idea that the judgment is evidence against the heir at law, or that the claim assumes the character of a judgment debt."

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the opinion of the judge who presided at the special term that he gave judgment against the plaintiff, for the reason that he had not obtained leave to sue under section 1628 of the Code. At the general term, as appears from the opinion there pronounced, the judgment was affirmed because no execution had been issued upon plaintiff's judgment.

We think this action is without precedent and that the judgment should be affirmed, but not for the precise reasons stated in the courts below.

Plaintiff's judgment was obtained subsequently to the death of the testator, in an action against his executors in their representative capacity, and did not become a lien upon any real estate left by him; and no execution could be issued thereon against any real estate. It was provided in the Revised Statutes (2 R. S. 449, § 12) that "The real estate which belonged to any deceased person shall not be bound or in any way affected by any judgment against his executors or administrators; nor shall it be liable to be sold by virtue of any execution issued upon such judgment; and subsequently the same provisions were incorporated in the Code, § 1823.

Executions authorized by 2 R. S. 88, § 28, and by the Code, §§ 1825, 1826, are such only as can be issued against personal assets which are in the possession or under the control of the executors or administrators, and have no relation whatever to real estate.

The conveyances, therefore, which the plaintiff seeks to set aside are no obstruction to any lien he may have, or to the enforcement of any execution which he may be able to issue. If the conveyances should be set aside, he would not be able to sell the real estate by virtue of his judgment or any execution issued thereon; and hence this is a case where he is not entitled to the equitable relief which he seeks. Spring v. Short, 90 N. Y. 538.

If the plaintiff could obtain the judgment which he seeks, it would result that without having any lien upon the real estate he would obtain satisfaction of his claim in preference to the other creditors of the testator. The law gives no preference to a vigilant creditor in the estate of a decedent. It impounds his estate for the benefit of his creditors; and no creditor can by any procedure or any degree of vigilance obtain any preference over others. This scheme of the law would be violated if such an action as this could succeed.

The lands, although conveyed by the testator in his lifetime, were assets which could be appropriated for the payment of his debts. Chap. 314, Laws 1858.

If the facts stated in the complaint are true, it is the duty of the executors to pursue the real estate and reclaim it for the benefit of the persons interested in the estate of the testator; and no one creditor can appropriate it for his sole benefit. Southard v. Benner, 72 N. Y. 424. Spring v. Short, supra; Crouse v. Frothingham, 97 N. Y. 105.

The fact that the fraudulent grantee is one of the executors furnishes no insurmountable obstacle. If she should refuse to restore the lands to the estate, she could be removed from her office of executrix, and then the remaining two executors could, under the Act of 1858, disaffirm the conveyances of the real estate and bring an action to set them aside. Or the two executors could commence the action, making the executrix a defendant, and in such action obtain for the estate the relief demanded. If the two defendants refused to commence the action upon the application of the creditors or some of them, they could be compelled to commence it by an order of the surrogate, who has ample power to that end under section 2481 of the Code.

Here it does not appear that any application was made to the surrogate, or to the two executors; and there is no reason whatever for not pursuing the orderly method pointed out by the statute, for the reclamation of this real estate and its sale, for the payment of the debts of the testator.

We are, therefore, of opinion that there is no basis for the maintenance of this action, and that the judgment should be affirmed, but without costs.

All concur except Miller, J., absent.

WHITNEY MARBLE CO., Respt.

1. In an action for damages for death caused by the explosion of a boiler owned by defendant, which was at the time in the charge of the vendor thereof for the purpose of being repaired by it on its own account, it being claimed by plaintiff that the explosion resulted from the negligence of a servant of defendant, assisting vendor's servants (of whom deceased was one) in testing the repairs, held, on the facts:
 - (a) That in the absence of proof on the part of plaintiff, it must be presumed that defendant's servant either volunteered to aid vendor's servants, or was requested by them to do so; in either event he was not the servant of defendant in what he did, and defendant was not responsible for his acts.
 - (b) That defendant's servant was not guilty of negligence.
 - (c) That no responsibility was cast upon defendant if the accident occurred from any defect in the boiler which employer of deceased was bound to repair.
2. It is not sufficient, after an accident, to show that the acts of one charged with negligence were improper and caused the accident; but plaintiff must show that such person knew or had reason to know that the acts were improper and dangerous.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of nonsuit of the Jefferson Circuit Court in an action to recover damages for the negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Memorandum of decision below, 36 Hun, 640.

Messrs. O'Brien, Emerson & Ward, for appellant:

In determining the correctness of a nonsuit the following rules are to be observed: 1. That the plaintiff is entitled to the most favorable inferences from the evidence, and that all contested facts are to be deemed established in plaintiff's favor. 2. Where, from the circumstances shown, inferences are to be drawn which are not certain and incontrovertible or as to which persons might differ, it is for the jury to decide.

The action is not based upon contract but is founded in tort and arises out of a violation of the duty of every man to so manage his property as to inflict no unnecessary damage upon his neighbor.

The boilers in question were the property of defendant. There is no evidence that the sale was a conditional one or that any right was reserved by defendant to reject or return them, and no pretense that defendant claimed any such right.

Nash v. Weaver, 23 Hun, 516; Morey v. Medbury, 10 Hun, 540; Bacon v. Gilman, 57 N. Y. 656; Smith v. Edwards, 29 Hun, 493; Hurd v. Cook, 75 N. Y. 454; Groat v. Gile, 51 N. Y. 431.

The fact that the Watertown Steam Engine Company had guaranteed the boilers to be good and sent men to repair them for that reason made no difference with the title.

Coughtry v. Globe Woolen Co. 56 N. Y. 124; Declin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470.

The trial court nonsuited the plaintiff solely upon the ground that the evidence did not show that the boilers were in charge of defendant. This court cannot uphold the nonsuit upon other grounds than those specified by the trial court.

As the deceased was not a coservant of Newcombe, the defendant was liable for any injuries sustained through his negligence; and this notwithstanding the servant may have acted contrary to his directions and was guilty of a violation of his duty, as long as he is acting within the scope of his employment.

If a servant is directed to test a boiler at 150 pounds and carelessly tests it at 200 the master is liable for injuries sustained thereby.

Ochsenbein v. Shapley, 85 N. Y. 214.

That the servant's act was not contemplated by the master is no excuse from liability.

Lynch v. Met. El. R. Co. 24 Hun, 506.

The master is responsible for injuries caused by the negligence of his servants within the general scope of their employment, notwithstanding the negligent acts are wanton and even willful. In an action against the master the only question is whether the wrongful act was done in the course of the employment or outside of it.

Mott v. Consumers Ice Co. 78 N. Y. 548; Rounds v. Del. Lack. etc. R. R. Co. 65 N. Y. 129; Jackson v. 2d Av. R. R. Co. 47 N. Y. 274. See also, Coughty v. Globe Woolen Co. 56 N. Y. 124; Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470.

Where an accident is of such a nature that it could not usually, or according to the ordinary course of things, happen without the want of proper care, negligence is presumed and the burden is cast upon defendant to relieve itself of that presumption.

Accordingly, it has been repeatedly held that as steam boilers do not when properly managed usually or ordinarily explode, the fact of such an explosion is presumptive evidence of negligence, and the burden is cast upon the owner of removing the presumption.

Caldwell v. N. J. Steamboat Co. 47 N. Y. 282, 293; S. C. 56 Barb. 425; Roe v. Stevens, etc. Trans. Co. 21 Am. Law Reg. 522; Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Phillips, 55 Ill. 194; Peoria R. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 88 Ill. 418; Fay v. Davidson, 13 Minn. 528; McMahon v. Davidson, 12 Minn. 357.

As the act of letting in the water or steam which caused the explosion was done by direction of defendant's engineer it bound the defendant.

Gleason v. Amesell, 11 N. Y. Week. Dig. 159; Althoff v. Wolfe, 22 N. Y. 355; Simons v. Monier, 29 Barb. 419.

It was the duty of the engineer to see that a sufficient quantity of water was kept in the boiler, and it was also the duty of defendant to keep the boiler clear of scales and to examine it for that purpose as often as was necessary.

King v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co. 4 Hun, 770; Hawley v. Northern Cent. R. R. Co. 82 N. Y. 370; Vosburg v. Lake Shore, etc. R. R. Co. 94 N. Y. 374; Near v. Del. & Hud. Canal Co. 82 Hun, 557; Durkin v. Sharp, 88 N. Y. 225; Disher v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. R. Co. 12 N. Y. Week. Dig. 277.

It was not necessary that the explosion should have been occasioned by any particular one of these causes. The rule is that where several proximate causes contribute to an accident and each is an efficient cause, without which the accident would not have happened, it may be attributed to all or any of them.

A nonsuit cannot be granted upon the ground of contributory negligence, unless the undisputed facts show the omission or commission of some act the law adjudges negligence. The negligence must appear so clearly that no construction of the evidence or inferences drawn from the facts will warrant a contrary conclusion.

The fact that the deceased was in a proper position, engaged in his work with nothing to indicate that he was in an improper place, or unnecessarily exposed to danger, or did any act to contribute to the accident, is sufficient to sustain a finding that he was not guilty of contributory negligence.

Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470, 475; Smith v. Boston Gaslight Co. 22 Alb. L. J. 396.

Even if there had been no proof whatever, as to whether deceased was or was not guilty of contributory negligence, but simply evidence that he was found dead, it would have been a question for the jury as to whether he exercised proper care and caution.

Dorland v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. R. Co. 19 N. Y. Week. Dig. 76; Haye v. Gallagher, 72 Pa. 186; Hart v. Hudson River Bridge Co. 80 N. Y. 622; Justice v. Lang, 52 N. Y. 323.

The act of Dashno in letting the steam on the south boiler was not, under the circumstances of the case, negligence.

It was the duty of defendant to see that the boilers were kept in a proper condition, and Dashno had the right to assume that this duty had been performed and that the boiler was not overheated and contained a sufficient quantity of water to make the letting in of steam a harmless operation.

Kain v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 375; Fuller v. Jewett, 80 N. Y. 48; Vosburg v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 94 N. Y. 874.

At all events it was a question for the jury as to whether Dashno acted as an ordinary careful and prudent man would under the circumstances. If he did he was not negligent.

Salter v. Utica, etc. R. R. Co. 88 N. Y. 43; Kellogg v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. Co. 79 N. Y. 76; Stuckus v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. Co. 79 N. Y. 468; Unger v. 42d St. R. R. Co. 51 N. Y. 497.

It is sufficient if it appears from the whole case that a party was not chargeable with any want of care.

Moody v. Osgood, 54 N. Y. 488, 496.

There was no privity of contract between Dashno, plaintiff and defendant; and consequently the rule which exempts the master from liabilities for injuries sustained through the negligence of a co-servant has no application.

Farwell v. Boston, etc. R. R. Corp. 4 Met. 49; Perry v. Lansing, 17 Hun. 84.

Dashno is to be regarded as a third person, so far as deceased was concerned. The deceased had no control over him and consequently was not in any way chargeable with his negligence.

To make out a cause of action it was only necessary to allege and prove that the deceased was killed through the negligence of the defendant and its servants.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1902.

This certainly was alleged and proved. The fact that the plaintiff went further than this and alleged other facts not essential to make out a cause of action is of no consequence, so far as defendant is concerned. The recovery was for the same negligent act of the deceased in either case. The defendant was not misled, and at most it was an immaterial variance which the trial court properly disregarded.

The only repairs required or which were made were in the seam which attached the dome to the shell of the boiler, where there was a trifling leakage of steam. Therefore the only risks plaintiff's intestate assumed was such as arose from this particular work. No motion for nonsuit was made upon this ground. If it had been, the defect in the evidence, if any, could have been supplied. For this reason a nonsuit cannot be upheld on appeal, upon grounds not suggested in the court below.

Booth v. Bunce, 81 N. Y. 246, 251; Colleras v. Kennedy, 94 N. Y. 634; Adams v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 70 N. Y. 166; Atkins v. Elwell, 45 N. Y. 758; Murphy v. People, 63 N. Y. 590; *McDonald v. Mr. John Lansing, for respondent:

The defendant, while the plaintiff's intestate was engaged in making the repairs, owed no duty to him, to furnish safe, proper and suitable machinery for the purpose of making such repairs; or skillful, careful and experienced persons to operate the same.

The master is liable to his servant for negligence in the employment of incompetent servants or the furnishing of improper and unsafe machinery.

Wright v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co. 25 N. Y. 562-565, and cases cited.

But such negligence must be proved and knowledge of the defect or insufficiency of the machinery must be brought home to the master, or that he was ignorant of the same through his own neglect.

Wright v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co. 25 N. Y. 562-566, and cases cited.

Without such evidence plaintiff could not recover.

Gibson v. Northern Cent. R. R. Co. 22 Hun. 289, 292.

The boilers were put into the hands of the plaintiff's intestate and his companion Dashno, for the purpose of reparation and not for use as machinery. He assumed the risks incident to such employment.

The mere fact of the explosion is not evidence of negligence; so held in the case of an explosion of a steam boiler in a saw mill.

Young v. Bransford, 12 Lea (Tenn.) 232.

The boiler was in charge of the mechanics, Dashno and the plaintiff's intestate. The defendant could not be negligent in a matter over which it or its agents or servants had no control.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover damages for the death of Joseph Olive, caused by the explosion of a steam boiler owned by the defendant at Gouverneur in this State. The material facts are as follows:

The defendant bought two boilers of the Watertown Steam Engine Company in September or October, 1883. They were placed side by side, to furnish power for the same machinery and were used until May 8, 1884, when the southerly boiler exploded. The vendor guaranteed that the boilers should be good, constructed in first class manner, and of good material. Shortly before the explosion the defendant discovered that there were defects in the boilers and notified the vendor thereof and requested it to repair them. In compliance with this request and to fulfill its contract and guaranty with the defendant, the vendor sent from Watertown one Hislop, the foreman of its boiler shop, and one Dashno, a boiler maker, to make the necessary repairs upon the boilers. They examined them and found that they leaked steam and needed calking and some new rivets and bolts.

Hislop told Dashno what to do and that he should have the boilers fired up and steam on and examine them thoroughly and not leave them until everything was perfect and right. He then returned to Watertown and had some bolts made and sent Olive, a boiler maker who had been in the employ of the vendor for many years, with the bolts to Gouverneur with instructions to aid Dashno in making the repairs, and told him "to help get the rivets driven and see that everything was all right before he came home and left the boilers; to fire the boilers up and test them before he came home and see that everything was all right."

Dashno and Olive went to work upon the boilers and when they had substantially finished one, Newcombe (who was the defendant's engineer and who was also killed by the explosion) put fire under the boilers. It does not appear at whose request he did this. It must be presumed that he did it at the request of the boiler makers, for the purpose of making the tests which they had been instructed to make. The only witness who lived to tell what took place immediately before the explosion detailed a conversation which occurred between Newcombe and Dashno, who was at the time upon the south boiler, as follows: "Dashno asked Newcombe how much steam was on the north boiler. Newcombe said ninety-five pounds. Dashno then said, 'How much on this (the south boiler)?' Newcombe said 'twenty-five pounds.' Dashno then said, 'Open the door in the further (north) boiler.' Newcombe said, 'Let the steam on it' and he would risk it. Dashno then stepped up towards the smoke stack. He hadn't hardly made his move when the explosion came. When Newcombe said let the steam on, Dashno made some objection. He did not want to, and Newcombe told him he would risk it, to let the steam on. The explosion then took place."

N. Y.

The plaintiff claims that Newcombe was both unskillful and careless and that the defendant is responsible for his acts. There was no proof whatever that the defendant had any notice that he was unskillful or that he was in fact unskillful. There is no proof whatever or just inference that he was then acting for the defendant.

The vendor had undertaken on its own account to make these repairs, and then to test the boilers to see if the repairs were adequate; and it must be presumed, in the absence of proof on the part of the plaintiff, who has the burden of establishing her case, that Newcombe either volunteered to aid the boiler makers or was requested by them to aid in making the tests. In either event he was not the servant of the defendant in what he did, and it did not become responsible for his acts.

But we should reach the same conclusion on this branch of the case, if we assumed that Newcombe was the servant of the defendant in what he did, as there is no sufficient evidence and no just inference of any carelessness on his part. The proof does not show with any certainty what caused the explosion. No experts were called upon the subject. It was probably caused by letting steam or cold water into the boiler. But even if it was thus caused it does not follow that Newcombe was careless. It does not appear that there was anything to indicate danger to him in what he did. The water gauges indicated a sufficiency of water in the boilers, and there is no proof that they were out of order or that he ought to have known that they were out of order. For aught that appears he believed and had the right to believe that his acts were perfectly proper and safe. It is not sufficient now after the accident to show that they were in fact improper and caused the explosion.

But the plaintiff should have shown that he knew, had reason to know or ought to have known, that they were improper and dangerous. This was not shown, and carelessness which put human life in peril should not be presumed or found upon a mere scintilla of evidence.

But the plaintiff also claims that the boiler which exploded was in an improper and unsafe condition, and that on account thereof the defendant is liable for the accident. It did not owe the same duty to Olive which would have been due to an employee into whose hands the boiler was placed for use. To such an employee it would have owed the duty of reasonable care and diligence to see to it that the boiler was in a safe and proper condition for use.

Olive was there to repair this boiler; and if the accident occurred from any of the defects which the vendor, his employer, was bound to repair, no responsibility was thereby cast upon the defendant. Olive assumed all the risks incident to such defects. If there had been any concealed dangerous defects known to the defendant, it would have been bound to notify the boiler makers of them. But it did not guaranty that the boiler was safe. It does not appear that anyone had knowledge of any concealed defects in the boiler, making it dangerous. It was new, had been used but a few months and had been cleaned every two weeks. There is no evidence that it ought to have been examined or cleaned more frequently.

There is no evidence of any carelessness on the part of the defendant in reference to the condition of the boiler, or that it was unsafe when placed in the hands of the boiler makers for repairs. The accident might have been due entirely to the act of Newcombe, and it certainly was not shown that it was due to any defect in the boiler. The jury might have guessed that there was a defect, but there was not sufficient evidence of it to form the basis of a verdict.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the non-suit was proper and that the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur except Miller, J., absent.

1. The death of a joint principal debtor upon a lease does not discharge the joint liability of the debtors, or the separate liability of his estate.
2. The date of entry of final judgment against a party deceased after verdict and before judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 768) is immaterial; and such judgment may be entered nunc pro tunc as of the date of the verdict, where the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, § 1210, as to entry of memorandum of the party's death are complied with.
3. A judgment entered upon a verdict against a party since deceased is not void for the reason that notice of motion therefor was given only to the attorney of record of the deceased party.
4. Under the Code of Civil Procedure, § 1000, the court may, at any special term held by any judge, modify an order of a trial judge staying judgment on a verdict pending a hearing on exceptions in the first instance at general term, so as to allow entry of judgment.
5. The objections which, under the Code of Civil Procedure, § 1939, a defendant not served in an original action may oppose to the judgment therein, when sought to be enforced against him, are limited to legal valid objections which a party to the judgment might make, and must go to the validity and efficiency of the judgment; the objection that the original cause of action has become barred by the Statute of Limitations since the original judgment is not available.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Buffalo at General Term, affirming a judgment of the Trial Term in favor of plaintiff in an action to charge a judgment upon a defendant who had not been served in the original action to recover for rent and damages. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised are set forth in the opinion.

Messrs. Sprague, Morey & Sprague. for appellant:

A judgment in an action against joint debtors can be enforced only against the joint property of all the defendants, and the separate property of the defendant served.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1935.

By the death of Scheffer, the joint liability at law of Scheffer and Stafford and the separate liability of the estate of Scheffer for the payment of the rent were discharged and terminated. The only action that would then lie was a separate action against Stafford.

Getty v. Binase, 49 N. Y. 385; Richter v. Popenhausen, 42 N. Y. 378; Risley v. Brown, 67 N. Y. 160; Bradley v. Burwell, 8 Denio, 61.

The discharge of the estate of Scheffer from liability is not prevented by section 758 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Whatever joint liability there was, antedated by several years the Code of Civil Procedure. Randall v. Sackett, 77 N. Y. 480.

There was no authority of law for the order made at special term, directing the entry of judgment of May 28, 1882, nunc pro tunc as of January 25, 1875. The Code of Civil Procedure, § 768, furnishes the practice for the entry of judgment after the death of the party, upon a verdict in his lifetime, in those cases where the cause of action survives and there is no legal obstacle to such entry. The force and effect of such a judgment is defined by section 1210.

An inspection of sections 768 and 1210 shows that those sections apply only to cases where the cause of action survives the death of the party.

Tuomy v. Dunn, 77 N. Y. 515.

The authority of all agents and attorneys is dissolved by the death of the principal. Hence an order cannot be taken by default against a party after his death, by service upon the person who had been his attorney during his lifetime.

There was not a valid renewal and continuance of the original written lease, because there was no attempt to make or purport to make any modification of the lease, and because it did not comply with the condition expressed in it. A covenant of contract under seal cannot be modified by parol.

Coe v. Hobby, 72 N. Y. 141; French v. New, 28 N. Y. 147; Delacroix v. Bulkeley, 18 Wend. 71.

The parol agreement for two years from May 1, 1871, was void because not in writing; and because this parol contract was void by the Statute of Frauds, it did not modify or affect the original lease. A valid contract cannot be avoided by a void agreement.

Delacroix v. Bulkeley, supra.

Hence, the landlord was only entitled to recover for the use and occupation of the premises during the term they were actually occupied.

Thomas v. Nelson, 69 N.Y. 118.

In any aspect of the case, the right to recover rent for these premises after they were vacated, August 31, 1871, is barred by the Statute of Limitations. In the most favorable view for the plaintiff, the tenancy which arose out of this void agreement, followed by occupation and payment of monthly rental, was a tenancy from month to month and could be determined by either party at the end of each month, or could be terminated by a month's notice.

The trial court erred in the admission of the question: "What is your judgment as to the injury you sustained?" It has often been decided that the measure of damages cannot be proved in this way. Witnesses are to give facts, and the jury is therefrom to estimate the damages.

The trial court erred in excluding the evidence offered by defendant to show that Scheffer received a discharge in bankruptcy on June 28, 1876. Such a discharge releases the bankrupt from all debts, claims, liabilities and demand which were or might have been proved against his estate in bankruptcy. It effectually discharged Scheffer from all liability for this indebtedness.

The Statute of Limitations bars the action, unless the original written lease under seal was continued in force by the oral negotiation between Lydia P. Long and this defendant. The only witness to that negotiation was plaintiff herself. She was the party plaintiff and an interested witness; hence, the question as to whether the fact was as stated by her should have been submitted to the jury.

Mr. O. O. Cottle, for respondent:

The Statute of Limitations had not run when the summons in the original action was served on one of the joint debtors; and it cannot be pleaded here as a bar to the original cause of action. The Statute of Limitations will not be available until twenty years after the entry of the original judgment.

Maples v. Mackey, 22 Hun, 228; affd. in 89 N.Y. 146.

The original judgment was valid. The court had jurisdiction by service of the original summons; and its proceedings, even had they been irregular, which they were not, were valid until set aside.

The extent of the plaintiff's demand is established by the original judgment. The plaintiff had only to give evidence of the defendant's liability.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1933.

The lease was one for six months or for two years and six months, at the option of the lessees; and the agreement to pay rent was co-extensive with the entire term. By holding over and paying rent according to the lease after the first six months had expired, the lessees elected to continue the lease; the condition for written notice was waived, and the lessees were estopped from alleging that the notice had not been given.

If it had not been a continuance of the lease, it would have been a lease for a year at the rent agreed upon; and that would have been sufficient to sustain this action.

Conway v. Starkweather, 1 Denio, 113.

Evidence that John H. Scheffer had been discharged in bankruptcy was immaterial; and it was not error to exclude it. Bankruptcy is a personal defense, of which no one but the bankrupt can take advantage. There was no offer to prove that the defendant Stafford had been discharged. His liability remained unaffected.

Hartness v. Thompson, 5 Johns. 160; Van Bramer v. Cooper, 2 Johns. 279; Oruikshank v. Gardner, 2 Hill, 333; 2 Cowen's Treatise, 3d ed. 482.

There was no evidence to go to the jury that Mrs. Long had released the defendant; the talk they had about his selling out to Frank E. Scheffer did not tend to show a release of Stafford from liability, according to Stafford's own statement of it.

House v. Burr, 24 Barb. 525.

After verdict the attorneys who represented the parties at the time of the trial may continue to do so until judgment is entered. If notices are required they may be given by or served on such attorneys. If notice of motion for leave to enter judgment nunc pro tunc was necessary, service on the attorney who appeared in the trial was proper.

The action as brought is maintainable against the defendant Stafford, the surviving joint debtor.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court: On the 24th day of October, 1870, Lydia P. Long, the intestate, executed to the defendant and John H. Scheffer, a lease of a store in the City of Buffalo. The lease was under seal and executed by the lessor and lessees, and was for six months, to commence on the first day of November, 1870, at a rental of $25 per month, with a provision for a continuance for two years longer, as follows:

"And it is further agreed that the party of the second part shall have the privilege of continuing the lease for two years from May first, 1871, to May first, 1873, at the annual rental of $600, to be made in monthly payments in advance, on the first day of each and every month during said lease, by first giving written notice to party of the first part on the first or during the month of February, 1871, of such intention."

The lessees entered into possession of the store and paid the stipulated rent at the rate of $25 per month until May first, 1871; and after that date they continued to occupy the store until September first, 1871, paying the stipulated rent at the increased rate of $50 per month. The store was then vacated and no rent was thereafter paid.

In 1874 the intestate commenced an action in the Superior Court of Buffalo against the lessees and Frank E. Scheffer to recover the rent from September first, 1871, to May first, 1872, and damage for the breach of certain covenants contained in the lease. The summons was served upon the two Scheffers, but not upon Stafford.

The Scheffers appeared and answered; and upon the trial of that action the court dismissed the complaint as to Frank E. Scheffer and the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against the other two defendants for $497.11. The entry of the judgment was stayed, and the court ordered the exceptions taken by the defendant to be heard at the general term. They were not brought to a hearing and John H. Scheffer died in 1881. Upon a motion made at a special term of the court on behalf of Mrs. Long, notice of which was given to the attorney for the defendant Scheffer, the court made an order May 23, 1882, vacating the stay of proceedings so far as to permit her to enter judgment nunc pro tunc as of the day upon which the verdict was rendered, to wit: June 25, 1875; and judgment was thereupon entered for damages and costs, for the sum of $621.08, containing a provision that the plaintiff have execution against the joint property of the defendants Scheffer and Stafford and the individual property of Scheffer.

Thereafter, on the 25th day of May, 1882, Mrs. Long commenced this action to charge the judgment upon the property of the defendant Stafford. He put in an answer and, upon the trial of the issues thus joined, the court ordered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, for $976.03. She having died her administrator was substituted as plaintiff.

The Code, § 1933, provides that such a judgment as Mrs. Long obtained against Scheffer and Stafford as joint debtors is evidence only of the extent of the plaintiff's demand, after the liability of the defendant not served has been established by other evidence; and section 1937 authorizes an action by the plaintiff in such a judgment against the defendant not summoned, to procure a judgment charging his property with the sum remaining unpaid upon the original judgment.

The defendant's answer in such an action is, by section 1939, "restricted to defenses or counterclaims which he might have made in the original action, if the summons therein had been served upon him when it was first served upon a defendant jointly indebted with him; objections to the judgment; and defenses or counterclaims which have arisen since it was rendered."

The defendant makes several objections to the judgment rendered against him in this action which we will notice separately.

1. It is claimed that by the death of Scheffer the joint liability of Scheffer and Stafford and the separate liability of the estate of Scheffer, for the payment of the rent, were discharged; and the cases of Getty v. Binsee, 49 N. Y. 385, and Risley v. Brown, 87 N. Y. 180, are cited to uphold this claim. But those authorities and the principle decided by them have no application to this case, as Scheffer was not a mere surety, but was a principal debtor. The argument of defendant's counsel, built upon this claim, therefore fails.

2. It is objected that the court had no authority to make the order nunc pro tunc, for the reason that notice upon the persons who had been the attorneys for Scheffer was insufficient; and also for the reasons stated in the opinion in Tuomy v. Dunn, 77 N. Y. 515.

The Code, § 763, provides that if a party dies after verdict and before final judgment, the court must enter final judgment in the name of the original parties; and section 1210 provides that when judgment is entered in such a case, a memorandum of the party's death must be entered with the judgment in the judgment book, indorsed on the judgment roll, and noted on the margin of the docket of the judgment; and that such a judgment does not become a lien upon the real property or chattels real of the decedent, but establishes a debt to be paid in the course of administration.

The latter section was complied with in this case, and the two sections were authority for the judgment entered as against the deceased defendant. The fact that the judgment was entered nunc pro tunc as of the date of the verdict rather than as of the date of entry, harmed no one connected with his estate, as it could in any event be paid only in the course of administration. The date of which the judgment was entered was a wholly immaterial circumstance as the effect of the judgment as against the estate of the deceased was in no way influenced thereby and in no way depended thereon.

In the case of Tuomy v. Dunn, there was no compliance with section 1210; and the effort was to enter a judgment which would be a lien as of the date of the verdict and would thus have a preference in administration upon the estate of the decedent.

The entry of the judgment was a mere formal matter which the court could have ordered without notice to anyone without rendering it liable to assault as entirely void. Even if the service of notice in this case upon the attorneys was improper, it was at most an irregularity and not a fatal defect.

So far as the joint property of the two defendants was concerned, the practice was not regulated by the two sections of the Code quoted. The stay of proceedings was the act of the court; and as to such property, it had the common-law authority to enter judgment nunc pro tunc as of the date of the verdict. The right of courts of record to exercise such authority has been always asserted and cannot now be well disputed.

3. But it is further claimed that under section 1000 of the Code no judge but the one who made the order staying proceedings and ordering the exceptions to be heard in the first instance at the general term could make the order; and that the revocation in this case was not made by the order of such a judge. Here the order was not entirely revoked; it was simply modified so as to allow the entry of judgment. This the court could do at any special term held by any judge. The section should be construed not as a limitation upon the power of the court, but as a limitation upon the power of a judge out of court.

But it is not necessary to notice more particularly the objections made to the order and judgment. They were not void if irregular, and they could not be attacked collaterally, even by the representatives of Scheffer. Much less could Stafford assail them collaterally. There was no irregularity in reference to them which affected any of his substantial rights.

Section 1939 reserves to a defendant situated like Stafford the right to make "objections to the judgment." But what objections? It may not be easy to answer this question. They must at least be legal, valid objections, such as a party to the judgment might make and not such as have always been excluded. They must be such objections as go to the validity and binding efficacy of the judgment.

4. The judgment in the original action was evidence against Stafford, of the extent of plaintiff's demand; and all plaintiff was bound to do was by other evidence to establish the joint liability of the defendant with Scheffer for that demand. This plaintiff did. The lessees entered upon the prolonged term of two years, provided for in the lease with the consent of the lessor, and paid the rent up to September first, 1871 at the increased rent.

Without alluding to the evidence of an express waiver of the written notice to take the further term, such notice must be held to have been waived by the act of the parties to the lease. Their act in the continued occupancy of the store and the payment and receipt of the increased rent can have no other meaning or significance, except that of an election to take the store for the new term. Whether the requirement of written notice was for the benefit of the lessees only, or for the benefit of both lessor and lessees, they were competent to waive it by parol; and a waiver is to be implied from their conduct.

There is no proof that Mrs. Long ever agreed to accept the surrender of the store, and thus to terminate the lease prior to May first, 1872. On the contrary, she refused to accept the key when tendered to her. The fact that she took it from the place where the lessees left it against her will and entered the store has no significance. The defendant therefore continued liable for the rent to May first, 1872.

5. It is also objected that plaintiff's demand for rent was, at the time of the commencement of this action, barred by the Statute of Limitations. But this was a proceeding to charge the defendant with the original judgment; and unless that was barred, the cause of action was not barred. Maples v. Mackey, 89 N. Y. 146.

Besides, the defendant's original liability was upon the lease; and as that was under seal there is no ground for holding that the Statute of Limitations barred plaintiff's claim.

We have now noticed the principal objections made by the defendant against the judgment; and a consideration of the whole case has led us to the conclusion that the verdict was properly ordered for the plaintiff and that the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur except Miller, J., absent.

NEW JERSEY.
COURT OF CHANCERY.

SPRAGUE et al.,

v.

1. The question being as to the consideration for the conveyance by aged parents, of all their estate to one of their children; held, on the evidence, that such consideration consisted of an undertaking by the child to whom the property was transferred to pay to the next of kin of the parents, on their decease, a certain sum of money in addition to maintaining the parents during their lives, etc., and that said sum due the next of kin was a lien upon the land.
2. This lien for a portion of the consideration for the conveyance not being of record was a latent equity in favor of the next of kin and as such was not binding upon an assignee, without notice and for value, of a mortgage upon the land made by the child to whom it had been conveyed, although the original mortgagee had notice of such lien.

BILL for relief. Decree advised.

The nature of the case and the facts and questions raised are set out in the conclusions filed by the Vice Chancellor.

Messrs. Martin & Conklin, for complainants:

It is one of the most familiar and well settled principles of a court of equity that the vendor of real estate has a lien over for the purchase money.

Brinkerhoff v. Vancisev, 3 Green, Ch. 251; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1217; Crawford v. Bertholf, 1 Saxt. 458.

The vendee is regarded as the trustee for the vendor.

2 Story, Eq. Jur. p. 441, § 1217; Graves v. Coutant, 4 Stew. 779.

Although the equitable right of vendor's lien has been differently treated and recognized in different States in the Union, there is no State in the Union where it has been put on higher grounds and treated more favorably than by the courts of the State of New Jersey, and it has always been treated as a substantial right.}

Graves v. Coutant, supra.

"Where a man delivers a deed for property and does not get the purchase money, an equitable lien arises at once in his favor of exactly the same nature, as far as the court of chancery is concerned, as if he had taken a mortgage in writing, sealed and delivered."

Id.; Armstrong v. Ross, 5 C. E. Green, 109.

The lien exists, not only as against the vendee but also as against persons holding under him with notice. Our court of equity has followed the leading case of Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329.

Graves v. Coutant, 4 Stew. 779-780; Corlies v. Howland, 11 C. E. Green, 311; Brinkerhoff v. Vancisev, supra.

It will also prevail against those who take title by act or operation of law from such grantee, without notice; in which case the assignee holds, subject to the equities existing against his grantor.

Corlies v. Howland, supra; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1228; 2 Sudg. Vend. 880.

Neither will the taking of the purchaser's note or bond for the unpaid purchase money impair the lien.

Graves v. Coutant, 4 Stew. 781; Brinkerhoff v. Vancisev, 3 Green, Ch. 251.

Nor will the recovery of a judgment upon such note or bond; for until there is payment the lien will remain.

Graves v. Coutant, supra; Dudley v. Dickson, 1 McCart. 252.

To constitute the lien, as against a purchaser under the original vendee, there must be notice of the indebtedness and that the indebtedness arose upon the purchase money.

Brinkerhoff v. Vancisev, 3 Green, Ch. 251.

But it is not necessary that there should be notice that the indebtedness constitutes a lien on the land. Id.

Neither is an express agreement necessary to create the lien; it results as an incident to the sale, unless it is expressly waived, or unless there are such special circumstances as show that the parties did not intend that the lien should exist. Id.

Notice of improperly registered mortgage given to secure purchase money is sufficient notice.

Armstrong v. Ross, 5 C. E. Green, 120.

The Statute of Limitations does not affect such a lien; because the vendee or the purchaser from him, with notice, stands in the relation of a trustee or mortgagor for the unpaid purchase money.

Graves v. Coutant, 4 Stew. 779; Lewis v. Hawkins, 23 Wall. 119 (90 U. S. bk. 23, L. ed. 118).

The burden of proof is upon the purchaser, to establish that in the particular case, the lien for unpaid purchase money has been intentionally displaced, or waived by the consent of the parties.

Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 342-9; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1224.

In a suit practically of the same character as this, it was held that although an action might be maintained by an administrator, yet there "would be serious difficulties in the way," and "suggesting, therefore, these embarrassments," "it is sufficient to say that it is a more convenient practice, and is not open to legal objection, * * * to institute these suits."

Haston v. Castner, 4 Stew. 701.

If a person make a promise to another, upon lawful consideration, for the benefit of a third person, such third person may maintain an action, even at law, upon it.

Joslin v. N. Jersey Car Spring Co. 7 Vroom, 141; Cubberly v. Cubberly, 6 Stew. 82; Pruden v. Williams, 11 C. E. Green, 210.

The assignee of a mortgage takes it subject to all equities and defenses existing between the original parties at the time of the assignment, whether they be latent or not.

Green, 484; 7 C. E. Green, 600, 606; See Woodruff v. Morristown Sav. Inst. 7 Stew. 178; De Witt v. Van Sickle, 2 Stew. 209; Bennett v. Hadsell, 8 C. E. Green, 174.

Ordinarily "the existence of the marriage relation is not enough to make admissions or declarations made by either (husband or wife) competent against the other;" but "it is enough to show that the declarant was the agent of the other in the matter involved, and acting as such when the declaration was made."

Abb. Tr. Ev. p. 166; 4 Barb. 222; 2 E. D. Smith, 250; Rose, N. P. 75.

Messrs. Kendall and Van Blarcom, for defendants.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

This bill is filed to determine whether Mr. and Mrs. Sprague, two aged people, conveyed all their real estate and assigned all their personal to their daughter Mary J. Drew, upon condition that she should discharge a mortgage on the land, of $1,000, and should pay the other outstanding obligations of Mr. S., and should allow a daughter to have her home on the premises during the lifetime of the parents, and should keep and maintain the parents during the rest of their lives, and should decently bury them at their death, and should pay to the children of Mr. S. the sum of $3,000; or whether the said lands were conveyed and the said personal property assigned upon all of said conditions being kept and performed by Mary J. Drew except the last one; i. e., the payment of the said $3,000.

The parents being dead the contest is between all of the children, except Mary J. Drew and the brother Josiah on the one hand, and Mary J. Drew and Josiah on the other.

What was the transaction between the parents and the daughter? There is nothing in writing except the deed for the land and two unexecuted bonds and a mortgage. The deed was executed by the parents; but the bonds and mortgage which purport to have been drawn for Mary J. Drew and her husband to execute are not signed. The parents being dead, the only other persons who knew anything about the transaction, from being present or from participation therein, are Mary J. Drew and her brother Josiah. Parol testimony must be relied upon chiefly. The unexecuted papers throw some light on the question.

Although the burden is on the complainants, yet the natural order of investigation will be to ascertain as far as possible what took place between the parents and Mary Drew, from those who were present at the time they came to an understanding. This leads me to note what Mary says in her answer and testimony. In her answer she says her father sent for her and spoke of the age of himself and wife, and said unless they got help he would be without means of burial; and prepared to convey to her his lands and all goods and chattels, upon the condition that Mary would agree to assume and pay a bond and mortgage on said lands, of $1,000, and pay the other debts against said Samuel, and put the dwelling house in comfortable repair, and support and maintain her said parents during their lives, and suitably bury them, and allow their daughter Susan to have a home in said dwelling and keep a cow on said lands so long as she remained single. In her testimony these things are substantially repeated. But she says that her father told her that he had offered the farm to his son Josiah, but that he had refused to take it. Josiah had the deed prepared for the farm, had his parents execute it, and delivered it to his sister Mary.

But Mary goes somewhat further in her testimony; she admits that she said she took the farm for $4,000, but qualifies the force of this, by saying that there was $1,000 mortgage upon it, and that the $3,000 was to go to the support of her parents, and added: "and that was little enough to do." She says that her mother handed her some papers during the last year of her life, which must have been during 1878, and about one year after the date of the deed, and said to her: "Take these notes and these papers and lay them away." The bonds and mortgage referred to were among the papers. Mary says that she turned them over and saw the bonds, but did not read them, adding: "I did not read them until after her death; then I got them out and read them." She admits saying "they hadn't been signed and should be laid away." Afterwards, she produced her deed and these bonds and mortgage and showed them to her sister, Mrs. V.

As stated, the only other person who had any personal knowledge of the transaction, was the son Josiah. He was called as a witness by Mary. He says that Captain Van Blarcom (an able and experienced lawyer) drew the deed. He says that his father told him "to have the deed made out for Mary, if I didn't want the farm; he offered it to me if I would take it at $4,000, and take care of them, and pay his liabilities; he said it was worth $4,000, after taking care of them, and paying his liabilities; he said Mary would take it, if I didn't want it."

At the request of his father, he at once had the deed prepared to Mary, had it executed and acknowledged, and delivered it to Mary, who requested him to have it recorded. Josiah also had the bonds and mortgage prepared. He says that they were prepared after the deed was executed, and adds that his parents did not know that he had them written, and says: "I had them a few days, and then gave them to mother, and she said she didn't want them signed; she said by the time they got the debts paid and them taken care of it would be enough for them to pay."

Upon cross examination Josiah said that his father told him that Mary was to have it for the same that it had been offered to him, Josiah.

In the next place I will present what the witnesses, called by the complainants, say that Mary told them about the transaction, and what she did with reference to a settlement, which it is urged, she would not have said and done, had not the complainant's view of the case been the true one. Mr. W. heard Mary ask his wife (a sister of Mary) to come to her house February 14, 1884, and tell her that there was $3,000 to be divided among the children, but that her husband had an account to bring it down to $864 for keeping the old folks. He also says that on the 14th of February, 1884, at such meeting, these bonds were claimed, but that Mary said they were not signed, and refused to produce them; and that Mary's husband claimed that he had taken care of the old people and would have pay for it.

This witness says that Mary told him a few days afterwards that the bonds and mortgage were to be signed, but that it had been neglected; and that after they had put the second mortgage on the place, her mother said she need not sign them. He also says that at the meeting February 14, 1884, the husband of Mary made a statement of his claim, in which he charged himself with rent for the farm, and charged the old people with board, and had a balance due the heirs at law of $864. This is the same account which Mary spoke of, and it was on this occasion presented and insisted on by her husband in the presence of Mary. Why any charge for board or any credit for rent, if the understanding was that Mary was to have the farm for the promise of boarding her parents and paying their debts and making repairs?

In 1878 the next year after the deed was delivered, Mary told Mrs. W., another sister, that she had agreed to give $4,000 for the farm, to pay the $1,000 mortgage, "keep the old folks," and "after their death pay the heirs $3,000;" and she added, "there were papers to that effect."

Mary told the same witness after the death of their father "that she would stay on the place and would be able to keep it, if they didn't all call on her at once." Just prior to February 14, 1884, the witness said to Mary: "If you have papers to show that the heirs are not entitled to anything, why don't you produce them and that will settle it? And Mary said: I haven't any and don't want any. I want the heirs to have what is coming to them."

Mr. Welsh, a carpenter, who was in the employ of Drew after he took possession of the farm, says that while there at work, Mrs. Drew told him that she was to give $3,000 and keep her parents their lifetime, and that she was to assume the debts and pay the $3,000 to the heirs.

W. H. S., one of the complainants, says that his sister Mary told him in the spring of 1877 that she was to pay $4,000 for the place, pay the debts, keep the old folks, and had given bonds for $3,000, which was to be divided amongst the heirs; and he says John S. D. told him the same thing before he took possession of the farm.

Mr. E. S., another complainant, corroborates what Mrs. W. says, to the effect that Mary said that she had no papers to show that she was to have the place for taking care of her parents; but that she wanted the heirs to have what was coming to them.

In the spring of 1877 Mary told her sister Susan that she was to have the place for keeping her parents and giving the heirs $3,000. Susan also says that on another occasion she was with her sister Mary, when the latter was searching for an insurance policy, and adds: "I said, Isn't that it, and she said, 'No, that is them bonds;' and then she said, 'Not signed yet, but they ought to be and laid out of here; this is not a safe place for them.'"

In the third place, let other and independent facts and concurrent circumstances and events be considered. Many of these go towards sustaining the view expressed by complainants. For example, the deed declares that the consideration was $4,000. It contains full covenants of warranty and seisin, with the exception only of the $1,000 mortgage, but Mary took the deed with the provision therein that she was to assume and pay off that mortgage as part of the purchase money. I am satisfied the true consideration was $4,000. No part of that sum has been paid, unless the debts, other than the mortgage, were also to be paid as part of the said $4,000. Mary does not pretend that she has paid any part of it, except the debts. This fact being unquestioned, the heirs (or more strictly speaking, the next of kin) are entitled to the $3,000; for the deed, it will be observed, makes no provision for the support of the grantor and his wife, nor for the repair of the dwelling, nor for funeral charges.

In plain reason, then, part of the consideration was $4,000. That must stand uncontrovertibly fixed. If there was any other consideration, it must have been in addition to the $4,000. I can imagine no ground for supposing that any element entered into the contract to diminish or exhaust the said $4,000; for if the estimated value of the lands had been $4,000, and the estimated value of the debts and services, care and maintenance, had been $4,000, everyone making any pretensions to a knowledge of the law would have had the real contract expressed in the deed.

But the counsel understood his business. He saw that the deed was absolute on its face and that Mary had a supreme advantage over her parents, if she chose to exercise her legal rights, should the deed go forth unaccompanied with any paper expressing the conditions upon which Mary took the farm; and hence the same counsel who drew the deed drew also two bonds and a mortgage on the lands conveyed; the bonds for Mary to sign, and the mortgage for both Mary and her husband. One of said bonds was in the penal sum of $3,750, and the condition was that if Mary should the said Samuel Sprague keep and maintain on the farm and in the dwelling house conveyed by him to said Mary, by deed of even date with said bond, and should provide for him in sickness, and at decease of said Samuel Sprague "well and truly pay the sum of $1,875 to the then surviving children of the said Samuel Sprague," etc.; and in case of failure to perform any of said conditions in the lifetime of said Samuel Sprague, should then pay the said $1,875 to the said Samuel Sprague, then the said bond should be void, etc.

The other bond was to the mother and to secure the payment of $1,125, but in all other particulars like the one just recited. These papers taken together with the deed made the transaction complete; and had they been executed, as no doubt counsel intended, this controversy would have been unknown. There can be no doubt that it was the express understanding that these bonds and this mortgage were to have been executed. Nor can there be the least doubt that the deed and the bonds express the agreement between the father and the daughter Mary, although the bonds were not signed. It is absurd to suppose that the grantor would so completely uncover his head as he did by this deed, with full covenants of warranty, unless his old age had brought on imbecility.

One point, very different in its character remains. Josiah took a mortgage from Mary and her husband for $700. This he assigned to the defendant Givens for value. Is this mortgage so held by Givens, prior to the lien of the $3,000, being so much of the unpaid purchase money? It certainly would not be prior in the hands of Josiah, for he knew that the purchase money was not paid. But Givens paid the $700 and interest and was ignorant of the incumbrance in favor of the grantor. This incumbrance or lien, not having been made manifest by any record (in other words, being unknown to Givens, either constructively or actually), it is what is known as a latent equity in favor of the next of kin of the mortgagor's grantor. It is, therefore, not an equity between the mortgagor and mortgagee, which the assignee of the mortgagee would be bound by whether he took with notice or not; but being latent, he is not bound without notice, even though his assignor had full notice. And purchasing bona fide, and paying the consideration in full, even though a large part of that consideration was an existing indebtedness, his title prevails over such latent equitable title. Traphagen v. Hand, 9 Stew. 384.

The complainants are entitled to the $3,000. The defendant Mary J. Drew is liable for this sum to her brothers and sisters, according to the terms and conditions expressed in the unsigned bonds. This amount, with interest from the date of the death of the intestate, is a lien on the lands conveyed to Mrs. Drew, but subsequent to the liens of the two mortgages given to Martin and the one held by Givens. Givens is entitled to costs from the complainants.

The complainants are entitled to costs from the defendants Mary J. Drew and her husband, and from Josiah Sprague. The costs of complainant will also be declared to be a lien on the lands.

AMERICAN DRAMATIC FUND ASSOCIATION

1. Where legacies are given generally and the residue of the real and personal estate is afterwards given in one mass, the legacies are a charge upon the real as well as personal estate.
2. A devise to the American Dramatic Fund held good as a devise to the corporation, the American Dramatic Fund Association, it appearing that such corporation was intended by the testatrix to be the recipient.

BILL for legacy. On final hearing on pleadings and proofs. Decree for complainant. The facts and questions raised are set out in the opinion.

Mr. C. Parker, for complainant.

Mr. A. C. Hartshorne, for defendant Brown, administrator.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

This suit is brought to recover a legacy of $3,000 given by the will of Mrs. Anne D. Wallack to the complainant, as it alleges, by the name of the American Dramatic Fund. The bill is filed against William F. Lett, who was the acting executor, but who was removed in 1883, and George W. Brown, who was appointed administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo in his stead. Lett is now the owner of the residuary estate by purchase thereof.

By the will, which was made in 1873, the testatrix, who died in 1879, gave all her estate, real and personal, after payment of her debts and funeral expenses, to her husband, James W. Wallack, for life (he predeceased her) and gave her executors power to sell and convert into money all her real estate after the decease of her husband or with his consent, in his lifetime, and to invest the proceeds; and directed them after his death to pay out of her estate an annuity (to Nannie Taylor) and certain legacies of specified sums of money, and the residue of the income to the testatrix's mother, Mrs. Caroline Blake, for life; and she directed that upon the decease of her mother, her executors pay to Mrs. Margaret C. Blake, widow of Dr. Lewis W. Blake, $2,500, in case she should be unmarried; to the American Dramatic Fund $3,000; and to the institution known as Sister Irene's Foundling Hospital, $3,000. She ordered that the rest of her estate descend and be distributed according to the laws of this State, regulating descents and distributions in cases of intestacy. One of the annuitants, Mrs. Caroline Blake, is dead.

Two questions are submitted for decision: one is whether the legacy in dispute is charged upon the testatrix's real estate, and the other is whether the complainant is entitled to it.

That the legacy is charged upon the real estate there can be no doubt. The testatrix directs her executors to convert her real property and invest the proceeds and pay the income thereof to her husband for life, and upon his decease to pay out of her estate the annuity to Nannie Taylor, and certain legacies of specified sums of money, and the rest of the income to her mother for life; and on the death of her mother, she gives and directs her executors to pay out of her estate a legacy of $2,500 (in a certain contingency), the legacy in dispute and another, and gives all the rest, residue and remainder of her "estate, real and personal" to descend and be distributed, etc.

Where legacies are given generally and the residue of the real and personal estate is afterwards given in one mass, the legacies are a charge upon the real as well as personal estate. Corvine v. Corvine, 9 C. E. Green, 579; Hawk. Wills, 299.

The complainant is a benevolent corporation of the State of New York, located in the City of New York. The objects of the Corporation are, according to the charter: to raise by subscription, donations and bequests from members thereof and others, by theatrical benefits and annual festivals, a fund to be devoted to making provision for the support of members thereof who by age, sickness or accident, are incapacitated from pursuing their professional calling, and for the support of the widows and orphans of the members, and for the purpose of defraying the funeral expenses of members.

and for such other similar purposes as the Corporation shall deem meet and expedient.

The testatrix, who was a tragedian, was a member of the Association at the time of her death, and had been such since 1851. Her husband, who was also a tragedian, was a member. Her mother, her step-father and two uncles of hers were members. The Corporation is commonly known by the name of the American Dramatic Fund. The word "association" is seldom used as part of its name in speaking of it. There is no other corporation or association of the same or similar name. A misnomer of a corporation in a devise, grant or obligation will not prevent it from taking or recovering in its true name. Upper Alloways Creek Township v. String, 5 Halst. 323; 1 Pow. Dev. 338.

If the description of the person, whether natural or civil, in a devise, be made with sufficient certainty, so that the person intended may be distinguished from every other person, trifling omissions or misprisions will not make the devise invalid; for the use of names or descriptions is but to make a distinction between person and person; and therefore it is sufficient if the person be so called or described that he or it may be distinguished from every other. 1 Pow. Dev. 338.

Where the legatee or devisee is inaccurately named or described so that there is no one who fully answers the name or description, the court will, if possible, gather from the contents of the will and the surrounding circumstances who was meant. Theo. Wills, 111.

These familiar principles have been so frequently applied in this court as to render any citation of instances wholly unnecessary. There can be no doubt that in the bequest under consideration the testatrix intended to give the legacy to the complainant.

The administrator did not enter upon his duties as such until June, 1885 (the bill was filed in December, 1884), although he was appointed in April, 1883; but there would seem, from his own testimony, to be enough assets in his hands. The bill has been taken as confessed against him.

There should be a decree against both of them, with costs; but as to the administrator, the decree should be for payment of the legacy and the costs out of the assets of the estate in the due course of administration.

v.

NEW YORK & SCRANTON CONSTRUCTION CO. et al.

1. A complaint seeking the compulsory production of the books of a corporation for examination on the part of a stockholder, on the ground only that complainant has been refused permission to examine the books with the aid of an expert accountant, does not present a case for equitable relief.
2. The power conferred upon the Chancellor by section 50 of the Act concerning corporations (Rev. p. 186), to compel the production of the books of a corporation, is limited to the special case of a corporation of this State unlawfully keeping its books out of the State; and the Act does not confer upon the court of chancery any power over corporations which it did not theretofore possess, except that which is specifically given.

BILL for general relief. On general demurrer. Demurrer sustained.

The facts and questions raised are set forth in the opinion.

Mr. John W. Taylor, for defendants, demurrants:

This is virtually an application to this court for a mandamus to enforce a legal right, if a right at all; and for obtaining the enforcement of that right the appropriate remedy is a writ of mandamus which is, moreover, adequate and complete.

See High. Extr. Rem. § 308; Taylor, Corp. § 585; 2 Lindley, Partn. p. 809.

The complainant was not entitled either at law or in equity, to have an examination of all the books and affairs by an expert; certainly not unless he avers his own ignorance and incompetency.

See Taylor, Corp. § 585; 2 Lindley, Partn. p. 809.

There has been no demand or refusal, so far as the board of directors is concerned, all of whom are made defendants.

2 Lindley, Partn. p. 810; Ree v. Wilts & Berks Canal Nav. Co. 3 Adol. & Ellis, 477.

If it is the duty of the directors (assuming that the Company has absolutely ceased to do business) to call a stockholder's meeting and wind up the Company, that duty is not sought to be enforced and cannot be enforced, under the bill as it stands.

Streit v. Citizens Fire Ins. Co. 2 Stew. 21.

The accounting etc. prayed for cannot be had without making all the shareholders defendants, or by suing on their behalf. All the shareholders are quite as much interested as the complainant, in the accounting. Although this is not one of expressed causes of demurrer, is hereby assigned ore tenus.

Story, Eq. Pl. § 484; 1 Dan. Ch. 5th ed. 583; Barrett v. Doughty, 10 C. E. Green, 879.

Mr. C. Parker, for complainant.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The case stated in the bill is that the New York and Scranton Construction Company was incorporated under the Act concerning corporations in February, 1881, and carried on its business from the time when it was organized to about May 7, 1882; that its assets were from time to time distributed among its stockholders in pursuance of resolutions of the board of directors, and that on the 7th of May, 1882, the president gave notice to the stockholders that pursuant to a resolution of the board the assets remaining in the treasury would be distributed ratably among the stockholders by the treasurer, at his office in New York, on and after that date, upon surrender by the stockholders of their stock certificates; and that a full exhibit of the financial affairs of the Company had been prepared for the inspection of all stockholders at that office.

It further states that since May 7, 1882, the Company has carried on no business and has not exercised any of its franchises; that all its debts and liabilities are paid and discharged; that it has not been dissolved; that no exhibit of the financial affairs of the Company was made as promised in the notice, but that all that was exhibited was a so-called "trial balance" sheet from which the complainant could not ascertain whether what the directors proposed to pay him was his full share to which as a stockholder he was entitled; that for that reason he refused to take the offered dividend until he should have had an opportunity (for which he then applied) to examine the books with the aid of a proper expert accountant; permission to do which the treasurer refused to give, alleging that he was in such refusal obeying the orders of the board.

The bill also states that thereupon the complainant refused and ever since has declined to take the dividend; that either soon after or shortly before that time, Mr. W. S. Dunn, the president, publicly promised and pledged himself to give the stockholders a full explanation, so that they could see for themselves that they had received or were about to receive all that was due to them as stockholders, but he never did so although the complainant from time to time reminded him of his promise; that in February, 1885, the complainant and another stockholder united in a letter to the president, in which they reminded him of his promise and requested him to give them an opportunity to examine the books with an expert accountant; that in reply he said that the request was a reasonable one, that he had long ago offered to give them full access to the books and any information they desired; that he was no longer president, and had referred their letter to Mr. F. A. Potts, president of the New York, Susquehanna and Western Railroad Company, who had all the books and papers of the Construction Company; and added that if Mr. Potts should not give them every facility which they might desire in order to make a thorough examination he would, if they would call upon him, see to it that such facilities be afforded to them; that they called upon Mr. Potts who fixed a day (the third day of March then next) upon which they were to come to his office accompanied by an expert accountant to make the examination; that on that day they went according to the appointment, to make the examination, but they were not permitted to do so; that Mr. Potts was absent but his clerk handed them a note from Mr. Dunn to them in which he said that, at the suggestion of the attorney of the Company and in obedience to the request of prominent stockholders and officers of the Company who deemed the demand for an examination of the books by an expert an insult and a reflection upon them, he was induced to say that while they should personally have every opportunity they might desire to examine the books and records of the Company at all convenient hours, such permission would not be given to anyone accompanying them nor to any expert specially employed; that that denial was not because of any apprehension whatever as to any transaction which had occurred in the history of the Company, but simply because of a desire to resent a personal affront that seemed to be contemplated by the action of the complainant and his fellow stockholders; and that if in the course of a personal examination, they should have need of any explanation he or the treasurer if called upon would cheerfully give it.

The bill further states that afterwards in the same month of March, the complainant wrote to the treasurer and asked and received from him the before mentioned "trial balance," and that at about the same time he met Mr. Potts and remonstrated with him for denying the privilege he had formerly said he would accord, and Mr. Potts said that he had nothing to do with the matter; that he was simply the custodian of the books.

The suit is brought against the Company and the directors, and the bill prays that it may be decreed that the directors were and are trustees of the property and books of the Company for the stockholders; that being such they should make manifest to the stockholders, upon reasonable request, the particulars of the management of the property; that if it can be done without incommoding the management of the business and without involving loss or risk in the management, the directors should, on such reasonable request, admit any stockholder personally, or by his lawfully constituted agent, attorney, servant or accountant, or with the aid of such person, to examine the books, etc.; and that no distribution of assets can bind the stockholder or release the directors unless the stockholder assents thereto.

The bill also prays that the defendants may be required to give the desired account in this court and bring the books, etc., into court for examination, and that the directors may be required to pay the complainant his share of the assets. It also prays an injunction against Mr. Potts, to prevent him from parting with the books, etc.

The defendants have demurred.

The case made by the bill is that the Corporation has ceased to do business, although its term of existence has not expired, and that it has not been dissolved. It has paid its debts and divided its remaining assets among the stockholders. The complainant has demanded permission to examine the books with the assistance of an expert accountant and the permission has been refused so far but only so far as to deny him the aid of the accountant. In extending to the complainant leave to examine the books himself without the assistance of an expert accountant, the president tendered the aid of himself and the treasurer to give all necessary or desired explanation in the course of the examination. There is no allegation that the complainant is not competent to examine the books for himself. There is no charge of fraud or mistake or of mismanagement of the affairs of the Company. Nor (it may be remarked in passing) is it averred that the demand was made upon the board of directors, the members of which are made defendants with the Company; although it is stated that they have deposited the books with Frederic A. Potts as their agent, and that the complainant has demanded from each one of them the privilege of examining the books, but it has been denied.

The general jurisdiction of this court over corporations does not, in the absence of express statutory authority, extend to the power of dissolving them nor does it include the power of winding-up their affairs, except under peculiar circumstances. The rights and duties of corporations are in general regulated by the common law; but where there is no plain and adequate remedy at law, and a case is presented which calls for equitable relief, a suit in equity may be maintained.

To induce this court to interfere with the management of the affairs of a corporation, or to justify it in so doing, there must be some special equitable reason, some wrong done or about to be done, for which the law will not afford adequate redress, as in Cramer v. Bird, L. R. 6 Eq. Cas. 148, where a company was extinct, and the directors had a surplus of assets after paying the debts which they refused to distribute. It was there held that a suit in equity might be maintained to compel distribution.

In this case it is not averred that the complainant has been or is about to be defrauded in the distribution of the assets. He does not allege that the portion set off to him in the final distribution is not his full share of what was then divided or that what was set off to him in the former distribution was not his full proportion of the assets which were then distributed. What he says is that he does not know whether he has been defrauded or not and cannot say whether he has received his full share in the former distributions or whether what has been set off to him in the last one is or is not his full share. To ascertain how the fact is he wants an opportunity to examine the books and papers of the Company, with the aid of an expert accountant; so that until he shall have examined the books he cannot say whether he has been aggrieved or not in the distributions. It may be that upon such examination it will be found that he has no ground of complaint on that score. He does not allege that any unlawful act has been done in the management of the affairs of the Company nor that any is meditated. Clearly, his only ground of complaint and only claim to relief now is that he has been refused permission to examine the books with the aid of an expert accountant. But that alone is not a ground for equitable interference. The law furnishes him with an adequate remedy in the writ of mandamus. High, Extr. Rem. § 308; State v. Einstein, 17 Vroom, 479.

It is urged on his behalf that the Legislature, by the fiftieth section of the Act concerning corporations (Rev. p. 186), has conferred upon this court power to compel the production of the books of a corporation. But the power conferred by that section is granted in the special case of a corporation of this State unlawfully keeping its books out of the State. The authority thus given is to be exercised in a summary way and in a special case. It is conferred not only upon the chancellor, but also upon the chief justice and each of the associate justices of the supreme court. It cannot properly be construed to confer upon this court any power over corporations which it did not possess before the passage of the Act, except that which is specifically given. The Act is indeed a remedial law and it must, notwithstanding its penal character, be construed liberally—Huyler v. Cragin Cattle Co. 18 Stew. Eq. 392 [S. C. 2 N. J.

Cent. Rep. 204]—but it will not admit of such a construction as to confer upon this court the power to compel the production of the books of a corporation for inspection and examination in cases not contemplated by the Act.

This court has of course power to compel such production for the purpose of obtaining evidence to be used in a cause; but the object of the application here is to ascertain whether there is any ground of complaint, in reference to the conduct of the directors, against whom no charge is made nor any imputation cast. No reason is presented for calling them to an account in this court, except the allegation that they deny the complainant's right to have the aid of an expert accountant in his examination of the books, and accordingly refuse to permit him to examine the books unless he do it without such assistance. The complainant sues for himself alone, to obtain permission to examine the books with professional aid to see whether he has cause of suit or not. Should an opportunity be accorded to him and should he fail to discover any fraud or mistake or culpable mismanagement this suit would be at an end. Should he find such ground of relief he would be compelled to amend his bill in order to introduce it. The law gives him an adequate remedy to enable him to discover whether he is aggrieved or not. If he shall find that he is aggrieved this court will be open to him.

The demurrer will be allowed.

1. Where an aggregate fund is given to several persons nominatim, to be divided among them in equal shares, if one of them dies before the testator the share of such decedent will lapse, unless an intention to give a right of survivorship may be deduced from other parts of the will.
2. Where the share which thus lapses is a part of the residuary estate it does not pass to the other residuary legatees as part of the residue, but must be deemed intestate estate.

BILL for construction of will, etc. On final hearing upon pleadings and stipulation of counsel as to the facts.

The facts and questions raised are set out in the opinion.

Mr. John F. Harned, for complainants.

Mr. Martin V. Bergen, for defendants.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

James Folwell, late of the County of Camden, died April 6, 1867. By his will he provided as follows: "Second, I direct my executors herein named to pay or cause to be paid unto Sarah Green, my housekeeper, the net income or interest arising from my property, either in bonds or mortgages, notes or stocks, during her natural life; and at her death I give and bequeath to my sister, Leah Ann Davis, the sum of $100. I also give and bequeath, after the death of Sarah Green, the one half of all my residuary estate unto my three sisters, Mary Little, Susan Sharp and Hannah Kemble, share and share alike, being the third part of said devise to each of them. The other remaining half of my estate I give and bequeath after the death of Sarah Green, to Rachel Collins my wife's daughter, Catherine Collins her sister and Harriet Collins, these three sisters. I bequeath to each of them the third part of one half of my residuary estate, as before noted, after the death of Sarah Green. To Mary Ann Horner of Philadelphia I give and bequeath the sum of $200."

Sarah Green died November 5, 1884. Hannah Kemble and Rachel Collins both died before the testator. The former died in 1868 before the making of the will, and the latter died in 1864. Each died intestate, leaving issue. Susan Sharp and Catherine Collins both died after the death of the testator and before the death of Sarah Green. Both died intestate leaving issue.

The questions presented for decision are the following: whether the residuary gifts in remainder were vested or contingent; whether the shares of Hannah Kemble and Rachel Collins lapsed or whether they went, on the testator's death, to the surviving residuary legatees in remainder; that is, whether the share given to Hannah Kemble went to Mary Little and Susan Sharp, and the share of Rachel Collins to Catherine and Harriet Collins.

The residuary gifts in remainder were vested and not contingent upon the event of the legatees surviving Sarah Green. Howell v. Green, 2 Vroom, 570.

Whether the legatees in remainder of each half of the residuary fund who survived the testator were entitled to the whole of the gift given to them and their deceased co-legatee, depends upon the decision of the question whether those gifts are to individuals or to a class. The rule is that where an aggregate fund is given to several persons nominatim to be divided among them in equal shares, if one of them died before the testator, the share of such decedent will lapse.

The gift in this case is to six persons by name, to each one third of one half of the residuary estate in remainder. The testator gives one half of that estate to his "three sisters, Mary Little, Susan Sharp and Hannah Kemble, share and share alike, being the third part of said devise to each of them." He previously gave $100 to his sister Leah Ann Davis. The other half of the residuary fund he gives to Rachel Collins his wife's daughter, Catherine Collins, her sister and Harriet Collins, these three sisters; and adds that he bequeaths to each of them the third part of one half of his residuary estate after the death of Sarah Green. Rachel, Catherine and Harriet Collins were not sisters but were sisters-in-law, and the first named was not the testator's wife's daughter, but her daughter-in-law.

In Cresswell v. Cheslyn, 2 Eden, 128, where a testator gave the residue of his personal estate to his three children, naming them, share and share alike, as tenants in common and not as joint tenants, and by a codicil revoked the gift as to one of them, giving to the legatee instead of it a pecuniary legacy, it was held that the residuary third, the gift of which was so revoked, did not belong to the two other residuary legatees. See also Clark v. Phillips, 17 Jur. 888; Re Stanhope's Trusts, 27 Beav. 201; Hærgal v. Harrison, 7 Beav. 49.

It is true that the mere fact that the testator in a devise or bequest to persons mentions them by name is not conclusive upon the question whether the gift is to those persons as a class or as individuals. But the rule is as above stated and there is nothing in this case to take it out of the rule.

Where the gift is to persons nominatim the intention to give a right of survivorship may be deduced from other parts of the will. The cases cited by the complainants' counsel, Jackson v. Roberts, 14 Gray, 548; Schaffer v. Ketell, 14 Allen, 528 and Stedman v. Priest, 103 Mass. 298, are instances of such construction.

In the case in hand there is nothing to indicate any intention to give to the residuary legatees in remainder as classes and not as individuals. The fact that the testator intended to give one half of the residuary fund to his three sisters of the whole blood (Leah Ann Davis was his sister of the half blood) upon whom he bestowed it and the other half to the three sisters-in-law, wives of his wife's sons, is not evidence of such intention any more than the gift of the whole to the six nominatim in equal shares would have been. The shares of Hannah Kemble and Rachel Collins, who died in the testator's lifetime, lapsed, and being shares of the residue they did not pass to the other residuary legatees as part of the residue. Hawk. Wills, 42. Consequently the testator must be held to have died intestate as to them.

The President, Directors and Company of the SOMERSET COUNTY BANK
v.

John V. VEGHTE.

1. The plea of the Statute of Limitations is good in equity as well as at law.
2. Where complainant's claim is based upon a fraud which defendant has concealed, the statutory period will not, in equity, be considered to have commenced until the fraud is discovered, or until it would have been discovered had reasonable diligence been exercised.
3. Where the alleged fraud was in the embezzlement by defendant, while acting as complainant's cashier, of their money intrusted to his hands, the claim is cognizable at law, and the statute applies to it in equity.
4. Direct trusts, as between trustee and cestui que trust, are not reached by the statute.
5. Where the bill contains only a general charge of fraud and waives an answer upon oath, discovery in aid of complainant's charge of fraud is waived also.

BILL for account. On argument of plea in bar. Adjudged good.

Messrs. Bartine & Griggs, for complainants.

Mr. F. J. Frelinghuysen & Mr. A. A. Clark, for defendant.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The bill states that in 1862, after the Bank was incorporated, it appointed the defendant its cashier, and that he assumed the duties and emoluments of the office accordingly and took into his custody all the moneys, securities, papers, books and accounts of the Bank, and so became bound to account to the Bank therefor; that he continued to hold the office continuously for twelve years; that during the whole of that time and while he was cashier, he kept an account in the Bank in his own name as county collector; that he so falsified and manipulated his accounts and books of the Bank that at or about certain dates mentioned in the bill he fraudulently embezzled and appropriated to his own use certain specified sums of money, together amounting to $2,214.60, so far as discovered, which belonged to and were held in trust by the Bank and which it was obliged by law to pay and which it did afterwards pay to the collector of Somerset County; that when in 1874 the defendant, at the end of the twelve years, ceased to be cashier of the Bank he was at once made and became president of the Institution, and thereupon assumed the responsibilities and emoluments of that office and continued therein until 1880; and that while continuing in the offices of cashier and president, he fraudulently concealed the fact of his embezzlement, so that the complainants did not and could not discover it by reason of such fraudulent concealment, until they employed an expert to examine the books in May and June, 1881, when they first learned of the embezzlement.

The bill prays answer without oath, and prays for an account and for a decree that the defendant pay what may be found due upon the account.

The defendant has pleaded to the whole of the bill. By the plea he denies the imputed embezzlement, concealment and fraud and the alleged falsification and manipulation of the account; denies that he is indebted to the Bank in the sums mentioned in the bill or any of them, and avers that the moneys with the receipt and embezzlement whereof the bill charges him (but he denies the embezzlement) were embezzled more than six years before he was served with any process of this court to answer the bill or any process whatever to account therefor. He expressly denies that by reason of his alleged fraudulent concealment the complainants could not discover the embezzlement if there had been any, until they employed an expert to examine the books and accounts in May and June, 1881; and alleges that any failure to make such discovery, if there had been any embezzlement or subtraction of funds as charged, was due to their own neglect and carelessness; that for nine years (from 1874 to the time of filing the bill) the complainants had cashiers other than the defendant, and that if there had been such embezzlement or subtraction of funds as is charged against him, it must have been known to such cashiers and to the other officers of the

N. J.

Bank. The plea then sets up the Statute of Limitations in bar to the whole of the complainants' demand.

The complainants' counsel insist that the plea is not good because it sets up the Statute of Limitations as a bar to a claim that the defendant fraudulently obtained the complainants' money and fraudulently concealed the fact that he had done so, up to a period within six years before the time of filing the bill. The plea of the statute is a good plea in equity as well as at law. Where the complainant's claim is based upon a fraud which the defendant has concealed until sufficient time has run to enable him to set up the statute, the statutory period will not, in equity, be considered to have commenced until the fraud is discovered, or until it would have been discovered had reasonable diligence been exercised. Todd v. Rafferty, 8 Stew. 254; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1521.

It is not so at law. Bd. Chosen Freeholders of Somerset Co. v. Veghte, 15 Vroom, 509.

Direct trusts as between trustee and cestui que trust are not reached by the statute. But the case in hand is not one of those to which the statute is not applicable. The alleged fraud was in the embezzlement by the defendant while acting as cashier of the complainants, of their money intrusted to his hands. The claim against him arising therefrom is one cognizable at law. If so, the statute applies to it in equity. Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. 90; Angell, Lim. § 178.

The complainants' counsel insist that in the case of Williams v. Reilly, 14 Stew. 137 [3 Cent. Rep. 673], it was held that one who was sued in this court for dereliction and malfeasance, in an office similar to that held by the defendant, could not avail himself of the Statute of Limitations. In that case the suit was indeed against the defendant for dereliction and malfeasance in the office of treasurer of a savings bank, and it was held that the Statute of Limitations was not a defense to the bill; but it was so adjudged, on the ground that he was a member of the board of managers of the bank, and the object of the bill was to charge him in the interest of the depositors, with dereliction of duty as a manager holding an office of special trust, the office of treasurer, in the management.

It was held in Williams v. McKay, 18 Stew. 189, that the managers of a savings bank stand in the relationship of trustees to the depositors, so that the Statute of Limitations will not be a bar against a charge of mismanagement on their part which occurred more than six years before the filing of the bill.

The plea in this case is what is known as an anomalous plea, because it is partly affirmative and partly negative; affirmative, in setting up the statute; and negative, in denying the fraud. Story, Eq. Pl. § 802; Lang. Eq. Pl. § 101.

And that is the form of a plea of the statute in such a case. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 269, Story, Eq. Pl. § 754.

It is a rule that anomalous pleas must always be supported by an answer in subsidiū as to the allegations which constitute the replication and as to all charges of evidence, if any, in support of such allegations. Lang. Eq. Pl. § 101; Bea. Pleas in Eq. 171.

The plea in this case is not accompanied by an answer. No objection is made however to it on that account. On the subject of concealment the bill merely alleges that the defendant, while cashier and president, concealed the fraud so that the complainants did not discover it until 1881; and it prays answer without oath.

A mere unsworn general denial would therefore have answered the call of the bill in respect to the alleged concealment. The object in requiring the answer is to obtain a discovery which may prove a case which will displace the bar. But where the bill contains a general charge of fraud merely, with no specification, and waives answer upon oath, discovery in aid of the complainant's charge of fraud is practically and substantially waived also.

In view of these considerations and of the fact that no objection is made upon the ground that the defendant has not answered, the requirement of the rule may, in this case, very properly be disregarded.

The plea is good in form and substance.

Eliza McMONIGLE

v.

Bridget McMONIGLE et al.

1. A decree for a specific performance will not be granted upon uncorroborated evidence of the complainant, where a defendant denies the making of the agreement sought to be enforced.
2. A widow is not bound to pay rent for the occupancy of the house in which she and her husband dwelt before his death, until after the assignment of her dower.
3. Where no one appeared to claim the realty by descent, the widow is entitled to reasonable compensation for collecting the rents thereon, when she is called upon to account.
4. A widow cannot claim reimbursement for money expended in the improvement of her husband's property, when it appears that such money, in the main, was derived from her husband's business, and her earnings therein, and was voluntarily contributed to make such improvement; and it seems probable that a conveyance of real estate executed to her by the procurement of her husband secured to her a much larger sum than she possessed at the date of her marriage.

BILL for partition, etc. On final hearing upon pleadings and proofs.

Mr. H. A. Drake, for complainant.

Mr. R. S. Jenkins, for Bridget McMonigle, widow.

Ranyn, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The bill is filed by Eliza McMonigle, a sister of Patrick McMonigle, late of Gloucester City in this State, deceased, who died without issue and intestate, July 4, 1881, against his widow and the complainant's sisters, who with her are the heirs at law of the decedent. It alleges that he in his lifetime was seized in severalty of five contiguous lots of land in Gloucester City, and that in March, 1863, another lot was conveyed to him and his wife Bridget, by Richard Price; that in December, 1880, they conveyed that lot to her sister Catherine Friel, in order that the latter might convey it to her, which she did in March, 1881, and that the consideration of the conveyance by him of his interest in that property to Catherine Friel was an agreement between him and his wife that if he would do so she would release and convey all her interest, including her right of dower, in all the other property, to his sister Eliza, the complainant, for the equal benefit of Eliza and his other sisters; and the bill further states that after having by that means induced him to convey his interest in the Price property she refused to carry out the agreement on her part. Since her husband's death the widow has continued to live upon one of the five lots, in the house in which she and her husband resided at the time of his death.

The bill prays that the widow may be required to perform specifically the before mentioned alleged agreement and that she may account for the rents collected by her, and it prays partition of the five lots. By her answer the widow denies the agreement. She avers that the improvements put upon the five lots were placed there by her and her husband jointly, and that she contributed thereto a large amount of her own money; but she claims only her dower and compensation for collecting the rents and taking care of the property since her husband's death, which she says she was compelled to do because no one appeared to claim the property by descent from him.

The evidence upon the subject of the agreement is by no means such as to establish it. It is principally the testimony of the complainant herself. She swears to admissions which she says were made to her by the widow in her husband's lifetime. They are to the effect that Patrick would not agree to execute the deed to Catherine Friel for his wife's benefit until the latter agreed to join him in a conveyance of the other property to the complainant in trust for the benefit of herself and her sisters. She also swears that Bridget gave her the reasons which induced her to obtain the conveyance to Catherine Friel. The statement which she says Bridget made on the latter head is rambling and incoherent and to a considerable degree unintelligible.

As to the alleged admissions, Mrs. McMonigle denies absolutely and positively that she made them; and there is no substantial corroboration of the complainant's statement. Mr. Gorman, the scrivener who drew the instrument, indeed says that when the deed to Catherine Friel was signed by Patrick he, the scrivener, understood that there was some agreement between Patrick and his wife; that she promised to do something which she had not done and which Patrick wanted her to do. He says he did not pay much attention to the conversation and cannot recollect whether what Patrick wanted his wife to do had any relation to the making of the deed to Catherine Friel or not. He says also that there were no other deeds that he knows of, which Patrick and his wife proposed to execute at that time; that he thinks Bridget directed him to draw the deed to Catherine Friel and that Patrick was not with her when she gave the direction; that Bridget, he thinks, had some trouble to get her husband to his, the scrivener's, office to sign that deed; but he also says that he cannot say that he recollects any such agreement between them as that which the complainant says Bridget stated to her was the inducement to her husband to sign the Friel deed. He says he knows of no such agreement.

The testimony of Mrs. Gorman, his wife, furnishes no corroboration. She testifies that Patrick called upon her at a time which she cannot fix, and requested her to tell her husband "not to go on with those papers, for Bridget would not sign them; that he had signed and she would not." But it does not appear that he had directed the scrivener to draw any papers. Moreover, from the statements of the witness as to Patrick's appearance and manner it would seem probable that at that time he was not entirely sane. Further, on the part of the widow it is proved that her husband had, as he and she supposed, conveyed his interest in the property to her in November, 1867, by a deed from him to her, for the consideration of $1, which deed was recorded in the same month. Mrs. McMonigle says that the deed to Catherine Friel was made because she had learned, when she was taking proceedings to dispossess a tenant of the property for non-payment of the rent, that that deed was not valid because it was made by a husband to his wife directly; and she is corroborated in this to a certain extent, at least, by the testimony of Mr. Gorman.

The widow is entitled to her dower in the property of which partition is sought. She must account for the rents received by her since her husband's death, but will of course be entitled to proper allowances for taxes, expense of repairs, interest upon incumbrances, etc. For aught that appears she is entitled to reasonable compensation for collecting the rents. Her dower has never been assigned to her. She is therefore not bound to pay rent for the house which she has occupied since her husband's death. As before stated it is the house in which she and he dwelt when he died.

The claim which she set up upon the hearing, to reimbursement for moneys of her own expended in the purchase of the five lots and improvements thereon in the lifetime of her husband, cannot be allowed. It is quite clear from the evidence that the money which she says she so contributed was, in the main at least, derived from her husband's business and her earnings therein and was voluntarily contributed to the purchase and improvement of her husband's property. It seems quite probable that the conveyance of the Price property to her secured to her all the money ($650) which she claims to have had when she was married and much more besides. She was married in 1858, and that property was conveyed to her and her husband in 1868. Her husband conveyed his interest in it to her in 1867.

The consideration of the deed from Price appears to have been $600. They afterwards improved the property by building upon it. It may be remarked that the consideration mentioned in the deed to Catherine Friel is $3,000.

N. J.

This is probably some indication (it may be but slight however) as to what the improvements upon the property cost, and if so, it may well be that in that property she has all her separate estate. It may be added that although she alleges in her answer that she spent her own money in improvements upon the property of which partition is sought she does not allege that she spent any in the purchase of the land; and as before stated, in the answer she claims only her dower and compensation for collecting the rents since her husband's death.

BILLS for construction of will, etc. On final hearing on pleadings and proofs.

*See Hutton's Exrs. v. Hutton, 2 Cent. Rep. 213; Landon v. Huitfeldt, 3 Cent. Rep. 379.

The facts and questions raised are set out in the opinion.

Mr. Cortlandt Parker and Mr. E. H. Landon of N. Y., for executors.

Messrs. Frederick Frelinghuysen, A. P. Whitehead of N. Y., and Benjamin Williamson, for Countess de Moltke-Huitfeldt.

Messrs. Benjamin Williamson and A. P. Whitehead, for Marquise de Portes.

Mr. T. N. McCarter and Mr. John Cadwalader, of N. Y., for Charles G. Hutton.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

Benjamin H. Hutton, late of West Orange in the County of Essex, died February 17, 1894. His wife was then dead. He left three children, Major Charles Gordon Hutton, Anna Mary, Countess de Moltke-Huitfeldt, and Adele, Marquise de Portes. The two daughters are widows. Madame de Moltke has no issue. Madame de Portes has two children, the present Marquise de Portes and the Comte de Portes. Mr. Hutton left a will with seven codicils. By the residuary clause, the 12th, of the will he provided as follows:

"All the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, real as well as personal, of whatsoever nature and wheresoever situate, I give, devise and bequeath unto my executors, their heirs, executors and administrators, as joint tenants and not as tenants in common, in trust:

"1. To set apart and make a valuation and estimate of the same in gold or silver coin of the United States, or the equivalent of such coin in currency, so called, according to the then market rate of such coin in currency, and thereupon to invest (so far as shall not already be done) and keep invested a sufficient amount and fund not less than two hundred thousand dollars ($200,000), reckoned in American gold or silver coin as aforesaid, to pay the income of such amount and fund to my wife Ann Hutton Gordon Hutton, during her natural life.

"If the income of the said fund shall not amount to the sum of ten thousand dollars ($10,000) per annum, reckoned in such gold or silver coin, then my executors shall take from the proceeds or income of the remainder of my said estate, or its income, a sufficient sum from time to time as may be necessary to insure to my said wife the said sum of ten thousand dollars ($10,000) in such coin per annum, payable half yearly as aforesaid.

"2. After deducting the foregoing bequest of two hundred thousand dollars ($200,000) for the benefit of my wife, I desire my executors to set apart all the rest and remainder of my said residuary estate, and to add to and estimate with the same the sum of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000) (provided in and by said contract of marriage, referred to in the second article hereof, to be paid to my daughter Adele, and her husband), and thereupon to divide the aggregate, or sum thereof, into three parts as follows: one part of forty (40) per cent and two parts of thirty (30) per cent each, and after such division to invest, if not already done, and keep invested, one of said parts of thirty (30) per cent, less the sum of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000) in gold or silver coin, so as aforesaid heretofore contracted to be paid by me to my daughter Adele, and her husband, which I direct to be deducted from said thirty (30) per cent, and apply the income of said thirty (30) per cent, after such deduction, half yearly to the use of my said daughter Adele during her natural life, free from the control or interference of her husband, or from any liability for his debts; and upon her death to assign and pay the same to her issue and their heirs in equal shares per stirpes. But if she die without issue, then to my issue per stirpes, or if none of my issue be then living, to my next of kin, in equal shares per stirpes.

"3. The other thirty (30) per cent of such aggregate I direct my executors to invest so far as not already done and keep invested and apply the income thereof half yearly to the use of my daughter Anna, wife of the Count Harold de Moltke-Huitfeldt, during her natural life, free from all control, interference or dominion of her husband, and from any liability for his debts; and after her death, assign and convey the principal of said thirty (30) per cent to her issue and their heirs in equal shares per stirpes. But if my daughter Anna shall leave no issue at the time of her death her surviving, and her husband Harold the Count de Moltke-Huitfeldt, shall survive her, the sum of thirty thousand dollars ($30,000) in gold or silver coin of the United States, part of the moneys herein directed to be invested for her benefit, shall be paid to her said husband absolutely, and the remainder of said thirty (30) per cent to go to my issue, or if none of my issue be then living to my next of kin in equal shares per stirpes.

"4. If the remaining forty (40) per cent of said aggregate above described shall amount to four hundred thousand dollars ($400,000) I direct my executors to pay to my son, Charles Gordon Hutton, the sum of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) reckoned in American gold and silver coin (which I give him absolutely, and advise and request him to invest and keep invested in real estate); and my executors are thereupon to invest, so far as not already done, and keep invested the remainder of said forty (40) per cent of said aggregate, and apply the income thereof half yearly to the use of my said son during his natural life. If the said forty (40) per cent shall not amount to the sum of four hundred thousand dollars ($400,000), I direct that the whole of the said forty (40) per cent be so invested and the income thereof applied to the use of my son as hereinabove directed, and upon his death, pay, assign and convey the principal or capital of such sum or fund to his issue in equal shares per stirpes, and in fee simple; or if he leave no issue him surviving, but leave his present wife him surviving, to keep invested the sum of thirty thousand dollars ($30,000) reckoned as aforesaid in American gold or silver coin at its nominal or lawful value, and apply the income thereof half yearly to her use during her natural life, if she remain so long unmarried, or during her widowhood, if she marry again, and upon her death or remarriage (whichever shall first occur) to pay, assign, convey and deliver the same to my issue then surviving and their heirs in equal shares per stirpes; or for want of such issue to my next of kin then surviving, and their heirs, in like shares per stirpes.

"5. Should either of my said children die leaving no issue him or her surviving, the share of the residue of my estate devoted primarily to the benefit of such child (except as respects the share set apart for my son and his issue; and in case my son's present wife survive him, the fund of thirty thousand dollars ($30,000) contingently appropriated for her benefit during her life, and except the thirty thousand dollars ($30,000) above bequeathed to Harold, the Count de Moltke-Huitfeldt, husband of my daughter Anna, is to go to increase the shares of such residue held by my executors in trust for the benefit of the survivors and their issue respectively.

"6. After the death of my said wife the said fund of two hundred thousand dollars ($200,000) set apart for her use, is to be divided in equal shares among my three children Charles Gordon Hutton, Anna, Countess de Moltke-Huitfeldt, and Adele, Marchioness de Portes (all of whom are now residing in France), respectively; or if either of my said children shall not survive me, to his or her issue respectively, or leaving no issue, to the survivor or survivors of my said children, and if all be dead to their issue per stirpes, absolutely. If at the time of my death all my children shall be dead, leaving no issue, then the said fund to go to my next of kin per stirpes."

"I have heretofore become responsible for certain sums of money loaned to the Marquis de Portes (husband of my daughter Adele), by Auguste Seydoux, Seiber & Company, on his estate of Portes, in or near Mire Poix, France; and, as I may make further loans and advances on said estate or may purchase the same, it is my will that the whole of such loans, advances or purchase money shall form part of and be deducted from the share or interest of my daughter Adele, in and to my residuary estate, as provided for as before mentioned; and that the same and the securities taken upon such loans be assigned and transferred to her as and for her sole and separate estate as aforesaid, and be subject in all things to the provisions of my will in respect of her said share. In the event of my purchasing or becoming the possessor of the said estate of Portes in France, I give and devise the said estate of Portes to my daughter Adele, if she survive me; if not, to her issue by the said Marquis de Portes. If my daughter Adele shall not survive me or shall die without issue, then the said estate of Portes shall go to my issue and their heirs; or if there shall, at the time or her death, be no issue of mine living, then to my next of kin, in equal shares, per stirpes.

"If the share of my said residuary estate herein above provided to be paid to my daughter Adele after deducting the said sum of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000) referred to in the second article of my will, be insufficient to pay the amount of loans and advances I may have made at the time of my death on the said estate of Portes, then and in that case I direct that the excess of such advances over and above such share of my daughter Adele after such deduction be assumed and paid by my said daughter and lawfully secured as a lien upon the said estate and paid to my said executors at such time and manner as may be just and reasonable."

By the first codicil (made June 6, 1870), he made the following provision:

"Having purchased in the year 1867, of Mr. Richard Lalor Power, his estate of Bilhere, and also certain other lands and premises near Pau, Basses Pyrenees, in France, and now owning the same absolutely in fee, it is my will that if, within three years after the date of my death, the said Richard Lalor Power, or any other person in his behalf, shall pay to my executors the amount actually paid by me for and on account of the said estate and the said lands and premises, and the mortgages thereupon, as appears by my books of account, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per centum per annum, I hereby authorize and empower my executors to convey, by good and sufficient conveyance, all the said estate of Bilhere and the said other lands and premises near Pau, as aforesaid, to the said Richard Lalor Power, his heirs and assigns, as he may direct.

"If, within three years from the date of my death, such payment shall not have been made by the said Power, or in his behalf as aforesaid, I order and direct my executors to sell the said estate of Bilhere, and the said other lands and premises, at public or private sale, to the best advantage practicable, and after applying the proceeds of such sale to the payment of all amounts which may have been, up to that time, paid by me for or on account of the said estate and lands and mortgages thereon, to invest the surplus, if any, arising on such sale, in United States or state stocks or bonds, and to pay the income thereof, annually, to Sarah Gordon Power, wife of the said Richard Lalor Power, during her natural life; and after her death to pay the principal, and any accrued interest there may be, to Bimba Power and Mary Power, daughters of said Sarah Gordon Power, or the survivor of them, in equal shares, or in case of the death of either the said Bimba or Mary before the death of their said mother, to their issue per stirpes. Such payment to be for the sole use and benefit of the said Bimba and Mary, as their separate estate, free from all interference, control or debts of their respective husbands.

"If this disposition of the said property so purchased of the said Richard Lalor Power, and of its avails shall, by the laws of France, in any manner affect or impair the rights of any heirs, then it is my will that, unless my said heirs shall in such manner as is required by such law, signify their assent to such disposition of the said property and its avails, and transfer their respective shares in the surplus thereof, after payment of my advances thereon, to the said Richard Lalor Power or the said Sarah Gordon Power and her daughters, in accordance with the provisions of this codicil; then, and in that case, an amount equal to the share or proportion of such surplus which those of my heirs who shall not consent to such disposition of such surplus would inherit by law, shall be deducted from that portion of my said estate which is by my said will bequeathed to such heirs so not consenting, and shall be paid out of the bulk of my residuary estate to the said Richard Lalor Power or the said Sarah Gordon Power and her two daughters, in the contingencies and events hereinabove provided for in respect of the said persons respectively."

This codicil contains the following also:

"If my daughter Anna shall have issue who shall, at the time of her death, be dead, then I direct my executors (after deducting thirty thousand dollars for her husband, Count Harold de Moltke-Huitfeldt, and to be paid over by them to him) to pay the said thirty (30) per cent and its avails to my issue; or if none of my issue be then living, to my next of kin, in equal shares per stirpes."

The third codicil (made June 10, 1872), contains the following provision:

"I change and modify subdivision 4, of article 12 of my said will, which relates to my son Charles Gordon Hutton, as follows:

"I direct my executors to deduct from the forty per cent bequeathed in said subdivision, for the use of my said son and his heirs, such amount as shall be found charged on my said books of account under the heading 'Charles Gordon Hutton, special account.' If at the time of my death all the said debts of my said son shall not have been paid, and there shall be charged to him in said special account on my said books a sum less than two hundred thousand dollars, and not otherwise, I hereby direct my executors to deduct from said forty per cent, a sum which when added to the amount so charged to my said son on said special account shall not exceed, in the whole, the sum of two hundred thousand dollars, and to apply such sum to the payment of such of the said debts as may remain unliquidated, in such manner and proportion as my said son shall designate.

"Out of the residue of the said forty per cent after such deduction shall have been made, if there shall be so much, I direct my executors to pay to my said son the sum of fifty thousand dollars, and the whole of such residue, if it be less than fifty thousand dollars, which I give to him absolutely, and request and advise him to invest and keep invested in real estate; and the remainder, if any, of said forty per cent after such deduction for said debts and said sum of fifty thousand dollars, as herein provided, I direct my executors to invest and keep invested as they may see fit, and pay the income arising from such remainder to my said son during his life, and after his death to pay the principal of such remainder to his issue in equal shares per stirpes and in fee simple; and if my said son leave no issue him surviving, but leave his present wife surviving him, I direct my executors to invest the sum of thirty thousand dollars of such remainder, if there be so much, and the whole thereof, if it be less than such sum, and keep the same invested as they may see fit, and pay the income arising therefrom half yearly to her use during her natural life, if she remain so long unmarried, or during her widowhood if she marry again; and upon her death or remarriage (whichever event first occur) to pay, assign, convey and deliver the same to my issue then surviving and their heirs, in equal shares per stirpes, or for want of such issue, to my next of kin then surviving and their heirs, in like shares per stirpes.

the amounts provided and directed in and by my said will to go to my wife and to my two daughters, or any of the other legatees, besides my said son.

"And in no event shall more be paid to or received by my said son than the forty per cent so as aforesaid bequeathed to him in and by my said will, less the amount charged to him on my said books of account under the said heading of 'Charles Gordon Hutton, special account.'

"No interest is to be charged to my said son in the said account on my books."

The fourth codicil (made August 2, 1873), provides as follows:

"I change and modify so much of the twelfth (12th) article of my said will as relates to the payment of the bequest to my son, Charles Gordon Hutton; and also so much of the second codicil to my said will as relates to the bequest to said Charles Gordon Hutton, as follows:

"I direct my executors, after deducting, in pursuance of the terms of the said codicil, the sum of two hundred thousand dollars ($200,000) from the forty (40) per cent provided in the said twelfth (12th) article to be invested for the benefit of my son, to invest and keep invested the remainder of said forty per cent as they may see fit, and pay and appropriate from time to time, as may be necessary, the income and avails thereof to the maintenance and support of my said son and of his wife, and the maintenance, support and education of their children, severally as well as jointly, in such way as may befit their circumstances and station in life during the life of my said son; and after his death, I direct my executors to deduct from the fund then in their hands, for the benefit of my said son and the several members of his family, the sum of thirty thousand dollars ($30,000); and to divide the remainder thereof into as many shares as there shall be children of my son then living (or who being dead shall leave issue); and to pay to each of said children, when he or she shall respectively attain the age of twenty-five years, an equal share of said fund as so divided, and also to pay to such issue, equally, the share to which their parent would have been entitled had such parent attained the age of twenty-five years.

"Each of said children and the issue of any child deceased shall, in the meantime, receive so much of the income of the share so bequeathed to them respectively until the time of the payment of said principal, as herein provided, as in the discretion of my executors may be necessary for their proper maintenance, support and education.

"The income from the said thirty thousand dollars ($30,000) so deducted from such remainder of said forty per cent to go to Henrietta McCarty, the wife of my said son, until her death or marriage, and the principal to be distributed, in case of her death or marriage, as provided in the said second codicil to my said will.

"Fifth. In all other respects than as herein provided I confirm and declare the said will, and the first and second codicils thereto, to be in full force and effect."

The sixth codicil (made June 22, 1875), contains the following provision:

"I am about to dispose of the estate of Bilhere, near Pau, in France, mentioned in the foregoing codicil to my last will and testament; and to provide, in the manner contemplated by such codicil, for Mrs. Sarah Gordon Power and her two daughters, Bimba Power and Mary Power. In the event of my making such disposition or any arrangement and provision for the said persons, it is my will that all the provisions of the foregoing codicil to my said will relating to the said estate of Bilhere and to the said Sarah Gordon Power, Bimba Power and Mary Power, respectively, shall be and hereby are revoked and canceled."

The seventh codicil (made November 19, 1880) contains the following:

"I am about conveying to Mrs. Henrietta Hutton, wife of my son Charles G. Hutton, the house and lands at Bilhere, as now occupied by my son, for her separate use and benefit; this grant of this property is not to be charged against my son or his said wife as an advancement or otherwise; nor is it to affect any provision of my will in behalf of my said son or of his said wife."

It appears from the evidence that in October or November, 1880, the testator directed his son to have a deed from him to the latter's wife, for the Bilhere property, drawn up. It was drawn accordingly, but on account of the illness of the testator it was not presented to him and he died without executing it. The property consists of two parcels of land on one of which is a small house. The testator's son occupied the premises with his family for several years before and up to his father's death without rent; the testator giving him the use thereof and making an allowance of $2,000 a year to each of his, the testator's, two daughters during the same time for the payment of house rent. While the son was so occupying the premises, the testator sold part of the property upon which was a stable upon which, in fitting it up and arranging it, the son had gone to considerable expense. There was also upon it a small stone house which the son had built for his coachmen and other men servants.

In consequence of that sale the son was compelled to rent the stable and the small stone house from the purchaser. The son made, at the suggestion of the testator, certain improvements in the dwelling house upon the property at a cost of about $5,500. He paid taxes and assessments upon the property, and filled in the land to a very considerable extent. He claims that his expenditures upon the property were made under an understanding with the testator that the latter was to give him the property. And he claims also that under all the circumstances of the case he is entitled to a decree awarding the property to his wife.

In 1881 the testator, with the consent and at the request of his three children, lent $50,000 to the wife of his son, taking as security her bond dated September 6, in that year, payable in one year, with interest; and an agreement from her to give him a mortgage upon her share (one third) of her deceased father's real estate in the City of New York, for the partitioning whereof proceedings were then pending, so soon as such share should be set off in severalty to her, or to pay him the money out of her share of the proceeds of the sale of the property in case it should be sold under those proceedings. The money was borrowed for her husband's benefit and went to him.

On or about July 24, 1874, the testator executed with the Marquis de Portes in France, in accordance with the law of that country, an antichresis upon the estate de Portes, which acknowledged a loan of 280,000 francs and provided for a credit of 100,000 francs more, to be appropriated to the improvement of the estate. The testator, it is alleged, advanced all of the latter sum, and in addition to that money advanced other large sums; and there stands charged upon his books of account, up to and including January 1, 1885, the sum of about $240,000, as having been paid out under the antichresis for the benefit of the estate de Portes at the request of the Marquis de Portes and his wife, the testator's daughter. The antichresis by its terms was given to secure not only the payment of the 280,000 francs and the credit of 100,000 francs and the interest upon those sums, but also the repayment of all charges and other items.

Of the questions specifically presented by the bill in the case first above mentioned (Hurlbut v. Hutton), it is necessary to answer but two. The others have been disposed of by arrangement or agreement of parties. One of the questions to be considered is whether any part of the legacies to Charles Gordon Hutton should be applied to the payment of the $50,000 loan to his wife, and the other is as to what disposition the executors should make in reference to the Bilhere property. Of the questions presented by the cross bill of the Countess de Moltke-Huitfeldt and the Marquise de Portes, but two remain. One is whether the provision for the payment of $50,000 to Charles Gordon Hutton provided for in the fourth section of the residuary clause of the will, and referred to in the third codicil, was not revoked by the above quoted provision of the fourth codicil. The other is whether it is not the duty of the executors to set off to the two daughters, at their option, "certain real estate" of the testator on account of their legacies.

By the bill in the case secondly above mentioned (Whiting v. de Portes), the complainants ask directions as to whether they shall, when the affairs of the estate de Portes shall have been fully settled and ascertained, charge the moneys due the testator therefrom against his daughter Adele (Marquise de Portes) and deduct them from the bequests to her; and if so, from which of them; and whether any part of the advances or payments is to be remitted to her or for her benefit, and what disposition the executors are to make of the antichresis and its several provisions according to the laws of France; and if, upon the accounting in respect to the payments and advances, the amount due shall be found to be greater than the value of the estate, whether they shall proceed to sell the estate and charge any remainder or deficiency to the account of Madame de Portes, or whether she shall have her election to take the estate at its fair value to be ascertained by appraisement; and whether, in case the advances exceed the appraised value, the excess is to be charged to her against the bequests in her favor; and whether, in case of an appraisement, it should be found that the amount of the valuation of the estate exceeds the amount due for advances, Madame de Portes and her children, the present Marquis de Portes and Comte de Portes, may be directed and required to pay off the amount due for advances and take a discharge or assignment of the antichresis; and the bill further prays that in case Madame de Portes and her children refuse to pay or otherwise adjust the money due for the advances, the executors may be instructed how to proceed to enforce the antichresis according to the laws of France and to hold Madame de Portes liable so far as the bequests to her are concerned for any deficiency. The executors ask also whether they are to charge the $100,000 provided for in the antenuptial agreement between Madame de Portes and her late husband and known as her dot, with the payment, so far as it will go, of the advances made for the estate de Portes. They also inquire whether in case of the death of Madame de Moltke without issue, the 30 per cent mentioned in the residuary clause of the will, the interest whereof is payable to her for life, will on her decease go to the executors to be held as part of the estate for the benefit of her brother and sister for life, with remainder to their issue; or whether it will go immediately to the brother and sister or their issue.

The $50,000 loan was made by the testator to the wife of Charles G. Hutton. She gave him her bond with an agreement pledging her own separate property to secure the repayment of the money with interest. Her husband admits that the loan was for his benefit and that the security therefor was given with his knowledge and at his request and that he received the money; he insists that the loan was amply secured. The bill gives no reason for seeking payment of the loan out of the legacies to him. The executors do not appear to have failed in any effort to collect the money. Indeed they do not appear to have attempted to collect it. Nor do they suggest that there is any obstacle in the way of collecting it. There seems to be no occasion for either asking or giving instructions on the subject. Nor does there seem to be any occasion for considering what equity would require, in case the money so lent at the request and for the benefit of the husband, upon the wife's bond and agreement, must be lost to the estate unless it be retained out of the money coming to the husband under the will.

As to the Bilhere property; the first reference to it is made in the first codicil where the testator provides for the conveyance of the premises by his executors to Richard Lalor Power, his heirs or assigns, on the payment to the executors within three years from the date of the testator's death, of the amount actually paid by the testator for and on account of the property and the mortgages thereon, with interest. He provides also that if Power should not make such payment within the limited period, his executors shall sell the property, and after applying the proceeds so far as necessary, to making such payment, invest the surplus for the benefit of Powers' wife for her life, with remainder to her two daughters or their issue. By the sixth codicil (which was made in 1875) he declares that he is about to dispose of the property and to provide in the manner contemplated in the fifth codicil for Mrs. Powers and her two daughters; and provides that in the event of his making such disposition or any provision or arrangement for those persons, all the provisions of the fifth codicil relating to the property and to Mrs. Powers and her daughters be revoked and canceled.

By the seventh codicil (which was made in 1880, about five years afterward) he says: "I am about conveying to Mrs. Henrietta Hutton, wife of my son Charles G. Hutton, the house and lands at Bilhere; as now occupied by my son, for her separate use and benefit; this grant of this property is not to be charged against my said son or his said wife as an advancement or otherwise, nor is it to affect any provision of my will in behalf of my said son or of his said wife."

Charles G. Hutton says that at or about the time of making that codicil (November, 1880) the testator said to him that he would convey the property to his, Charles G. Hutton's wife; and he further says that he was directed to have a deed drawn accordingly and he did so, but that it was not executed, merely because of the testator's illness. In fact it was never presented to him for his signature, although he lived for more than three years afterwards. He did not die until February, 1884. That he was capable of doing business after the time of making the seventh codicil sufficiently appears from the fact that the loan of $50,000 to his son's wife was made in September, 1881, nearly a year afterwards.

The property in question did not pass to Charles G. Hutton's wife by the clause in the seventh codicil. That clause is merely expressive of an intention on the part of the testator to convey the property at a future time to his daughter-in-law; and it provides that in the event of his making such conveyance, the grant should not be charged to her or to her husband either as an advancement or in any other way; and that it should not affect any provision in the will in favor of either of them; that is, in case he should convey the property to her, it was to be regarded as a gift, independent of any provisions of the will in favor of them or either of them. This mere expression of an intention to grant by deed or other appropriate conveyance inter vivos is not and cannot be construed to be a devise. The provision is not only not a devise, but it is not even expressive of an intention to devise. The law upon the subject of implied devises is thoroughly settled. The policy of the law and the leaning of the courts is against the doctrine of devises by implication. Holton v. White, 8 Zab. 380.

To create a devise by inference the implication must be a necessary one; there must be such a strong probability of an intention to devise that an intent to the contrary cannot be supposed. 2 Pow. Dev. 199.

Said Lord Eldon in Dashwood v. Peyton, 18 Ves. 27, 41: "I find no authority for holding a mere recital, without more, to amount to a gift or demonstration of an intention to give." Even where a testator in the codicil recites that by his will he has made a devise or bequest, which does not there appear, the codicil does not, by such recital, create that bequest or devise.

Sir John Romilly, M.R., in Re Arnold's Estate, 33 Beav. 163, 171, where a testator bequeathed all his real and personal estate to a person whom he named, but stated that on his (the testator's) death his father's property would, under his father's will, devolve upon his nephews, which was not the fact, for it formed part of the testator's estate, it was held that the father's property did not pass, under the will. Circuit v. Perry, 23 Beav. 275.

The law upon the subject is clearly laid down in Denise v. Denise, 10 Stew. 163. See also McCoury's Errs. v. Leek, 1 McCart. 70.

In the case before me there is no recital of a devise nor any expression or indication of any intention to devise. The testator merely said that he meant soon to convey the property to his daughter-in-law. He lived for several years afterwards and never made the gift. The presumption is that he changed his mind in reference to the matter. But whether he abandoned the design or not is of no consequence. It is enough to say here that he did not devise the property to the daughter-in-law. Nor is there any evidence of any contract upon which, if such claim were made in the pleadings, it could be held that the testator was bound either to convey or devise the property to his daughter-in-law, and that, in view of the fact that he neither devised nor conveyed, equity would decree a conveyance by his heirs or devisees.

It may be added that for aught that appears the provision in the first codicil for the benefit of Mr. Power is still in force. The three years from the time of the testator's death within which Mr. Power had the privilege of buying will not expire until February, 1887; and the contingent provision for the benefit of Mrs. Power and her daughters is for a sale by the executors after the expiration of the three years in case Mr. Powers should not purchase.

Nor can this court give the executors directions as to the conveyance of the Bilhere property. Whether they can convey it or not depends upon the law of France. It is in evidence by the opinion of an expert in the law of that country, introduced by the consent of parties, that under those laws the executors cannot convey it and that the title to the property is in the children of the testator; by the first codicil the testator (in view of the fact that his executors might not be able, under the law of France, to make conveyance of the property as directed by that instrument) directs that in case of such inability on the part of the executors his children be practically put to an election. No question has as yet arisen on that head.

As to the $50,000 which by the residuary clause of the will and by the third codicil the testator expressly directs the executors to pay to his son; by the will the testator orders that if 40 per cent of his residuary estate shall amount to $400,000, the executors shall pay to his son $50,000 (which he gives to him absolutely) and that they shall invest the residue of the 40 per cent for the benefit of his son for life; the principal, upon his son's death, to go to his son's family.

By the third codicil he provides for the deduction of $200,000 from the 40 per cent and then directs that out of the residue of the 40 per cent his executors pay to his son $50,000, if there be so much left; and if there should be less than that sum left, that they pay him the whole of the residue; and if there should be any remainder after deducting the $250,000 from the amount of the 40 per cent, that it be invested for his benefit for life and that they pay the principal at his death to his issue.

X. J.

By the fourth codicil referring to the twelfth article of the will and to the third codicil (which he designates as the second, probably because having previously revoked the second codicil he regarded it as if it had never been made) he directs that his executors—after deducting in pursuance of the terms of the third codicil, the $200,000 from the 40 per cent which it is provided in the twelfth article of the will shall be invested for the benefit of his son—invest and keep invested the remainder of the 40 per cent and pay and appropriate, as may be necessary, the income and avails thereof to the support of his son and his son's wife and the maintenance, support and education of their children, etc.; and that after his son's death they distribute and dispose of the fund as directed by that (fourth) codicil.

The sole object of the testator in modifying by the fourth codicil the provisions of the will and of the third codicil in respect to the 40 per cent, was to provide for the payment or appropriation during his son's life, of the income of the money to be invested to the support of his son and his son's wife and the support and education of their children (by the will and the third codicil he had directed that it be paid to his son alone), and to make a different disposition of the fund after his son's death from that which was made by those instruments.

There is no evidence in the provisions of the fourth codicil that he intended to deprive his son of the $50,000. What he deals with there is the fund which by the will he had provided should be invested for the benefit of his son. His language is: "I direct my executors, after deducting in pursuance of the terms of the said codicil (the third) the sum of $200,000 from the 40 per cent, provided in the said twelfth article to be invested, etc." But he had not by the will directed that the 40 per cent be invested; but only so much of it, if any, as might remain after deducting the $50,000. And by the third codicil he had directed the investment of only so much of the 40 per cent as should remain after deducting the $200,000 and the $50,000. By both the will and the third codicil he had given to his son the $50,000 absolutely and with his special advice and request as to the manner in which he should invest it, in real estate. He does not by the fourth codicil revoke that gift expressly nor does he refer to it. Had he intended to revoke it, it is reasonable to presume that he would have done so expressly. The fund which he had in mind in the provision of the fourth codicil was evidently not the 40 per cent, but only that part of it which by the will and third codicil, taken together, he had directed the executors to invest; that is, what should remain after deducting the $50,000 and the $200,000. The son is entitled to the $50,000.

As to the question whether it is the duty of the executors to set off to the testator's daughters at their option certain real estate (not designated) of the testator on account of their respective legacies; the will gives the executors full power to sell at public or private sale and to assign, demise, grant and convey, for such terms or estates, and on such terms as shall in their judgment be most for the benefit of the estate, all the testator's property real and personal. It manifestly would not be proper to direct the executors to convey to the daughters at their option real estate of the testator on account of their legacies. It might or might not be to the interest of the estate to do so. That matter, in the absence of any charge that the executors have abused or meditate an abuse of the discretion given to them by the testator for the benefit of his estate, must be left to their discretion.

It remains to consider the question presented as to the duty of the executors in reference to the de Portes estate. The testator, speaking at the date of the will, says that he has become responsible for money lent to the Marquis de Portes by Auguste Seydoux, Seiber & Co., upon the estate of Portes; and that he may make further loans and advances upon that estate or may purchase it; and he then provides that the whole of such loans and advances or purchase money shall form part of and be deducted from the share or interest of his daughter Adele (wife of the Marquis de Portes) in and to his residuary estate, and that the same and the securities taken upon such loans shall be assigned and transferred to her as and for her sole and separate estate and be subject in all things to the provisions of the will in respect to her share; and that in the event of his purchasing or becoming the possessor of the estate, he gives and devises it to her if she should survive him; but if she should not survive him, he gives it to her issue by the Marquis de Portes; and if she should not survive the testator or should die without issue, then the estate shall go to the testator's issue and their heirs; or if there should, at the time of her death, be no issue of the testator living, then it shall go to his next of kin.

He also provides that if her share of the residuary estate after deducting the $100,000 referred to in the second article of the will, should be insufficient to pay the amount of the loans and advances which at the time of his death he might have made upon the estate de Portes, then and in that case he directs that the excess of such advances over and above her share after such deduction of $100,000 previously mentioned, be assumed and paid by her and lawfully secured as a lien upon the de Portes estate, and be paid to his executors at such time and in such manner as may be just and reasonable.

The provisions of the will in reference to the subject under consideration are plain, explicit and comprehensive. The testator, stating that he had become guarantor for money lent to the Marquis de Portes by Seydoux, Seiber & Co., upon the estate de Portes, and that he might make other loans and advances upon the estate or might purchase it, directs that the whole of such loans or advances form part of and be deducted from the share or interest of his daughter Adele in and to his residuary estate, and that the loans or advances and the securities taken therefor shall be assigned and transferred to her as and for her sole and separate estate, etc., and in case he should purchase the estate he devises it to her if she should survive him, but if she should not survive him, he devises it to her issue. Her share of the residuary estate after deducting the $100,000 payable under her marriage contract, appears to be sufficient to repay the loans and advances with the interest; for, according to her answer, the executors have paid the $100,000 over to her.

It appears also by the answer that the testator advanced the money to pay the loan made by Messrs. Seydoux, Seiber & Co., and that the amount is covered by the antichresis. Whatever is due upon a proper accounting to the testator's estate for the loans and advances and interest thereon, is chargeable upon Madame de Portes' residuary share. Should that not be sufficient to pay the amount, she will not be entitled to the securities until she shall have paid the balance.

It is not necessary to give direction to the executors in reference to the disposition to be made at the death of Madame de Moltke of the 80 per cent the income thereof is given to her for life. The direction sought has reference to a state of facts which is merely hypothetical.

During the pendency of this suit a petition was filed by the daughters of the testator, to get the aid of the court in filling the quota of executors. Two of the executors named in the will predeceased the testator. The appointment of one was revoked by a codicil. Two declined to serve. Two qualified. The person whose appointment was revoked by the codicil was, on the application of the executors who proved the will, appointed an executor by the Supreme Court of the State of New York. Since that time one of the two who qualified under the testator's appointment has died. By the will the testator authorizes and empowers and requests his executors, and from time to time all other persons who may have been appointed and qualified as such, whenever the number of those of them who have qualified shall have been reduced by death, resignation, removal, or other incapacity, to three, to join with the persons of full age beneficially interested in his estate and competent to act, in appointing by deed other persons, not exceeding three at any one time, to be executors and trustees with them of and under the will; and provides that upon such deed being presented to and filed and recorded with the proper court, magistrate or officer, the persons so appointed be, upon qualifying, executors of and trustees under the will, in like manner and with like powers and discretion as those originally named thereunder; the same to every practicable purpose and intent as if so originally named.

The matter came on for hearing upon the petition and answer thereto, before one of the Vice Chancellors and was duly heard and considered by him. His conclusions are before me. He advised that an order be made fixing a time and place when and where the parties interested should name persons from whose number one could be selected for appointment according to the will. The matter was disposed of by a decretal order. It cannot be reheard as a mere matter of course upon the final hearing. Although it was heard upon petition (and answer thereto) and the cause was not formally set down for hearing upon that point, it was substantially so set down. I must treat the matter as having been duly disposed of upon final hearing. It may be added that no application was made for a rehearing.

PATERSON, NEWARK & NEW YORK
v.

Charles KAMLAH.

1. Where possession of land has been taken for a public work (here, for a railroad), and the work has been constructed upon it but no compensation has been made for the land, if the company in taking possession has acted in good faith, under acquiescence of the owner, or by mistake as to the property or as to the validity of the authority given it so to occupy, and the property is in public use, equity will not permit the company to be disturbed in its possession, provided it makes compensation if equity shall so require.
2. The facts that a railroad company has been permitted by the owner of land to take possession of it for the purposes of its road and, with the necessary expenditure, adapt it to such uses, and occupy it accordingly for a long time, are evidence of an agreement that the company shall have the land upon making proper compensation.
3. In such a case, if the company has power to condemn the land it may proceed to do so and be protected by injunction in its possession in the meantime; if it has not power to condemn and equity demands that it make compensation, the court should ascertain the compensation by an issue or reference; and compensation may thus be fixed even if the company has power to condemn.

BILL for relief. On motion to dissolve preliminary injunction. Upon bill and answer and affidavits annexed to each. Motion denied.

Mr. Charles L. Corbin, for defendant, for the motion:

The owner does not lose his right to his land because it is occupied and used by a railroad. The right is not lost, even where the occupation is by consent of the owner.

Mr. Cortlandt Parker, for complainants, contra.

Ranyn, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The bill states that in July, 1886, the defendant began an action of ejectment in the supreme court of this State, against the complainants, the Paterson, Newark & New York Railroad Company and the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company, to recover possession of certain land in Belleville Township, in Essex County, described in the bill; that he is prosecuting the suit to trial and judgment; that the land is part of the railroad route of the Erie Company and is now in the occupation and possession of that company as part thereof; that at the time of the institution of that suit there were and had been for a long time, and are now, as many as thirty trains of cars daily running thereon for the accommodation of the public between Newark and Paterson; that the complainants cannot cease to run their trains over the road; that they are forbidden to do so; and that the land for which the action was brought is indispensable to them in the discharge of the duty imposed upon them by their charter; that the Paterson & Newark Railroad Company was incorporated in 1864; that afterwards it was duly organized and entered upon the business of constructing its road; that it surveyed and determined upon and filed its route which crossed the land in question; that it became necessary for the company to have and use that land; that it thereupon took possession of it claiming to have a right to it, and that from and ever since such taking possession, the land has continuously been occupied as and for part of its route; that such possession was taken contemporaneously with the filing of the route in the secretary of state's office, which took place April 25, 1865; that in 1867 the Paterson & Newark Railroad Company leased its road to the Erie Railway Company for a term not yet expired; that through foreclosure proceedings and certain authorized conveyances, the right of the latter company to the lease and the demised premises, including the land in question, became vested in 1878, in the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company and that under other proceedings in this court the property and franchises of the Paterson & Newark Railroad Company were sold to certain persons who were duly incorporated as the Paterson, Newark & New York Railroad Company, which is now the lawful owner of the land subject to the lease.

The bill further states that owing to the lapse of time, the changes of the officers of the Companies, the death of most of those who had to do with the Paterson & Newark Railroad Company in its early history, the changes of counsel and the death of some of them, and the rather loose and careless manner in which the business of that Company was transacted in the first years of its existence, the complainants have great difficulty in determining their rights to the property in question and greater difficulty still in making proof of them; that a study of the early minutes of the Company shows that much of the right of way was given by the owners of the land and that in such cases it seldom happened that any deed was taken; that sometimes the owners of land signed agreements, more or less formal, evidencing their intention to give such right; that sometimes the agreements stipulated that depots should be established in the neighborhood of the owner's other land, and sometimes they stipulated that fences should be built and maintained by the company, and that sometimes they provided that the road should within a specified time be connected with other roads; that the minutes and records show that very little land in the Township of Belleville was acquired either by purchase or by condemnation, but that most of that which was acquired by the Company was given under a contract that the Company would build the road and establish and maintain a station at Belleville; that in 1868 the directors agreed with the contractor to pay him $120,000 for obtaining all then unobtainable right of way, which money was paid to him for that purpose and an entry was made in the minutes that all such right of way had been actually obtained; that in a suit brought in this court by one DeWitt and others it appeared that he and other owners of land crossed by the railroad in the Township of Belleville signed an agreement in writing, by which they bound themselves to convey the right of way to the Company, free of all charge therefor, and licensed the Company to occupy it at once, and construct and maintain its railroad there, imposing no condition further than that there should be established, by connection or otherwise, a continuous line of railroad to the City of Newark and also a depot at Belleville; that that agreement, which was made in 1871, had been lost when the suit against DeWitt and others was brought, and that it still is lost; that in that suit its existence was established and its contents were stated by both parties without any material difference; and that the names of all the signers were not given, but only those who signed in relation to the parcel of land in question in that suit, but that it appeared that there were others.

The bill charges that the owners of the land in question in this suit, agreed to give the right of way. It further states that it was in 1866 that the Company took possession of the land and built its railroad upon it. It prays a decree for specific performance of such agreement as the complainants may be able to establish, and that if they can establish no agreement nor show cause why they should hold the land, it may be decreed that the defendant convey to them upon receiving from them due compensation to be fixed by this court.

The defendant by his answer, while he denies that the Company took possession under or by virtue of any agreement or conveyance, admits that the road was laid over the land many years ago (he says it was in 1867 or 1868) and that the Company took possession without protest. It appears by the answer that such taking of possession was with his knowledge.

On the filing of the bill an injunction was granted restraining the defendant from proceeding in the action of ejectment. The defendant now moves to dissolve it.

That the complainants had, upon the statements of the bill, a right to the injunction on the ground of discovery cannot be denied. In Garle v. Robinson, 3 Jur. N. S. 633, the complainant alleged seisin of his father for many years before his death and before the making of his will, and possession under the will ever since; and that the defendant for the first time raised a claim to the premises thirty-three years after the death of the complainant's father, through certain persons; and that the complainant could not discover whether any such persons had ever been interested in or connected with the premises. The court granted an injunction to restrain an ejectment by the defendant until an answer should have been made to the complainant's bill for discovery of the character or right in which, and the persons through whom, the defendant claimed, and of the nature and particulars of his claim, and how (not speaking of the proof) he made it out.

The question is whether the complainants are entitled to a continuance of the injunction now that the discovery has been made. The claim for relief presents a double aspect. The complainants insist that they have a good legal title which, if they can establish it (to which end they pray discovery), will entitle them to a perpetual injunction, and that failing that, they have a good equitable title in which, under the circumstances, they ought to be protected.

If the court is satisfied that they are acting in good faith, they are entitled to a continuance of the injunction. They and those under whom they claim have not only been in open and notorious possession of the property as part of their railroad for about twenty years, as the complainants allege and the defendant admits, but they have had such possession with the full knowledge of the defendant for the whole period, and they have used it and still are using it as part of their very important line of public transportation. Where possession of land has been taken for a public work and the work has been constructed upon it but no compensation has been made for the land, if the company in taking possession has acted in good faith under acquiescence of the owner or by mistake as to the property or as to the validity of the authority given it so to occupy, and the property is in public use, equity will not permit the company to be disturbed in its possession, provided it makes compensation if equity shall so require.

Trenton Water Power Co. v. Chambers, 1 Stock. 475; Carson v. Coleman, 3 Stock. 106; Pickert v. Ridgefield Park R. R. Co. 10 C. E. Green 816; N. Y. & Greenwood Lake R. R. Co. v. Stanley, 7 Stew. 55; North Hud. Co. R. R. Co. v. Booraem, 1 Stew. 450; Beaufort v. Patrick, 17 Beav. 60; Wood v. Charing Cross R. Co., 33 Beav. 290; Deere v. Guest, 1 Myl. & Craig, 516; Greenhalgh v. Manchester & B. R. Co., 3 Myl. & Craig, 784; Langford v. Brighton, etc. R. Co., 4 Ry. & Can. Cas. 69; Powell v. Thomas, 6 Hare, 300.

If in this case the Company has power to condemn, it may, if necessary, take proceedings in condemnation to gain legal title and it should under the circumstances be protected in its possession by this court until it shall have done so. North Hudson Co. R. R. Co. v. Booraem, supra.

If it has not power to condemn and equity demands that it make compensation, this court should itself ascertain the compensation, either by means of an issue or of a reference. And the compensation may thus be fixed even if the Company has power to condemn.

It is argued that the opinion of the court of errors and appeals in N. Y. & Greenwood Lake R. Co. v. Stanley, 8 Stew. 288, is in contrariety to the views above expressed; that that court there said that an injunction in such a case as this could not be maintained except where there was an agreement for the land between the defendant or those under whom he claims and the company, or those under whom it claims, which has not been carried out and upon the faith of which there has been an expenditure of money.

The court in the language referred to was not laying down the rule to govern all such cases, but was speaking merely with reference to the circumstances of that particular case. And if it is to be understood as laying down such rule, this case is within the rule. Where a company has been permitted by the owner of land to take possession of it for the purposes of its railroad and to occupy it accordingly and with the necessary expenditure of money adapt it to such uses, and has permitted it so to occupy and use it for a long time, the facts are evidence of an agreement that the company shall have the property upon making proper compensation.

In this case, according to the answer, the Company took possession about 1867 or 1868 (the bill says it was earlier, in 1866); and the defendant permitted it to do so without protest and in view of negotiations for payment. The defendant offered to convey the right of way provided the Company would grade a certain avenue in connection with its work upon its railroad route. The agent with whom the negotiation was made replied that he would report the offer to the Company and that he presumed that it would accept it. Sometime after that an engineer of the Company came to the defendant and stated that the offer was refused. Afterwards and during the lifetime of James Fisk, Jr., there was a project on the part of Fisk in behalf of the Erie Railway Company to run trains for rapid communication between New York and Newark, stopping at a station above Belleville on the defendant's property; the defendant at once called upon Fisk and offered, in case that plan should be carried out, to convey to the company the right of way and land for a depot, but the answer says the plan was abandoned. About 1873 he made frequent applications to Mr. Atterbury, an officer of the Erie Railway Company (and afterwards of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company), in New York, for payment for his land. The claim was recognized by Mr. Atterbury as a valid one and negotiations were kept up intermittently until about 1882, when Mr. Atterbury requested the defendant to make out a statement of the value of the land, and referred him to the solicitor of the Company in this State, who was also a director. The defendant frequently applied to the latter accordingly for payment but without success. It appears from this statement that the Company was permitted by the defendant to take possession of his land and build its road upon it upon the understanding that it was in some way to make compensation for it. The facts as stated by the answer are evidence of an agreement to that effect.

The motion to dissolve will be denied, but without costs.

1. The right of an administrator with the will annexed to apply to the court for instruction is limited to matters of difficulty in his own administration.
2. It is the duty of an administrator with the will annexed to take charge of and preserve personal property specifically bequeathed in trust, until a trustee is appointed to receive it.

BILL for construction of will, etc. On final hearing on pleadings and proofs. The facts are stated in the opinion. Mr. M. P. Grey, for complainant. Mr. E. S. Fogg, for defendants.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The bill is filed by the administrator with the will annexed of Mrs. Susan Eliza Dunn, deceased, late of Salem County, for a construction of her will and instructions as to the administrator's duty thereunder.

By the will, which is dated April 22, 1879, the testatrix, after ordering payment of her debts and funeral expenses, gave all her estate to her trustee thereafter appointed, and to his successor in the trust, in trust for the execution of the will and for the uses and purposes therein-after mentioned and more particularly set forth. She then gave to the trustee and his successor the property on which she resided (a lot in the City of Salem, with a house and barn thereon), together with all the furniture, goods and chattels (including the cow) about the premises; the trustee to have and hold them in trust, for the use, occupation and enjoyment thereof by her husband and her son James during the term of the natural life of the former; and she gave them from and immediately after her husband's death to her two sons, Charles and James, for life, in equal shares, and to the survivor of them for life, with remainder in fee to their lawful issue; and in case they should leave no issue living at the time of their respective deaths, she devised and bequeathed the same in fee to certain other persons whom she named.

She then gave to her trustee and his successor, her lumber yard lot in Salem, with the appurtenances, stock in trade, horses, wagons and personal property, in trust for the use, occupation and enjoyment of her husband and her son Charles during the life of the former; and to the further use and on the further trust that her husband and Charles should conduct, superintend and carry on the lumber business there, with her capital there invested; the net profits to be paid over by the trustee to them in equal shares for their sole and separate use; and she gave the lumber yard with the appurtenances as aforesaid described after her husband's death to her two sons James and Charles, in equal shares and to the survivor of them during their lives and the life of the survivor, with remainder in fee to their lawful issue; and in case neither they nor either of them should leave lawful issue living at the time of their or his death, she gave the before mentioned subject of the devise, in fee, in equal shares, to certain other persons whom she named.

She then gave to Charles and James for life in equal shares, and to the survivor of them, for life, certain other real property, with remainder in fee to their lawful issue living at their respective deaths, and in case they should die leaving no lawful issue living at the time of their respective deaths, then she gave the remainder in fee to certain other persons whom she named. She then gave all the rest and residue of her estate to her trustee and his successor in the trust, to have and to hold the same in in trust for the use, occupation and enjoyment of her husband and her son Charles for the life of the former and from and immediately after his death she gave it absolutely to James and Charles in equal shares and to the survivor of them.

She then appointed a trustee but required him to give good security to be approved by one of the judges of the Orphans' Court of Salem County, and provided that in case of his death, resignation or refusal to act, that court should appoint some person or persons trustee or trustees in his stead. She appointed the same person, whom she had named as trustee, executor and also trustee and guardian of the person and property of her son James who was an imbecile.

By a codicil made June 14, 1888 (her son James was then dead) she directed her trustee to apply $3,000 of the amount ($3,500) of a certain life insurance policy which she held, to the payment of a mortgage upon her residence, and to hold the rest ($500), together with a mortgage of $1,000 which she held upon "the Snitcher farm," and invest the $500 upon mortgage and pay the interest of the $1,500 to her husband for life, and after his death to her son Charles for life; and, after his death she gave the principal and interest to his issue and if he should die without leaving issue, then she gave the principal and interest to certain persons whom she named.

She then gave to her son Charles in fee part of the land which by the will she had devised to him and his brother for life. She then substituted another person as executor and trustee instead of the person appointed by the will, and provided that if at any time her husband should desire to retire from the lumber business for any cause, her trustee or his successor should have full power and authority to sell and dispose of one half of that business and her capital invested therein, and invest the proceeds for the use of her husband; and she "revoked her appointment of a trustee over her son Charles and gave and bequeathed the said property to him in fee simple without the intervention of any trustee whatever as to such property as was therein intended for him."

The testatrix died in May, 1885. Before her death she received the $3,500 upon the life policy and paid off the mortgage of $3,000 upon her residence. The balance ($500) of that money cannot be traced or identified. The person named in the will as executor and trustee refused to prove the will or to act as trustee. The complainant was appointed administrator cum testamento annexo, but no one has been found willing to accept the trusteeship. The estate has substantially been settled. The lumber business referred to in the will and codicil was carried on up to the time of the testatrix's death by her husband and Charles, under the firm name of E. W. Dunn & Son, Agents, she being the principal; and the business is still carried on by them. According to the bill, at her death there was a large stock of goods on hand there; and there were many book accounts and sundry notes, judgments and evidences of debt in the business in favor of the testatrix; and there were also accounts and notes due from her therein. She owned at her death the property before mentioned as her residence with the usual articles of household furniture therein, and she owned and kept a cow there also.

The complainant asks instruction first, as to whether he has power to sell the business of the lumber yard, the stock in trade, etc. (not including the real estate) in case the testatrix's husband and son or either of them should, before a trustee shall have been appointed, refuse to carry on or superintend the business; and also as to what power he has in the premises; second, whether he should deliver the personal estate remaining in his hands after paying the debts, to anyone other than a trustee to be appointed under the will, or one appointed to carry out the trusts thereby created; third, what parts of the testatrix's property vest in the trustee and what parts go to Charles in fee without the intervention of a trustee; and fourth, which, if any, of the trusts created by the will and codicil will continue after the death of the testatrix's husband, and if they or any of them will so continue, as to what part or parts of the property, and for what period of time.

The complainant is merely administrator with the will annexed. The trusts under the will do not devolve upon him. His right to come into this court for instructions is confined to matters of difficulty in his own administration. As to those in which the trustee and his cestui que trust alone are interested, the complainant has no right to the opinion of the court, and it would not be proper for the court to give it. And so too as to the construction of devises in the will with which he has nothing to do. In the subject of the third and fourth questions, except as to Charles' right to the personal property, he has no interest and consequently can have no adjudication thereupon.

The will gives the testatrix's lumber yard lot with the appurtenances, stock in trade, horses, wagons and personal property to the trustee in trust to have and to hold them in trust to the use, occupation and enjoyment of her husband and Charles for the life of the former; and upon the further trust that they shall conduct, superintend and carry on the lumber business there with her said capital there invested, and that the trustee shall pay over to them, in equal shares, the net profits thereof. They are both still living and, as before stated, they were carrying on the business at the time of her death and have been carrying it on ever since as contemplated by the will, except that there has been no trustee.

According to the testimony of Charles, the business is active and solvent. By the codicil the testatrix provides that if at any time her husband should for any reason desire to retire from the business, the trustee shall have full power and authority to sell and dispose of one half of her capital invested therein and invest the proceeds for the use of her husband; and she revokes the appointment of a trustee over Charles and gives and bequeaths said property to him in fee simple, without the intervention of any trustee whatever as to such property as therein (in the codicil) intended for him.

It is the duty of the administrator to take charge of and protect and preserve the personal property given by the will to the trustee, in connection with the devise of the lumber yard respectively, until a trustee shall have been appointed to receive it. Those bequests are of specified portions of the testatrix's personal estate and they are specific bequests. 2 Wms. Exrs. 1158, 1159; 2 Redf. Wills, 457.

The gift of the residue of personal property is a general legacy. It is the duty of the executor to get in all the estate whether specifically bequeathed or otherwise, and to preserve the property specifically bequeathed. 2 Wms. Exrs. 1440.

Nor is Charles entitled to have half of the personal property which is given in connection with the lumber yard paid or delivered over to him now. The testatrix intended that her capital in the business should remain therein until the business should be terminated by the voluntary retirement of her husband therefrom or by his death. The complainant as administrator should collect the money invested in the lumber business and should pay the testatrix's debts incurred in that business. He is chargeable with the one and liable for the other. There is now no one to receive the legacy. The administrator is also chargeable with the testatrix's personal property at the residence and is liable to account for it. That too is given to a trustee but as yet there is none.

1. Speculations in stocks and securities on margins are wagers within the Act to prevent gaming (Rev. p. 458) and therefore unlawful; and securities given to secure a broker against losses therein are void. Equity has jurisdiction on a bill filed against an assignee, taking with notice of such illegality, to order such securities to be delivered up.
2. Where the securities consisted of assignments of mortgages and a note with a mortgage securing it, it was held that complainant had a right to have them declared void for illegality of consideration and to have them delivered up and canceled, and to have the mortgages which were assigned also delivered up, and as ancillary to the relief she was entitled to an injunction restraining defendants from parting with such instruments.

BILL for relief. On general demurrer. Over-ruled.

The facts and questions raised are set out in the opinion.

X. J.

Messrs. James Buchanan and G. D. W. Vroom, for demurrant.

Mr. John H. Backes, for complainant:

In the buying and selling of stocks upon margin, where the margin is only used as a cover for the indemnity of the broker against losses and the stocks purchased are not intended or contemplated to become the property of the purchaser, the transactions (being merely dealings in the difference of the prices) are wagering contracts and contrary to the policy of our law and void.

Baldwin v. Flagg, 9 Stew. 48; 11 Stew. 219.

The relief prayed, i. e., that the instrument be delivered up, and the jurisdiction to be exercised by the court in granting it, are sustained by the English courts and also those of New York; although in a number of cases the court denied its equitable aid where the instrument was void from matter appearing on its face.

Simpson v. Howden, 3 Mylne & C. 97; Bromley v. Holland, 7 Ves. 16; Threlfall v. Lunt, 7 Sim. 627; Earl of Milltown v. Stewart, 3 Myl. & Craig, 18; Eastbrook v. Scott, 3 Ves. 456; St. John v. St. John, 11 Ves. 585; Hamilton v. Cummings, 1 Johns. Ch. 528; Noah v. Webb, 1 Edw. Ch. 608.

Relief will not be denied on the ground that complainant is particeps criminis.

Carlisle v. Cooper, 8 C. E. Green, 241; Vandoren v. Staats, 2 Penn. (N. J.) 887; Munt v. Stokes, 4 Term. Rep. *561; Wooden v. Shotwell, 8 Zab. 487.

The contract is not a criminal one. The first and second sections of the Gaming Act (Rev. p. 458) simply declares them void; there are no penalties attached for engaging therein; parties are disabled from making the transaction the basis of a contract and it ought to be treated simply as void, neither party being in delicto in the strictest sense of the word, and the complainant having parted with her property without consideration it should be delivered up to her.

Hutchinson v. Targee, 2 Green, 886; Mount v. Waite, 7 Johns. 484; Jaques v. Goughly, 2 Wm. Bl. 1073; Lacause v. White, 7 Term Rep. *535; Holman v. Johnson, 3 Cowper, 341; Huncke v. Francis, 3 Dutch. 59.

The law against gaming is designed for the prevention of vice producing widespread injury.

Flagg v. Baldwin, 11 Stew. 226.

Where the transaction is against policy it is no objection that the plaintiff himself was a party in that transaction, which is illegal.

St. John v. St. John, 11 Ves. 585; Shirley v. Ferrers, 1 Bro. Ch. 41, 539.

Gaming securities should be decreed to be delivered up, notwithstanding both parties had participated in the fraud; because public policy would be best served by such a course.

Snell, Eq. Pr. 518.

The law regards the welfare of society as paramount, and in enforcing the law, courts cannot impair its efficiency or cripple its operations by considerations affecting the interests of those who are particeps criminis.

Den v. Shotwell, 3 Zab. 473; Huncke v. Francis, 3 Dutch. 59.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill states that on the 9th of June, 1882, the complainant (who is the wife of Jerome Tatum) assigned a bond and mortgage for $500, owned by her, to Charles W. West, now deceased; that on the 23d of the same month she assigned to him another bond and mortgage of hers for $2,200; and that on the 16th of October following she indorsed to him a promissory note for $4,000 made by her husband to her order; and she and her husband gave to him a mortgage upon real property of hers to secure the payment of the note; that the assignments of the two bonds and mortgages and the indorsing of the note and the giving of the mortgage to secure the payment thereof were all without consideration; and that her husband induced her to make the assignments and indorse the note and give the mortgage, by promises and persuasion; and that she did all those things at his request and in obedience to his commands; and that the securities were given as margins to secure and pay losses already accrued and which might accrue and become due to West from him in speculations in fluctuations in the price of stocks and other securities in which her husband was the customer and West the broker; that her husband commenced and continued those dealings with West, by putting up cash as margins; and that when he exhausted his ability to raise cash for the purpose, West proposed to accept, and agreed to take in lieu of cash, such collaterals as margins as he might induce the complainant to furnish him for such purpose, West knowing that she was able to furnish collaterals and that her husband was without any means to continue such speculations; that it was stated in the mortgage given by her that it was given to secure a promissory note given by her husband and indorsed by her as collateral security for stock margins; that West never demanded of her payment of the note, but twice required her and her husband to renew it and they did so; that he retained the original note and the two notes given in renewal; that up to March, 1884, he treated the two mortgages which she assigned to him as her property, surrendering them to her from time to time in order that she might collect the interest thereon; that on the 24th of March, 1884, West (alleging that her husband had sustained large losses in the stock gambling transactions before mentioned and so was indebted to him in many thousand dollars beyond the amount of the money secured by the three mortgages) assigned the mortgages without any consideration to the defendant his brother-in-law; that the assignment was merely colorable and that it was not intended that any title to the mortgages should pass thereby, but that West made it because he was aware of the illegality of his dealings with the complainant's husband and sought in this way to induce her to believe that the defendant was a bona fide holder of the instruments.

The bill prays that the assignments made by the complainant of the two mortgages, the indorsement of the note and the mortgage given by her and her husband may be decreed to be illegal and void and may be canceled accordingly, and that the two mortgages assigned by her may be delivered up to her; and it also prays an injunction.

Transactions of the character of those stated in the bill (speculations in stocks and securities upon margins) are wagers within the Act to prevent gaming and are therefore unlawful; and securities given to secure the broker against losses therein are void by virtue of the provisions of the Act. Flagg v. Baldwin, 11 Stew. 219.

The third section of the Act provides that all promises, agreements, notes, bills, bonds, contracts, judgments, mortgages, leases or other securities or conveyances which shall be made, given, entered into or executed by any person where the whole or any part of the consideration thereof shall be for money, property or thing in action whatsoever, laid, won or betted in violation of the first section, or for reimbursing or repaying any money knowingly lent or advanced to help or facilitate such violation, shall be utterly void and of none effect. Rev. p. 468.

The instruments in question were given to West as security against losses in stock gambling transactions between him and Mr. Tatum. West's assignee now holds them; but he paid nothing for them and he took them with full notice of the illegality of West's title thereto. He holds them according to the bill, by a title merely colorable. The Act makes the assignments and the note and mortgage securing it utterly void and of no effect. There can be no doubt that equity has jurisdiction to order that they be delivered up and canceled and that the mortgages which were assigned be also delivered up. Story, Eq. Jur. § 908; 2 Pom. Eq. § 938.

The fact that the assignments and note are illegal and void and that the fact of the illegality does not appear upon the face of those instruments would give this court jurisdiction to entertain a suit to compel the defendant to deliver them up. Ad. Eq. 175.

But the jurisdiction even as to them does not depend upon that circumstance. 2 Pom. Eq. § 938; Baker v. Williams, in Blunt's note to Ramsden v. Shadwell, 1 Ambl. 269.

The assignments and the note and the mortgage securing it being void for illegality of consideration, the complainant has a right to have them declared to be so, and to have them delivered up and canceled and to have the mortgages which were assigned also given up; and as ancillary to the relief she is entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant from parting with the instruments. The suit is in accordance with and in furtherance of the policy of the law.

Whether the provision of the fourth section of the Act (that if any such sale, conveyance, lease or mortgage of either real or personal estate, as is made void in the preceding section shall be made, the same shall inure to the use of the heirs or legal representatives of such vendor, bargainor, lessor or mortgagor, and shall vest the whole estate and interest so attempted to be transferred in such property, to all intents and purposes, in such heirs or legal representatives in the same manner as though such vendor, bargainor, lessor or mortgagor had died intestate) was not designed to affect those persons alone who pay gambling debts with their own property, and whether it applies to those who, like the complainant, are induced by another person to pledge their property for the gambling debt of such other person, especially where the circumstances are such as this case presents, are questions which it is not necessary to pass upon at this time.

The demurrer will be overruled.

Theodore V. FROST

v.

Ellen FROST.

Where a man, guilty of illicit intercourse with a woman, supposing her to be pregnant as the result thereof, furnishes her with the means of producing an abortion, and criminal proceedings are lawfully instituted against him for the latter offense and, being under arrest, he chooses, as a means of release, to marry the woman, the constraint under which he enters into the marriage constitutes no ground for annulling it.

BILL to annul a marriage. On rehearing of decree advised by special master acting as advisory master. Bill dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James Chapman, for complainant:

When a consent in form is brought about by force, menace or duress, a yielding of the lips, but not of the mind, it is of no legal effect. Fraud or duress may render marriage void. Bish. Mar. & Div.

Where the will is under constraint the consent in form is not consent in fact.

A marriage is void when it is good for no legal purpose.

1 Bish. §§ 164, 166.

Pothier says: "Fraud is no less contrary to freedom of consent, required for marriage, than violence;" and the Scottish law defines it to be: "Some overruling moral necessity whereby a certain state of the will is brought about which would not have been so without deceit."

Blackstone defines marriage to be "Ability to consent; willingness to consent and actual consent."

"Mere words, without any intention corresponding to them, will not make a marriage or any other civil contract."

McClurg v. Terry, 6 C. E. Green, 225. See also Carris v. Carris, 9 C. E. Green, 518.

"There can be no binding contract where the physical act of concurrence therein has been coerced through the duress of imprisonment."

6 Mo. 110.

Mr. Samuel G. H. Wright, for defendant:

A marriage induced by the fraudulent representations of the woman that she is pregnant, when in fact she is not, will not be set aside.

Bish. Mar. & Div. § 191; Hoffman v. Hoffman, 80 Pa. 417.

A man who has himself been guilty of antenuptial incontinence with the woman he afterwards marries is not entitled to a divorce because she happens to be pregnant by another at the time of his own transgression, concerning which she deceived him.

States v. States, 10 Stew. 195; Bish. Mar. & Div. § 190.

N. J.

That the marriage was induced by representations that the husband was the father of the unborn child, when in fact it is the child of another, is not sufficient to avoid the marriage.

Scroggins v. Scroggins, 3 Dev. 435; Foss v. Foss, 12 Allen, 28; Crehore v. Crehore, 97 Mass. 330; Long v. Long, 77 N.C. 304; Carris v. Carris, 9 C. E. Green, 517.

It must be an extraordinary fraud alone that will justify an avoidance of the marriage bond.

Carris v. Carris, supra.

The defendant was lawfully in custody, for the warrant was regularly obtained and the arrest properly made.

Seyer v. Seyer, 10 Stew. 211.

When the court is satisfied that antenuptial incontinence has taken place, the charge of unlawful threat or menace, or fraud or duress must be most fully and satisfactorily established before the court will annul the marriage.

Seyer v. Seyer, 10 Stew. 210; Carris v. Carris, 9 C. E. Green, 510.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The bill is filed to annul the marriage between the parties, upon the ground of fraud and duress.

The complainant admits that he had illicit intercourse with the defendant before the marriage. She subsequently alleged that she was pregnant by him. He declined to marry her but made provision for her by an agreement up to and during her contemplated confinement. He fulfilled the agreement. Afterwards she made a complaint against him before a justice of the peace that he had furnished her with medicine to produce an abortion. He was arrested upon the charge. Being unable to procure bail he went to the defendant's house and asked her to withdraw the charge. She did not consent to do so, but went with him and the officer in whose custody he was, to the office of the justice. After they arrived there the officer said to the magistrate that she wished to withdraw the charge. To which the justice replied that it could not be done and informed the accused that he must marry the woman, give $1,000 bail or go to jail. The accused being unable to get bail offered to marry the woman. He asked her if she was willing to marry him and she answered him: "Just as you like." After she had thus given her consent they were then and there married accordingly. The evidence is contradictory as to whether they lived together after the marriage.

It is proved that the accused gave the medicines to the woman; and it is admitted that one of them at least was such as is given to produce miscarriage. It was undoubtedly furnished to her for that purpose.

The complainant insists that the circumstances establish the fact that the marriage was the result of unlawful duress by means of criminal proceedings. Where a man who has been guilty of illicit intercourse with a woman marries her under the constraint of proceedings against him in bastardy, lawfully instituted in respect of the actual or apprehended result of such unlawful commerce, or where he marries her under the constraint of arrest in a suit for damages for seducing her, such constraint does not of itself constitute a valid ground for annulling the marriage. Sickles v. Carson, 11 C. E. Green, 440; Seyer v. Seyer, 10 Stew. 210; Jackson v. Winne, 7 Wend. 47; Scott v. Shufeldt, 5 Paige, 43.

Where a man has been guilty of illicit intercourse with a woman and, supposing her to be pregnant as the result thereof, furnishes her with the means of producing abortion for the purpose of preventing the apprehended birth of the offspring, and criminal proceedings are lawfully instituted against him with a view to punishing him for the latter offense, and being under arrest thereon, he chooses as a means of release to marry the woman, the constraint under which he enters into the marriage constitutes no ground either in law or morals for annulling it.

In this case it is not denied that if the arrest had been in lawful proceedings in bastardy the constraint would not have constituted unlawful duress; but it is urged that the fact that it was under criminal proceedings makes an essential difference. I cannot see the distinction. The charge was not a false one. It was true. The accused had by his conduct towards the woman rendered himself liable to the penalties of the criminal law. To obtain his release and immunity for his criminal conduct he deliberately chose to marry her.

There is no evidence of any conspiracy nor of any fraud. If a man who has committed a rape should, after his arrest for the crime, seek to escape the consequences of his offense by marrying the victim of his violence, he could not in a court of conscience, obtain a decree nullifying the marriage on the ground that he was under duress when he entered into it and that but for the duress he would not have been willing to marry the woman. This case does not differ from that in principle. The dictates of justice no less than the policy of the law, forbid that a man should in any such case be permitted to annul his marriage on the ground of the duress of his imprisonment for his crime.

The master advised that the bill be dismissed. There is no error in his conclusion.

SUPREME COURT.

STATE, Inhabitants of EATONTOWN, Prosecutors,
v.

Inhabitants of SHREWSBURY.

*1. To gain a legal settlement under the first clause of § 1 of the Poor Act (Rev. 1834) the pauper must have been seised of a freehold estate, of the value of $130, and have dwelt thereon, or in the township in which the estate was situate, for one continuous year.

2. The statute does not require the continuous actual presence of the party, but will be satisfied by an unbroken residence on the estate or in the township. The continuity of such dwelling will not be broken by absences for business or pleasure which are temporary and accompanied with a continued intent to return when the purpose of the absence has been accomplished.

ON certiorari to the Monmouth Sessions, to review proceedings for the removal of a pauper. Affirmed.

Argued before Scudder and Magie, JJ.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James Steen, for prosecutors:

To constitute a dwelling house, in a statute against arson, it must be a habitation for man, and usually occupied by some one lodging in it at night.

State v. Warren, 33 Maine, 30.

And in a burglary a dwelling house is "a house in which the occupier and his family usually reside, or in other words dwell and lie in."

Whart. Crim. Law, sub titulo.

An out house, "if it be made a sleeping place for any of the servants of the dwelling house, may be deemed a distinct dwelling house."

Armour v. State, 3 Humph. 379.

The court below confuses "dwelling," "residence" and "domicil." But "domicil and residence are not synonyms."

Bartlett v. New York, 5 Sandf. 47, 48; Foster v. Hall, 4 Humph. 348.

"Resident" and "inhabitant" are not synonyms.

Supervisors of Tazewell Co. v. Davenport, 40 Ill. 197.

It follows, therefore, that under our statute mere domicil is not enough. Dwelling implies actual presence. That a domicil is not enough to gain a settlement by commorancy, see Reading v. Westport, 19 Conn. 561.

A person may have two domicils.

Greene v. Greene, 11 Pick. 410.

Having two places of residence he may elect which shall be his domicil.

1 Woodbury & M. 9.

He may have his residence at one place and his domicil at another.

Bartlett v. N. Y., supra.

The legislative interpretation of the term "one full year" is as follows: "Shall have lived at least one whole year at one time, either on the place by him, her or them purchased or hired for at least five pounds yearly rent in such place, or have served one master or mistress the said term of one full year in such place."

2 Nevill, p. 217 (1758), revising 1 Nevill, 256 (1740).

Law of 1774 (Patterson, p. 26).

Jefferson v. Pequannock, 1 Green, N. J. L. 187.

Kindred expressions in other States are always interpreted to mean unbroken, continuous terms. "Being taxed for his poll for the term of seven years," means seven years in succession.

Henniker v. Weare, 9 N. H. 573.

"To gain a settlement by a residence for the term of seven years" it must be "seven years without interruption."

Royalton v. Bethel, 10 Vt. 22.

Judge Royce, in the latter case, said: "The expressions here used are generally understood to mean an unbroken period of time. This is the general construction in leases, in contracts for service," etc. Id. lized by Google

To same effect Monkton v. Panton, 12 Vt. 250. An interruption of several months is fatal, notwithstanding the intention of returning at some future but indefinite period.

Hartford v. Hartland, 19 Vt. 392.

If a pauper removes from the town while his right of settlement is inchoate, it must be an abandonment of what had been done towards gaining a settlement. A person cannot have two or more inchoate settlements at one and the same time, either of which at his option may be ripened into a perfect settlement.

Lincoln v. Warren, 19 Vt. 172.

See also Barton v. Irasburgh, 33 Vt. 159, and Wilbraham v. Ludlow, 99 Mass. 587.

Messrs. Applegate & Hope, for defendant.

Magie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The writ in this case brings up an order for the removal of a pauper to the Township of Eatontown, upon an adjudication that his legal settlement was in that township. The order was originally made by a justice of the peace and, upon appeal, affirmed by the sessions. That court has sent up a finding of the facts which it adjudged to be established by the evidence before it.

It appears thereby that it was established by the evidence that the pauper had, prior to 1880, become seised of a freehold estate in Eatontown, of the value of $180. The counsel for prosecutors has properly confined his argument to the first reason. The facts found by the court below limit the discussion to the question raised by that reason, which is—whether the pauper dwelt upon the estate, or in the township in which the estate lay, for one full year and so obtained a legal settlement under the first clause of section 1 of the Poor Act. Rev. 884.

The facts found by the sessions, from which they deduced the conclusion that the pauper had dwelt on said estate or in said township for one full year, are the following, viz: that he built a shanty thereon in 1880, and until 1884 worked out by the day or month in Eatontown and other townships; that while working out he generally ate and slept where employed, but would sometimes provide his meals from and sometimes would sleep at the shanty; that while out of employment, he made his home at the shanty, and it was the only home he had; and that when he left to go out to such work it was always with the intention to return thereto when his employment ceased; that between 1880 and 1884 he worked in Eatontown more than one year, but not for one year continuously, but did not during that time actually dwell in said shanty or the township for any one year continuously.

The contention of prosecutors is that dwelling, in the sense used in this statute, implies actual presence, which to produce a legal settlement must continue without interruption for one full year.

That the words "one full year" will only be satisfied by a dwelling for the full space of one year continuously and without interruption, I have no doubt.

The only question is over the meaning of the word "dwell." In my judgment it is not to be restricted in meaning to actual presence. Such is not the meaning attributed to it in common parlance or by the lexicographers. To dwell is "to reside; to inhabit; to have a fixed place of residence," etc. Worcester, Dic.

One's dwelling place is his residence, his usual place of abode. It does not cease to be such because of temporary absences, whether for pleasure or for business, provided there exists and continues an intent to return to the abode as a dwelling place.

There have been various English Statutes, giving legal settlement to a pauper after a certain period of continuous residence in a parish, and rendering a pauper irremovable from a parish in which he had resided for a certain period. These Acts completely resemble the Act now before us, in the requirement of a continuity of residence. In construing these Acts it has been always held that the continuity of residence will not be broken by mere temporary absences even for considerable times, if accompanied by an intent to retain the residence and to return to it when the purpose of the absence is accomplished. Reg. v. St. Leonard, L. R. 1 Q. B. 21; Reg. v. Glossop, L. R. 1 Q. B. 227; Reg. v. Abingdon, L. R. 5 Q. B. 406; Reg. v. St. Ives, L. R. 7 Q. B. 487; Reg. v. Worcester, L. R. 9 Q. B. 340; Overseers of Manchester v. Guardians of Ormskirk, etc., L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 723.

Under this view of the meaning of our statute, I think we cannot find error in the result reached below. For although the court reports that they found that the pauper did not actually dwell in his shanty or in the Township of Eatontown for any one year continuously, the finding in that respect must be taken to refer to a continuous presence. For the whole finding must be construed together; and since it appears thereby that the pauper had a dwelling place on his own land, that his absence from it was for the purpose of engaging in work, and was entered upon with an intent to return to his dwelling place when his employment ceased, it is entirely clear that it must be inferred that the pauper dwelt there for more than a full year, within the meaning of the Act.

The proceedings below must be affirmed, with costs.

STATE, Amanda T. BROWN et al., Prosecutors,

v.

Village of SOUTH ORANGE.

*1. The report of a reassessment, made after a partial vacation of an assessment for a street improvement in South Orange will not be vacated, merely because on its face it seems to give awards to all owners of land taken or damaged, and to levy assessments upon all lands benefited. The court, looking at all the proceedings, will hold the legal effect to be to make new awards and assessments in lieu only of those previously annulled.

2. The power to make a reassessment not being impugned, objections to the prior assessment are irrelevant.

CERTIORARI to review proceedings on reassessment for benefits and reawarding of damages to lands on opening of street. Affirmed.

The facts and questions raised are set out in the opinion.

Argued before Reed and Dixon, JJ.

Mr. William Talcott, for prosecutors:

By the provisions of the supplement to the Charter of the Village of South Orange (Laws 1875, p. 393, § 5), in cases where assessments are set aside, the board shall cause a new assessment to be made of so much of the former assessment as shall have been set aside.

In this case this should have been done by the board of assessment's determining the amount of damages sustained by the prosecutors, by reason of the taking of the land, and by ascertaining the amount of the peculiar benefits conferred upon them, and then determining the total amount of damages and benefits.

Souther v. South Orange, 17 Vroom, 317.

The object of this provision was not to alter the assessment as to others which the board had no power to do.

Id. See also Ropes v. Essex Public Road Board, and Sutphin v. Elizabeth, 11 Vroom, 64, 283.

In making the reassessment it was the duty of the commissioners to ascertain what sum should have been assessed to each lot at the date of the first assessment. When they had computed the sum to be charged to the landowner it was to be laid as of the prior date and the land owner was properly chargeable with interest from the date of the first assessment.

Johnson v. Trenton, 14 Vroom, 166, 169.

As the first assessment as a whole is not set aside by this court, but only as to prosecutors, it is presumed that in the judgment of the court the public convenience and interest required that it should stand undisturbed as to those who had not complained.

Winkler v. West Hoboken, 37 N. J. L. 407.

If both reports and both maps in the present case are allowed to stand, there will be two returns as to this one street, which is bad under State v. Garretson, 3 Zab. 388.

Mr. J. M. C. Morrow, for defendant.

Dixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An award of damages to and an assessment for benefits upon lands of Amanda T. Brown and Mary B. Souther, resulting from the opening of Rose Avenue in the Village of South Orange, having been set aside by this court on August 8, 1884, the trustees of the Village on November 25, 1884, instituted proceedings in pursuance of which a new assessment and award were made and ratified on July 21, 1885.

The prosecutors complain of these last proceedings because the assessors' report sets out awards to all persons whose lands were taken or damaged and assessments upon all lands benefited, instead of being confined to lands concerning which the awards and assessments had been vacated.

A comparison of the awards mentioned in the present report with those previously made and not annulled, shows that they are identical; and hence we infer that they are stated now merely to indicate the date from which the assessors determined the amount of the expenses which they were to assess. For this purpose they legitimately appear in the report. The awards to the prosecutors differ from the former ones, because as to them the assessors were to exercise their own judgments concerning the compensation due for the prosecutors' land and damages, the previous judgments in that regard having been reversed.

The assessments embraced in this report all vary from those theretofore made; and on this account the prosecutors object that upon many tracts of land there are two separate assessments which are inconsistent with each other. This objection however arises in part from a misapprehension. The assessors were bound to charge upon the prosecutors such shares of the expenses as were proportionate to their benefits in comparison with those of other landowners. They could do so only by deciding what benefit each parcel of land derived from the improvement, and then distributing the amount of expense among all these parcels in the same ratio. This they had to do upon their own opinion of the benefits, not upon the judgment of their predecessors. The result of this process they have embodied in their report. Its legal effect however is, not to impose a second assessment upon property against which a former assessment still subsists, but only to indicate the proportion of benefits in consonance with which they have fixed the amounts of the prosecutors' burdens imposed in lieu of the vacated assessments. Although this intention is not verbally expressed in the report, yet the court, looking at all the proceedings, readily sees that the new awards and assessments affect the prosecutors only; others stand as they previously stood. There is no substantial error in this procedure. Souther v. South Orange, 17 Vroom, 317.

The objection that the assessors erred in determining that no lands lying over 500 feet from the line of the improvement were benefited is unsupported by evidence.

The objections stated against the prior assessments are not relevant to the pending question, since the power to reassess under the supplements to the village charter (P. L. 1875, pp. 396, 609) is not specifically impugned.

The proceedings should be affirmed.

COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

THE RAILROAD TAX CASES.

STATE BOARD OF ASSESSORS et al.,
Plffs. in Err.,

v.

CENTRAL R. R. CO. OF NEW JERSEY
et al., Defts. in Err.

1. The "Act for the Taxation of Railroad and Canal Property," approved April 10, 1884 (P. L. 1884, p. 142), providing for the separate taxation, through a "State Board of Assessors," of property used for railroad and canal purposes, at the rate of one half of one per cent on the valuation, for state purposes, and at the local rate (but not exceeding one per cent), on the valuation of the real estate exclusive of the main-stem and waterway, for local purposes, and providing that the companies shall not be required to pay a greater tax for all purposes under the Act than they would be required to pay at full local rates, does not contravene the provision of the State Constitution (Amendment of 1875), that "property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value."

2. As the Act is framed in general terms, is restricted to no locality, and operates equally upon all of a group of objects (railroad and canal property) which, having regard to the purposes of legislation, are distinguished by characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them a class by themselves, it is not a special or local law, but is a general law. (Van Riper v. Parsons, 11 Vroom, 123, followed.)
3. The constitutional provision in question does not deprive the Legislature of the power of selecting the subjects of taxation, but it does require that all members of the class selected shall be included in the taxing law, and that the rule applied thereto shall be uniform as to the whole of the class, and that the assessment shall be made at the true value of the property constituting the class.
4. Railroad and canal property being peculiar property which cannot be valued in the same way as other property of a like nature, the Legislature is bound to provide a peculiar method of valuing it for taxation, and the machinery provided by the Act (a State Board of Assessors) is appropriate and necessary.
5. The power of apportionment of the proceeds of taxation is not limited by the Constitution and the judiciary has no control over it. If the legislative provision for taxation is constitutional it will stand unaffected by the apportionment of the proceeds (here, between state and local purposes).
6. Franchises are a proper element of valuation for taxation.
7. The Act does not contravene the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.
8. The Act is applicable to those railroad companies whose charters (subject to alteration by the Legislature) provide that the respective companies shall pay a state tax of one half of one per cent upon the cost of the railroad, "provided that no other tax or impost shall be levied or assessed upon said Company." By the reservation of the power to alter, the Legislature retained the power to tax.

(Per Runyon, C. Concurring Opinions by Parker, Scudder and Paterson, JJ. Separate Opinions by Dixon and Reed, JJ., holding the Act constitutional as to tax for state purposes, but unconsti- tutional as to tax for local purposes; and by Depue, J., holding the Act unconstitutional.)

(Decided May 29, 1886.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment in favor of the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey and other railroad companies, prosecutors, on certiorari to review tax assessments. Reversed.

The report of the case in the Supreme Court will be found in 2 Central Reporter, 715.

The provisions of the Act in question and the questions presented are set forth in the opinions.

Mr. John P. Stockton, Atty-Gen., for the State.

Mr. Gilbert Collins, for Jersey City and other taxing districts.

Mr. Barker Gummere, for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Thomas N. McCarter, for Easton & Amboy R. R. Co., Morris Canal & Banking Co., and Lehigh Valley R. R. Co., defendants in error:

I. The Act of the Legislature under which these taxes are imposed is in conflict with paragraph 12 of section 7 of the Constitution of New Jersey as amended, which declares that "property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value."

The Act selects the property of a second class of artificial persons, viz.: railroads and canal companies, and natural persons using railroad and canal property; and imposes a special tax of the half of 1 per cent on the whole of such property, when no similar tax is imposed on the property of any other persons in the State, either artificial or natural.

The law fails to comply with the requirement of general laws and uniform rules, in that it deprives these corporations of the benefit of the limitation of the rate of taxation allowed to all other persons and property in the general Act concerning taxes, section 2 of the supplement of 1866 (Rev. 1150, § 61).

tal condition of legal taxation that there shall be equality and uniformity in the distribution of public burdens.

IV. The assessments in this case are illegal and unconstitutional so far as they include the so-called value of the franchises of the various corporations and impose the tax upon that valuation.

Each. Bk. of Columbus v. Hines, supra.

A franchise is not included in the definition of either real or personal estate in the general law providing for taxation (Laws 1866, Rev. 1150, pl. 2).

The cases commonly referred to in support of the position that a franchise tax may be sustained are Savings Society v. Coite, Provident Inst. v. Mass. 6 Wall. 594, 611 (73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 897, 907).

In the State Railroad Tax Case, 92 U. S. 575 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 663), Justice Miller says that the Supreme Court had in these cases sanctioned a tax on the franchise; but an examination of those cases will show that the taxation there attacked was sustained only on the ground that it was a tax on the franchise as a license or excise tax and not as a tax on the property.

In the case of Black v. Del. & Raritan Can. Co. 9 C. E. Green, 455, the question was not whether franchises were property, but whether the stock of the corporation could be condemned and taken for public use when its owner refused to consent to the leasing of the railroad property represented by the stock.

V. In American law a franchise in the sense in which the term was originally used is a particular privilege conferred by grant from the government and vested in individuals.

In Windfield's Adjudged Words, p. 273, definitions of the word "franchise" are given and a distinctive feature of each is that it must be a special privilege not enjoyed by citizens in common and depending for its existence and enjoyment on a distinctive legislative grant.

Our constitutional amendments have abolished all such special grants and privileges. The Legislature can no longer grant them specially, but they are bound to provide them freely for the public without grants. If they exist at all their character as special privileges has been abolished; and while their enjoyment may confer a value on property, just as the right to travel on a highway may confer a value on the team or carriage which the traveler uses, the right to the one is as free and independent of special legislative grant as the other.

VI. The assessing and levying of taxes is a legislative and not a judicial act. The Legislature cannot confer upon the judiciary the power to do such an act.

Mr. B. Williamson, for Philadelphia & Reading R. R. Co., defendant in error.

Mr. Joseph D. Bedle, for Morris & Essex R. R. Co. defendant in error.

Mr. H. A. Drake, for Tuckerton R. R. Co., defendant in error.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The judgments of the Supreme Court which are brought up for review by the proceedings in these cases, set aside and annul as being entirely void the assessment and tax levied upon the respective defendants, under the Act "For the Taxation of Railroad and Canal Property," approved April 10, 1884 (P. L. 1884, p. 142). The ground upon which those judgments are based is that the Act is in contravention of the constitutional requirement adopted in the amendments of 1875, that "property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value."

The Act, after providing that all the property of any railroad or canal company not used for railroad or canal purposes, shall be assessed and taxed by the same assessors and in the same manner and at the same rate as the taxable property of other owners in the same municipal division or taxing district, creates a State Board of Assessors to assess all the property of railroad and canal companies used for railroad or canal purposes, including their franchises, and directs that the board shall ascertain the true value of such property, and that in so doing they shall ascertain separately, first, the length and value of the main stem of each railroad and of the water-way of each canal and the length of such main stem and water-way in each taxing district; second, the value of the other real estate used for railroad or canal purposes in each taxing district, including the road-bed (other than main stem), waterways, reservoirs, tracks, buildings, water-tanks, riparian rights, docks, wharves and piers and all other real estate except lands not used for railroad or canal purposes; third, the value of all the tangible personal property of each railroad and of each canal company; and fourth, the value of the franchise. It then declares that the term "main stem" is to be held to include the road-bed not exceeding 100 feet in width, with its rails and sleepers and the passenger depots; and that the term "water-way" is to be held to include the towing path and berme-bank. It defines also the terms "taxing district" and "tangible personal property" as used in the Act. It provides that the State Board of Assessors shall be governed by the valuation of the local assessors if lower than theirs, in ascertaining the value of the real estate used for railroad or canal purposes, not included in the main stem or water-way, and that the local assessors shall certify to the board a description of the property of any railroad or canal company within their taxing district, both that which is not used for railroad or canal purposes, and that used for such purposes, excepting the main stem and water-way as defined by the Act; also their valuation of those properties and the local rate of taxation for county and municipal purposes. If in any taxing district there should be several branch lines of railroads belonging to or controlled by one company, or operated under one management, the assessors are to designate one of them as main stem, and the others are to be treated as "other real estate used for railroad purposes." The board are to compute the tax upon the entire assessed valuation of each railroad and canal company as ascertained by them, and the taxation is to be as follows: The company is to pay upon the valuation to the State for state purposes one-half of one per cent annually, and in addition thereto, the local rate for county and municipal purposes, on the valuation of the real estate other than main stem or water-way, that is used for railroad or canal purposes, in the taxing district; but such local rate is not to exceed one per cent of such last-mentioned valuation. The Act provides that the sum of the estimates or computations for each company shall constitute the tax to be paid by it, and that if, upon complaint, the board shall find that the amount of the state tax and local rate, as limited in the Act, combined, exceed the amount which the company would have to pay if assessed at and required to pay full local rates alone, then they shall reduce the whole tax to the amount which the company would be required to pay at the last mentioned rate; and in order to ascertain that amount (but for no other purpose) they may apportion the value of the franchise among the local taxing districts. Of the taxes assessed under the Act, the one-half of one per cent is to be appropriated to state purposes, and the money received for tax upon property separately assessed, in the different taxing districts, is to be allotted to those districts, giving to each the amount derived from the property of each railroad or canal company therein. The foregoing are all the provisions of the Act which it is necessary or important to state for the consideration of the question which is now before the court.

In this connection it will be proper to refer briefly to the history of the legislation, other than such as is contained in special charters, by which taxes have been imposed upon railroad and canal companies in this State. By the Act of 1866 (Rev. p. 1150), it was provided that all real and personal estate within this State, whether owned by individuals or by corporations, except such as was owned by corporations which by their charters were expressly exempted from taxation, should be liable to taxation at the full and actual value thereof. The railroad tax law of 1873 (Rev. p. 1166), after reciting that for the encouragement of railroad enterprise, laws creating and regulating railways in this State usually provide for the payment by them in consideration of their charter privileges of a fixed rate upon their capital stock or the cost of their works in lieu of all other public impositions whatsoever; and that it was nevertheless intended that the property of such corporations being largely acquired for or through the growth and extension of their prosperity, should contribute to the charges and expenses essential for municipal and county purposes; and that it was desirable in order to the avoidance of litigation and future dissatisfaction, that such municipal and county taxation should be authorized and that it should be permanently fixed and regulated, provided that railroad companies occupying and using railroads in this State, whether as lessees or otherwise, should pay upon the cost, equipment and appendages of their respective railroads, a state tax after such rate of taxation as might have theretofore been fixed by law upon such companies, or in default thereof, after the rate of one-half of one per centum upon such cost; and that they should pay upon all the real property by them occupied, used or owned for the purposes of their roads or otherwise, excepting the main stem or road-bed and track not exceeding 100 feet in width, and excepting also a tract of land not exceeding ten acres at the termini, a county and municipal tax for the benefit of the counties, townships and cities respectively where such real property was situated, after the rate of one per centum upon a valuation thereof, and of all the improvements thereon not by way of repairs, then or thereafter to be made. The Act provided for the voluntary surrender by any railroad company of any privilege which it might claim of exemption from taxation under its charter and for its acceptance in lieu thereof of the taxation provided by the Act. The Act was in force when the amendments to the Constitution were adopted, among which was the before-mentioned provision that property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value.

It will have been seen that under the Act of 1873 the property was assessed for taxes for state purposes, not according to its true value, but according to its cost; and as to taxes for county and municipal purposes, it was assessed upon a valuation. The cost for the assessment of the tax for state purposes was to be ascertained by a return thereof on oath or affirmation by the president of the company to the Comptroller of the State, and the valuation for the assessment of tax for county and municipal purposes was to be fixed by a commissioner appointed by the Governor. The Act gave an action to the State against the corporation for false return in case the Comptroller should be dissatisfied with the return of the president.

By the general railroad law (Rev. p. 925), passed in 1873, it was provided that the companies incorporated thereunder should pay to the State an annual tax of one-half of one per cent upon the cost, equipment and appendages of their road, including the cost of their road-bed, and such other taxes as might be assessed from time to time by a general law applicable to all railroads over which the Legislature should have power for that purpose at the time of passing such law, and that they should be regularly assessed and pay tax for the value of their real estate (except the road-bed 100 feet wide) and the improvements thereon and their personal property as taxed at the time when that Act was approved, in the city or cities, township or townships wherein it lay, at the same time and rate and in the same manner and for the same purposes and by the same person or persons as the other taxes assessed in such cities or townships.

The Act for 1876 (Rev. p. 1168) provided that all railroad corporations and companies occupying or using railroads in this State, whether as lessees or otherwise, liable to be taxed as such by a general law taxing railroads for state purposes, should pay an annual state tax upon the true value of such railroads and their equipments and appendages, at and after the rate of one-half of one per centum upon such value. The Act contained a declaration (inserted as it says, for greater certainty) that it should not apply to or affect any county, municipal or local taxation whatever. The Act provided for a return of the valuation by the president of the company and for the review of the valuation or for the making of an original one if none should be returned, by a board of railroad commissioners, and it gave to the company an appeal to a justice of the supreme court from the decision of the commissioners.

By the general law (Rev. p. 936) passed in 1877, it was provided that the companies formed under that Act should pay to the State an annual tax of one-half of one per cent upon the cost of their canals, including equipment, appendages and expenses; the amount of the cost in each case to be ascertained by the annual statement of the president of the company under oath or affirmation.

Up to the time of the passage of the Act of 1884, the general Railroad Tax Acts of 1873 and 1876 (the provisions of the latter were expressly confined to the tax for state purposes), were re-organized as valid and were enforced. The question of their constitutionality, however, was never brought to a judicial test. It was held in 1879 that under the Act of 1876 railroad corporations were required to pay a tax for state purposes, upon the value of their railroads and equipment and appendages. State, N. J. Southern R. R. Co. v. Railroad Comrs. 12 Vroom, 235. And that they were required to pay county and municipal taxes under the Act of 1873. State, Central R. R. Co. v. Mutchler, 12 Vroom, 96, and State, Penna. R. R. Co. v. Wetherill, Id. 147.

The Act of 1884 covers both railroad and canal property. It fixes the same rate of taxation for state purposes which had previously existed for many years, but assesses it upon the valuation of all the property of the company used for its purposes, including the franchise, and provides for local taxation on part only of such property, as the general Railroad Tax Law of 1873 did; and while that Act fixed a rate of one per cent for local taxation, the Act of 1884 provides that the rate for local taxation shall not exceed one per cent.

It will be seen that the Act of 1884 introduced no novelty in railroad taxation, but that on the contrary the same method substantially of taxing railroad companies had existed from 1873 under the Act of that year, which Act was modified in 1876 merely in order thus to conform it to the constitutional requirement.

The fact that railroad property, when the Act of 1884 was passed, had been separately taxed under similar legislation both for state and local purposes, for so many years, and that the validity of such legislation on the ground of unconstitutionality had not been brought to any judicial test, although immense interests in the hands of vigilant guardians had been annually affected by it, is an important circumstance in the consideration of the question now before the court; because so practical and contemporaneous a construction of the constitutional provision, acquiesced in for so long a time, under such circumstances, and one so clear and uniform, must have weight with the court in settling judicially the construction of the provision, if the construction were other wise doubtful.

The power of taxation is an essential, inherent attribute of sovereignty. In our state government it is vested in the legislative department. It is unlimited in extent, except as it may be restrained by constitutional provision or irrepealable legislative contract. Of course, to be exercised legitimately it must be exercised within the scope of governmental authority as limited and circumscribed in our polity. To exercise it outside of the sphere of such authority would be usurpation. It is the province of the judiciary to determine whether in any legislation submitted for its decision, the constitutional restraints or limitations have been disregarded or transcended. But unless the legislation is found to be clearly in contravention of some constitutional provision, or to be outside of the limit of governmental authority, the court will not annul it. With the policy or impolicy, justice or injustice of the legislation, irrespective of such constitutional considerations, the courts have nothing whatever to do.

The prosecutors complain and insist that in the Act of 1884 the constitutional restraints and limitations have been ignored and exceeded; that the property of railroad and canal companies has been segregated by arbitrary selection for special and exclusive taxation and made to bear, practically alone, the entire burden of taxation to raise money for state purposes, instead of its due proportion thereof only. And they insist that the legislation thus brought into question is in violation of the before mentioned provision of the State Constitution, that property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules according to its true value, and of the provision of the Federal Constitution, that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

In the Act under consideration, the Legislature has separated for taxation, not all the property of railroad and canal companies, but only so much of it as is used for the particular purposes of those corporations, and has imposed upon the property so separated a tax for state purposes, and a tax for county and municipal purposes. The property of such companies not used for such special purposes is left to be taxed in the same manner as other like property. The property separated, so far from being taken by mere arbitrary selection, is all of it so circumstanced by reason of the peculiar use to which it is put, as to make it, on that account, a class by itself. To value and tax such property in the same way in which other property is valued would be unjust. To do justice to the companies and in common fairness, not only must the main stem of a railroad and the water-way of a canal be each valued and taxed as a unit, but the other property used in connection therewith and for the same purposes, must also be valued and taxed with reference to such use. To make a just valuation thereof, property used for railroad or canal purposes must be estimated with regard to its value for such purposes. For example: the true value for purposes of taxation of railroad cuts and embankments and canal locks is not their cost, but what they are worth in connection with the works of which they form part. This subject is well discussed and forcibly illustrated by Mr. Commissioner Hunt in delivering the unanimous opinion of the court in People v. Barker, 48 N. Y. 70. See also to the same effect the opinion of the United States Supreme Court in State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 608 (1875) [Bk. 23, L. ed. 663, 671]. And in Kentucky Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 321 (1885) [Bk. 29, L. ed. 414].

This peculiarity of the property in question constitutes it a legitimate class for the purposes of taxation—a class which in order to deal with it fairly in the matter of taxation must be treated separately. In the leading case of Van Riper v. Parsons, 11 Vroom, 123, it was held that a law framed in general terms, restricted to no locality and operating equally upon all of a group of objects which, having regard to the purposes of legislation, are distinguished by characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them a class by themselves, is not a special or local law, but a general law. See also S. C. Id. 8.

Railroad and canal property has such characteristics, and the Act under consideration extends to and operates equally upon all such property. The law, therefore, is a general law. In State Railroad Tax Cases, ubi supra, it was said that railroads by themselves constitute a class for the purposes of taxation.

The constitutional provision requires not only that the assessment shall be under general laws, but that it shall be by uniform rules also. It does not require that all property shall be assessed for taxes, but that property when assessed for taxes, or in other words, such property as shall be assessed for taxes—shall be assessed under general laws, etc. Certain property has been exempt from taxation ever since the amendments to the Constitution were adopted, and such exemption has received the judicial sanction. The property is of the same kind as that which is taxed, but the use to which it is devoted, the purposes of religion, education, benevolence, etc., makes it a class and justifies the exemption.

The constitutional provision does not take away from the Legislature the power of selecting the subjects of taxation. State, Vail's Errs. v. Runyon, 12 Vroom, 98; State, Stratton, v. Collins, 14 Vroom, 562. But it does require that all the members of the class selected shall be included in the taxing law and that the rule applied thereto shall be uniform as to the whole of the class, and that the assessment shall be made at the true value of the property constituting the class; and if these requirements are answered by the law, it is not in conflict with the constitutional provision.

If the Legislature has power to exempt on account of the special use to which they are put certain kinds of property from the taxation to which other property of the same kind, but put to general uses, is subjected, it has the right to provide, in its discretion, that such special property shall be assessed at a different rate and in a different way from the other. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, says (p. 497), that constitutional requirements that taxation upon property shall be according to value, do not include every species of taxation, but that all special cases such as those which he specifies, among which are those where corporations are required to pay a certain sum annually in proportion to their capital stock or by some other standard, which methods are regarded by the State as most convenient and suitable for the taxation of such organizations, are by implication excepted. In fact, under our laws various methods which have received express judicial sanction are employed for the taxation of the property of various kinds of corporations in order that such property may be taxed at, and not beyond, its true value.

Railroad and canal property being peculiar property, which cannot in justice to the owner be valued in the same way as other property of a like nature, the Legislature was bound to provide a proper method of valuing it justly for the purposes of taxation. Such method must be a peculiar one. The machinery provided for the purpose by the Act—a State Board of Assessors—is appropriate and such as is necessary in view of the peculiar character of the property. If by the method adopted the companies are required to bear no more than their just share of the public burden of taxation, they surely have no ground of complaint. Whether the tax which they pay is appropriated to state purposes alone or to state and county and municipal purposes, is a matter which does not concern them. All taxes, whether levied for state, county or municipal purposes, are state taxes; they can be imposed by no other authority than that of the State. The State appropriates the proceeds to what purposes it sees fit; but, however the proceeds may be appropriated, every tax is a state tax. O. and A. R. R. Co. v. Comrs. of Appeals, 8 Harr. 71; State, Cam. and Bur. R. R. Co. pros. v. Cook, 8 Vroom, 338; State, Freeland, pros. v. Jersey City, 14 Vroom, 135.

If the legislative provision for the taxation of the property of railroad and canal companies is not in contravention of the Constitution, it will stand; the apportionment of the proceeds of the taxation cannot affect the assessment. The power of apportionment is not limited or affected by the Constitution, and the judiciary has no control whatever over it. The Legislature, in the Act of 1884, takes pains to secure the railroad and canal companies against being required to pay more than their full share of tax. The Act provides that if the State Board of Assessors, upon complaint of any company, shall in any case ascertain that the addition of the state tax of one half of one per cent to the local rate, as limited by the Act, would compel any company to pay more tax than such company would pay if it did not pay that state tax, but did pay full local rates on all its property used for railroad or canal purposes, and its tangible personal property and franchises, without any other exemption than such as would be allowed to an individual citizen on such property, then, and in such case, the board shall make such deduction as will make the tax equal to the amount that the company would pay upon all that property, including the franchises, if assessed at full local rates, without any state tax; and that for the purpose of ascertaining the amount (but for no other purpose), the Board may apportion the value of the franchise among the taxing districts. Nor can it be successfully contended that under the Act one company may be required to pay a greater proportion of tax for state purposes than another; for, as before stated, the apportionment does not affect the constitutionality of the tax, and each company is to be assessed upon the same kind of property at precisely the same rate and by exactly the same method of valuation. The assessment for tax for state purposes is to be upon the entire assessed valuation of each railroad and each canal company, as ascertained by the State Board of Assessors.

And here it may be observed that if the Legislature may tax the property separately, and by a peculiar rule, the peculiar character of which is made necessary in justice to the owners of the property, as well as to those who own other taxable property, in view and by reason of the use to which the property is applied, the fact that only part of the property is taken into account in one of the methods (i. e., in making up the amount to be paid in respect of county and municipal tax) is of no moment. The tax applied to state purposes and that applied to county and municipal purposes are one tax and are to be so regarded. The Act provides that the sum of the estimates or computations for each company shall constitute the tax to be paid by each company. It may be added that no system of taxation can be devised which will be free from criticism, on the ground that, in some way or other, it works unequally or lacks complete uniformity. Said the court, in State Railroad Tax Cases: "Perfect equality and perfect uniformity of taxation, as regards individuals or corporations, or the different classes of property subject to taxation, is a dream unrealized. It may be admitted that the system which most nearly attains this is the best. But the most complete system which can be devised must, when we consider the immense variety of subjects which it necessarily embraces, be imperfect."

The objection is made that, under the Act, only the property mentioned in subdivision II. of section 3 (real estate used for railroad or canal purposes, not including main stem or water-way), is subjected to assessment for taxation for county and municipal purposes, whereby, it is argued, the companies escape their share of county and municipal taxation in respect of the main stems or the water-ways, and the tangible personal property in the taxing districts. But if the taxes be but one tax, and the Legislature has the right to fix the amount of that tax by the means adopted, it follows that the objection is without actual foundation; for the Legislature has the right to say what tax the companies, in view of the peculiar character of their property, shall pay, and in what way it shall be assessed, provided it makes the assessment under general laws and by uniform rules, according to the true value of the property. To hold otherwise would be to hold that the Legislature is bound to tax all property at the same rate and in the same way, without regard to the use to which it is put.

To summarize the views above presented: The power of taxation is in the legislative branch of the government alone. It is unbounded except as it may be limited by constitutional restraint. A law which taxes a class of property separately is not unconstitutional if it embraces all property of that class and applies to it uniform rules and taxes it according to its true value. The constitutionality of such a law is to be determined in the same way in which it would be determined if the property taxed were the only property taxed in the State.

It is manifest from the provision that the companies shall not be required to pay more tax for all purposes under the Act than they would be required to pay at full local rates, that the Act is not liable to the criticism that it selects the property of two classes of corporations from the mass of similar property, not to put upon it a proportionate part of a general tax, but to charge it with the whole amount of a separate tax; for, so far from putting upon the property a separate tax, the Legislature has carefully provided that it shall not pay any more than it would pay if taxed at precisely the same local rates as other property without any taxation for state purposes. Moreover it may be remarked, railroad and canal companies are not the only corporations which are required to pay taxes for state purposes. Another Act of 1884, entitled "An Act to Provide for The Imposition of State Taxes upon Certain Corporations and for The Collection Thereof," requires other corporations to pay license tax to the State upon their franchises.

And here it will not be out of place to speak as to the taxability of franchises. They are undoubtedly property, and, as such, are taxable. Burr. Tax. § 85; Society for Savings v. Crite, 6 Wall. 594 [73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 897]; State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 663]. The Act provides that the State Board of Assessors shall ascertain the value of the franchises separately. They are to ascertain their true value. They have a value which can be estimated. State Railroad Tax Cases, ubi supra.

There is no substance in the objection that the law in question contravenes the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. The Act provides that a hearing be given to the companies interested touching the valuation and assessment of the property, and for a review of the assessment by the board upon complaint of any company or person aggrieved, or of the Attorney-General, or of any member of the board in behalf of the State that the property is assessed too low, or that property has been omitted, and for the correction thereof by the board as shall seem just; and that if such complaint be by the Attorney-General or a member of the board, there must be notice to the company or person to be affected by the proceedings. The Act also provides that any company or person assessed, or the Attorney-General in behalf of the State, may contest by certiorari the validity or amount of any tax levied under the Act, and that upon the writ relief may be had as well in cases where it is claimed that the amount of tax is excessive or insufficient as in cases where it is claimed that the principle upon which the assessment is made is erroneous. This present proceeding is an illustration of the extent to which and the thoroughness with which such matters may be litigated.

Without entering upon the question raised upon the hearing, whether artificial persons are within the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, it is enough to say that, in the Supreme Court of the United States, it has been held that laws similar to that under consideration are not in violation of the provisions of that amendment. In Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97 (1877), [Bk. 24, L. ed. 616], it was held that whenever by the laws of a State, or by state authority, a tax, assessment, servitude or other burden is imposed upon property for the public use, whether it be for the whole State or some more limited portion of the community, and those laws provide for a mode of confirming or contesting the charge thus imposed in the ordinary courts of justice, with such notice to the person, or such proceeding in regard to the property as is appropriate to the nature of the case, the judgment in such proceedings cannot be said to deprive the owner of his property without due process of law.

And the same doctrine was affirmed in the Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 821 (1885) [Bk. 29, L. ed. 414]. In that case it was insisted that the law of Kentucky made an unjust and unconstitutional discrimination against railroad companies and their property, because such property, though called real estate in the legislation, was classed by itself as being distinct from other real estate, such as farms and city lots, and subjected to different means and methods for ascertaining its value for purposes of taxation, which methods differed also from those which were applied to the property of corporations chartered for other purposes, such as bridge, mining, street railway, manufacturing, gas and water companies. And it was urged that such discrimination and difference were in violation of the rights of the railroad company under that clause of the Fourteenth Amendment which provides that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. The court said, on this point, that there was nothing in the Constitution of Kentucky which required that taxes should be levied by uniform method upon all descriptions of property; but the whole matter is left to the discretion of the legislative power, and that there is nothing to forbid the classification of property for purposes of taxation and the valuation of different classes by different methods; that the rule of equality in respect to the subject only requires that the same means and methods be applied impartially to all the constituents of each class, so that the law shall operate equally and uniformly upon all persons in similar circumstances, and that there is, therefore, no objection to the discrimination made as between railroad companies and other corporations in the methods and instrumentalities by which the value of their property is ascertained, and that the different nature and uses of their property justify the discrimination in that respect which the Legislature has seen fit to make.

It may be remarked that in what are known as the San Mateo Case (8 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cases, 1), and the Santa Clara Case (9 Sawy.

165), in the United States Circuit Court for the District of California, the adjudication in reference to the Fourteenth Amendment was upon a provision of the Constitution of California denying to railroad and other quasi public corporations the same right of exemption from the taxable value of their property of the amount of a mortgage debt thereon which was allowed to others. This discrimination was held to be a denial of the equal protection of the laws. Those cases deal with a constitutional discrimination. They have no bearing upon the cases in hand to which the authoritative decisions of the United States Supreme Court, above referred to, are pertinent.

It remains to consider the objection that the Act is inapplicable to those railroad companies whose charters contain a provision that the company shall pay a state tax of one-half of one per centum upon the cost of the railroad, "provided that no other tax or impost shall be levied or assessed upon said company." By the Act "concerning corporations" it is provided that the charter of every company which shall thereafter (that part of the Act was passed in 1846) be granted by or created under any of the Acts of the Legislature shall be subject to alteration, suspension and repeal in the discretion of the Legislature. Every charter granted since the passage of that section is subject to it. A similar provision is contained in most of the railroad charters. It has been held in this court that no irrevocable contract can result from the provisions of a charter which is made in terms subject to alteration, amendment or repeal by the power granting it. State, M. & E. R. R. Co. v. Miller, Collector, 2 Vroom, 521; State, J. C. and B. R. R. Co. pros. v. Jersey City, Id. 575. The provision in the charter as to tax was merely a declaration that the Legislature at the time of passing the charter intended that the companies should not then be chargeable with any other tax than the one-half of one per centum. Little v. Bowers, 17 Vroom, 300. And those charters being subject to alteration, the provision as to tax contained therein presents no obstacle to the application of the Act of 1884 to the property of the companies. By the reservation of the power to alter, the Legislature retained the power to tax.

On the hearing of these cases this court declared that it would not hear argument at that time upon the subject of the liability of companies claiming to have irrevocable contracts protecting them from the operation of the Act. But four of the prosecutors, viz.: The Morris Canal and Banking Company, The Morris and Essex Railroad Company, The Paterson and Hudson River Railroad Company and the Paterson and Ramapo Railroad Company, claim to have such contracts. The judgments of the supreme court in all the cases, except those in which those companies are prosecutors, should be reversed and the records remitted to the supreme court to be proceeded upon according to law. In those cases the records should be retained for argument upon the question reserved as to whether those companies have such irrevocable contracts.

Parker, J., delivered the following opinion:
On the 10th day of April, 1884, an Act was passed by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, entitled "An Act for the Taxation of Railroad and Canal Property." Under that Act the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey and other like companies were taxed on their property used by them for railroad and canal purposes.

The validity of these assessments was contested in the supreme court, and they were by said court adjudged invalid, on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the Act.

An abstract of the Act of 1884 is given in the opinion which has just been read by the Chancellor, and I will not repeat it.

At the opening of the argument in this court, it was announced that counsel would be heard upon two questions, viz.: 1, whether, if the Act of 1884 be invalid, there is any lawful method of assessing taxes upon said Companies in reference to the subjects of taxation mentioned in that Act; and 2, whether the Act of 1884 is constitutional.

In order to answer the first question, the course of legislation in this State on the subject of taxation of corporations of this character should be considered.

In the infancy of this class of corporations, when struggling for existence, the amount of tax they were required to pay into the state treasury was smaller. The State favored them by limiting the annual tax to be paid by such corporations to the one-half of one per cent on the cost of their respective roads. This tax was for state purposes, and they were not assessed for local taxes.

The wise and liberal policy adopted by the State was founded in part on the fact that the enterprises in which such companies were engaged were at that time of doubtful success, and in part on the belief that if successful they would contribute vastly to the public good.

As time progressed, these corporations extended their business operations and acquired additional property, often of great value, until in some sections of the State, especially in the cities, the exemptions from local taxation became so great as to incumber the property of citizens liable to be taxed, with a heavy burden.

To prevent injustice arising from inequality of taxation, and to equalize, as far as possible, the public burdens, the Legislature, on the second day of April, 1873, passed an Act, the avowed object of which was to establish just rules for the taxation of railroad property. This Act made a radical change in the system. It provided not only that railroad companies should pay upon the cost, equipment and appendages of their roads, a state tax at such rate as had before been fixed by law, but also upon all real property of such companies, owned by them (excepting the main stem not exceeding one hundred feet in width), a county and municipal tax for the benefit of the counties, townships and cities of the State, respectively, where the same were situated, after the rate of one per cent, exempting, however, from such tax, land not exceeding ten acres lying in one parcel at the termini of the respective roads.

The Law of 1873 was passed before the adoption of the constitutional amendment in reference to taxation; and, therefore, its validity cannot be wholly tested by the same standard as the Act of 1884. But upon the question now under consideration, viz.: whether, if the Act of 1884 be invalid, there is any lawful method in the Act of 1873 of making the assessments on the subjects of taxation mentioned in the Act of 1884, it is sufficient to remark that, although based on the same general principle as the Act of 1884, yet inasmuch as by the Act of 1873 the assessment was to be made on cost and not on true value, as the constitutional amendment prescribes, the Act of 1873 will not sustain these assessments.

On the same day that the Act of 1873 was approved, the then Governor signed what is termed the General Railroad Law, the nineteenth section of which provides that after any railroad constructed under that Act should be in operation, the corporation owning it should pay to the state treasurer a tax of one-half of one per cent annually on the cost, equipment and appendages of said road bed, and also pay such other taxes as might be assessed from time to time by general law, applicable to all railroads over which the Legislature should have power for that purpose, and that such railroads should be taxed for the value of their real estate (except the road bed of one hundred feet in width), and on personal property, as then taxed in the cities or townships where it should lie.

The Act of 1876, providing for state taxes on railroads, was passed after the adoption of the constitutional amendment. This Act is almost identical with the Act of 1873. The chief object of the Act of 1876 seems to have been to make the system of railroad taxation conform to the constitutional amendment that took effect in 1875, which prescribed that the assessment should be on true value, instead of on cost. Where the Acts of 1873 and 1876 did not conflict, the former stood; and under those two Acts both the state and local taxes on railroad property in this State were assessed and collected, up to the enactment of the Law of 1884. Upon an examination of those Acts, in comparison with that of 1884, it will be seen that they are grounded on the same general principle. If the Act of 1884 be unconstitutional, so is the Act of 1876; and these assessments cannot, therefore, be upheld under the Act of 1876.

Neither can they be supported by the General Law of 1866, because that law has no reference to taxation on railroad and canal property.

If the Act of 1884 be unconstitutional and void, the 16th section of that Act, which authorizes the supreme court to increase or reduce the assessment, will not avail, for the supreme court has no power to adjust or refer back an assessment made under an unconstitutional Act, unless after the original assessment an Act had been passed whereby a legal assessment could be made. Such was the decision of this court in construing the Act of 1881, reported in Elizabeth v. Meeker, 16 Vroom, 157.

Where the principle on which the Act rests is in conflict with the Constitution, one part of the assessment should not be set aside and the other part be sustained. In this case there cannot be a separation of the parts without doing violence to the general scheme, and running counter to the intent of the law-making power. If the Act of 1884 is void as to local taxation, it is also a nullity as to state taxes.

Having seen that if the Act of 1884 be unconstitutional and void, there is no lawful method of assessment upon these companies in reference to the subjects of taxation mentioned in such Act, the vital question now arises, whether the Act of 1884 is constitutional. Upon the answer to this question depends the decision of this cause.

I agree with the supreme court in that part of the opinion which holds the Act of 1884 not invalid because it directs that the valuation and assessment shall be made by a board of assessors especially appointed for the purpose. It matters not what the machinery set in motion by the Legislature to execute a tax law may be, so long as the principle lying at the root of the Act is not antagonistic to the Constitution. Nor would it affect the case, if such machinery be found defective, or if the board made mistakes. The Act gives the supreme court ample power to correct mistakes in the application of the Act.

Nor is the Act of 1884 invalid because in the ascertainment of the value of the property of the companies the franchise is to be taken into account as one element of value. The opinion of the supreme court rightly holds "that this subject is not debatable at the present day, and the doctrine has become already accredited by many decisions, as well of the federal as of the state courts."

One so-called vice of the Act of 1884 is stated in the opinion of the supreme court in the form of an interrogatory. It is asked "Whether by the law and Constitution of the State it is competent for the Legislature, at will, to select the property of two classes of corporations and impose a tax upon such property, at the same time exempting all other property from the burden." If the Act of 1884 was the only tax law on the statute book, the answer should be that it was not competent so to do. But the Act is only one of a series of tax laws under which property in the State is taxed. If by virtue of the various tax laws in force all the property in the State (except that which is devoted to collegiate, academic, religious or charitable purposes) is taxed, how can it be said that the Legislature, at will, selected the property of two classes of corporations and imposed a tax upon such property and at the same time exempted all other property from the burden of taxation. All taxes are, in one sense, state taxes. They are assessed and raised under different laws enacted by the Legislature of the State, all forming one general scheme of taxation, designed to bring all the property in the State (liable to tax) under general laws and uniform rules, according to its true value. Different agencies are employed to assess and collect, and the sums are applied to various public purposes. But this does not vitiate the system of taxation, nor render invalid any one of the Acts which, with others, constitute the system, if the constitutional prohibition be not violated.

While the taxing power is an inherent attribute of state sovereignty, to be exercised only by the legislative branch of the government, yet it is controlled by constitutional limitations which the people have adopted. So long as the legislative branch of the government conforms to the Constitution, it is supreme on the subject of taxation. It has the power and the right to enact that local officers in each taxing district shall assess and collect for their respective districts the county, township and city taxes, and distribute the money without its passing through the state treasury; or to enact that a state board shall assess and collect all taxes and bring all the money into the treasury, in part to be distributed by the state among the municipalities; or to provide for a State board to assess and collect one portion of the tax and a local board the residue. So long as all property (not exempt by statute) is reached and taxed according to its true value by general laws and uniform rules, it matters not whether the end be accomplished through one statute or through many forming one general system.

The mode of taxation under the Act to establish a system of public instruction, approved March 27, 1874, is pertinent in this connection as an illustration. Under that Act a state school tax was directed to be raised (in lieu of township school taxes), to be levied and collected by the local officers, to be paid through the several county collectors into the state treasury, and be redistributed by the State so as finally to reach the several school districts. This Act is an instance of direction by the Legislature of the specific channel into which a tax raised for a specific purpose may be made to go before it will reach the contemplated object. It shows the power of the Legislature over the subject of taxation, restrained only by constitutional provisions.

Another somewhat similar instance is the Act in reference to insurance companies of the State, the 89th section of which requires that every company organized under the Act shall pay (not as a license fee, but as tax) into the state treasury one-quarter of one per cent per annum on its capital stock for the school fund. Foreign insurance companies are required not only to pay a license fee for the privilege of transacting business within the State, but also a tax of two per cent on all premiums received in the State, to be distributed among organized fire departments, for the use of disabled firemen.

Enough has been stated to show the power of the Legislature over the subject of taxation and to demonstrate that in forming a judgment as to the validity of a specified Act, it must be taken in connection with all other laws operative on the same subject.

When the state government desires to raise a tax for state purposes, through the local officers in the several taxing districts, it becomes necessary to fix the amount to be raised and apportion it among the counties on the basis of ratables; but when the State chooses to levy a state tax direct, through the machinery of its own officers selected for the purpose, an apportionment is not needed; and it is only required to ascertain the true value of the property to be assessed and to fix the rate.

It is alleged that the Act of 1884 is unconstitutional and void because it violates the clause of the amended Constitution, which requires property to be taxed "under general laws and by uniform rules according to its true value." In the arguments addressed to the court by the several counsel of the defendants in error, this objection to the Act was elaborated and enforced, and the court is called upon to consider this branch of the case very fully.

In the first place, it will be observed that the word "all" is omitted from the sentence which contains the constitutional restriction on the power of taxation. This omission by the commission that prepared the amendment and by the Legislature that submitted it to the people was not accidental. It was intended that some property should be exempt, and that upon the classes of property which the Legislature saw fit to tax, the assessment should be according to the true value and by uniform rules, affecting alike all property of a class.

In the opinion of the supreme court in this case, it is conceded that the Legislature has the power to classify property for the purpose of taxation; but it is maintained that a class must not be declared arbitrarily, and that it must arise out of the nature of the things classed. This is true, but is not property used by railroad and canal companies for the purposes of their business, a class of property arising out of its nature? It is a class universally recognized as different from any other class in many respects. It is not the abstract value of the rails and ties as so much steel and wood, or of the land on which they rest as farm land or building lots, or of the tangible personal property in itself considered, which are alone to be taken into account in ascertaining the true value of property used for railroad purposes, but the franchise also, which puts life into what otherwise would be comparatively dead property, of little value. The true value of property used for railroad or canal purposes cannot be arrived at except in treating it as a class by itself.

This view is sustained, not only by our common knowledge, gained by observation, but is held by numerous decisions of the courts.

In 99 U. S. 722 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 502], Chief Justice Waite says: "Railroads are a peculiar species of property; and railroad corporations are in some respects peculiar corporations."

In the case of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company v. Kentucky, 115 U. S. 321 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 414], Justice Matthews said: "The right to classify railroad property as a separate class for purposes of taxation grows out of the inherent nature of the property."

As has been seen already, the Acts of 1873 and 1876 were grounded on the same general principle as the Act of 1884, and it becomes important in this connection to inquire how the courts have practically regarded those former Acts. In case of State, Central R. R. Co. of New Jersey, pro. v. Mutchler, Collector of Town of Phillipsburg, reported in 12 Vroom, 96, a bridge within the main stem (100 feet wide) of the railroad of said company was assessed for local taxes, and the company claimed exemption from such assessment, under the laws then existing on the subject of railroad taxation. Those laws were the Acts of 1873 and 1876 before mentioned. On page 97 the court, in its opinion delivered in 1879, said: "The first section of the Act for the taxation of railroad corporations of April 2, 1873, exempts from county, township and municipal taxation the main stem or road bed and track of such corporation, not exceeding 100 feet in width. The last-mentioned Act was modified by the Act of April 13, 1876, but the Act of 1873 was not repealed. Its provisions, except so far as altered by Act of 1876, are still in force. In the respects mentioned it is in force, and lands held by such corporations within the prescribed limits are exempt from taxation for county, township and municipal purposes, if used exclusively for railroad purposes. It purports to establish a uniform rule of taxation on this subject. A uniform rule must necessarily be the only rule applicable to the entire class of subjects embraced within the provisions of the statute, and by implication supersedes and excludes all other rules on the subject. The Act of 1873 is expressly made applicable to all railroad corporations occupying or using railroads in this State, whether as lessees or otherwise." The local assessment on the bridge was set aside. It does not appear that the question of the validity of the Acts of 1873 and 1876 was raised, or that it suggested itself to court or counsel on that occasion. The validity of the Acts was taken for granted and the result was that the company had the benefit of those Acts of being declared exempt from the tax on the bridge. Had those Acts been unconstitutional and void, the assessment for local tax on the bridge was lawful.

In Van Riper v. Parsons, 11 Vroom, 8, the supreme court uses the following language, viz.: "A law settling the methods by which all railroads should become incorporated, would be special in the sense that it would be confined in its operation to but a single kind of corporations; and so a law would be local, by this same test, that should provide for the organization, under one system, of all the municipal governments in the State, as such a law would manifestly have a restricted effect with respect to locality. But who, conversant with the usage touching these terms, would venture the assertion that such statutes as these would not be general laws? All legislation is based, of necessity, on a classification of its subjects; and when such classification is fairly made, and the legislation founded upon it is appropriate to such classification, such legislation is as legitimate now as it would have been prior to the recent amendments to the Constitution. * * * If a set of objects be fairly classified, a law embracing them will be a general one and in all respects unobjectionable."

The case of Van Riper v. Parsons came before the supreme court again, and on page 123 of 11th Vroom, the syllabus of the decision is tersely stated thus, viz.: "A law framed in general terms, restricted to no locality, and operating equally upon all of a group of objects which, having regard to the purposes of the legislation, are distinguished by characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them a class by themselves, is not a special or local law but a general law." If property used for railroad and canal purposes be not distinguished from all other property by marked and important characteristics, it would be difficult to find any property which could be classified.

It should be observed that at the time the constitutional amendment was adopted, the Act of 1873, which treated property used for railroad purposes as a separate class, was in force; and that feature of the Act has never been changed.

The case of the New Jersey Southern Railroad Company v. Board of Railroad Comrs. reported in 12 Vroom, page 235, was decided more than three years after the amendment to the Constitution took effect. That opinion is founded on the assumption that the Acts of 1873 and 1876, for the taxation of property used for railroad purposes, were constitutional and valid laws. The question of constitutionality was not, in that case, distinctly raised, but the validity of those Acts was taken for granted and acted upon, as has been repeatedly done by the courts during a period of ten years after the adoption of the constitutional amendment in reference to taxation. In the case to which reference is last made, the justice who delivered the opinion said: "In 1877 a state tax was laid on each of these corporations by the board of railroad commissioners, pursuant to the provisions of the Act entitled 'An Act Providing for State Taxes on Railroads and a More Efficient Collection Thereof,' approved April 13, 1876. These writs of certiorari were sued out to review the legality of such assessments." The court held the assessments legal and properly made.

Although no case is reported wherein the constitutional objection to the Act of 1876 or 1873 was expressly made, yet it appears by the files and records in the office of the clerk of the supreme court that each of the then justices had before him for review assessments on railroad property under the fourth section of the Act of 1876, on claim of reduction, and that each justice proceeded to act under that section as if the law was constitutional. In one case the validity of the Act was attacked, but the justice disregarded the objection and fixed the amount of the tax. A certiorari was taken, and to the return was attached by counsel of the company the following, viz.: "The Constitution of the State of New Jersey provides that property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value. It is submitted that the statute under which the taxes in question have been assessed is not a general but a special law, applicable to corporate property in railroads only, and that the Act is unconstitutional and void." The certiorari in that case was dismissed for want of prosecution, but was reinstated by consent. The writ was again dismissed and a writ of error taken, but the case was never brought to a hearing.

Under the Act of 1876 large sums of money were each year collected as taxes on property used for railroad purposes and paid into the state treasury. After such action on the part of the State, and acquiescence on the part of the Companies for so long a period of time under the Acts of 1876 and 1873, the question of the constitutionality of a similar Act is now raised. Such acquiescence on the part of the companies affected may not be decisive upon the question of constitutionality now distinctly raised, yet the practical construction given by the courts and acted upon by the companies may be taken as some evidence of contemporaneous opinion. As was said by the supreme court in the case of State v. Kelsey, 15 Vroom, 1, "Such a course of practice may amount to a practical exposition."

The uniformity of rules in taxation which the Constitution requires is that uniformity which operates on the whole of a class. A tax upon property of railway corporations should be governed by uniform rules as to the property of all such companies used for railroad purposes. The Act of 1884, now under examination, is within this rule. It operates uniformly upon the property of all railroad corporations used for railroad purposes, being, as has been already demonstrated, a distinctive class, by reason of inherent qualities, and, therefore, not antagonistic to the constitutional requirement of uniformity.

Still another question has arisen which should here be disposed of. It is whether these Companies are exempt from the assessments made under the Act of 1884, by reason of the clause inserted in their respective charters, that the tax of one-half of one per cent is in lieu of all other taxes or imposts. This is accompanied by a subsequent clause in the same connection, which provides that the charter may be altered, modified or repealed. This provision is also expressed in the sixth section of the General Corporation Act. Charters of this nature have received construction repeatedly in the New Jersey Courts.

In State, Jersey City and Bergen R. R. Co. v. Jersey City, 2 Vroom, 577, the justice who delivered the opinion of the court of errors, after quoting the clause in the charter of the company providing for the payment to the treasurer of the State annually by the company of one-half of one per cent on the cost of the road, and that no other tax or impost should be assessed or levied upon said company, and that the Legislature might at any time alter, modify or repeal the same, said: "The contract which is set up is the proviso in the fourteenth section of their charter before cited, which, following the provision fixing the annual sum they are to pay, declares that no other tax or impost shall be levied or assessed upon them. This designation of what they are to pay, connected with the proviso excluding all other burdens in the form of taxation, they contend, forms a contract between them and the State. These statutory provisions form, in my opinion, a contract neither in letter nor spirit. They are to be read in connection with the other provisions in the charter which reserves to the Legislature the right to alter, modify or repeal."

In 1 Vroom, 368, it is decided, in referring to the latter clause, that "The language extends to all the provisions of the charter."

In State, Little, v. Powers, 17 Vroom, 300, it was adjudged in effect that such provision in a railroad charter was not a contract, and that a railroad corporation having a repealable charter was subject to additional taxation.

In Tomlinson v. Jessup, reported in 15 Wallace, 454 [82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 204], the Supreme Court of the United States held that "The reservation affects the entire relation between the State and the corporation, and places under legislative control all rights, privileges and immunities derived by its charter directly from the State."

Having considered the question of the constitutionality of the Act of 1884, in all its bearings, after a careful examination of the organic law and all the statutes relating to the assessment of taxes on railroad and canal property, and the authorities on the subject, I have reached the conclusion that the said Act does not in any particular violate the Constitution of the State of New Jersey and that it is a valid law.

The Act in question is not only constitutional but is founded on a just basis. While it requires of the Companies the payment of one-half of one per cent for state purposes, it so guards against imposition, in the assessment of local taxes, that in no case can a company be forced to pay more than the local rate, but may pay much less. If there be any inequality, it is favorable to the companies, and of this they have no legal right to complain. It is the injured party who has the right to move for the correction of errors.

But it is contended that the Act of 1884 is in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution, which provides that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. To sustain this contention the case of County of San Mateo v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co. is cited. A critical examination of that case leads to the conclusion that it does not have the slightest application to the question now before the court.

The County of San Mateo brought suit against the company to recover state and county taxes claimed to be due from that corporation. The company had expended a large sum of money in the construction of its road, and, to secure a portion of the indebtedness, had executed a mortgage upon its railroad, rolling stock, appurtenances and franchises, and also upon some land not used for railroad purposes. The board of equalization of the State of California assessed against the company taxes on the whole of its property, without any deduction from its value on account of the mortgage given upon it to secure its indebtedness. Under the Constitution of that State, persons operating a railroad only in one county had the right to deduct from the valuation for mortgage debts, while those operating a railroad in more counties than one could not claim deduction therefor.

There was also another distinction made in the Constitution of California between railroad property held by individuals and that held by corporations, which worked inequality. In the opinion delivered by Justice Field, in the United States Circuit Court, in the San Mateo Case, he said: "If we look at the scheme of taxation prescribed by the Constitution of California, for the property of railroad companies, we will perceive a flagrant departure from the rule of equality and uniformity, so essential in the distribution of the burdens of government. Wherever an individual holds property incumbered with a mortgage, he is assessed at its value, after deducting from it the amount of the mortgage; if a railroad corporation holds property subject to a mortgage, it is assessed at its full value without any deduction for the mortgage, and as if the property was unincumbered."

It will at once be seen that the facts in the San Mateo Case are entirely different from those developed by an examination of the Act of 1884; and how the decision in that case can be tortured into an authority to show that the Act of 1884 violated in any respect the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States is beyond my comprehension.

The Act of 1884 makes no such discrimination in the valuation of railroad property, incumbered by mortgage, as is made by the Constitution of California. On the contrary, the Act of 1884, in the 10th section, expressly provides, that in case any railroad or canal company shall claim a deduction, on account of mortgage, or debt secured thereby, the state board of assessors shall allow the same, in the cases in which and to the extent to which the local assessors are authorized by law to allow a deduction in the case of any other owner of mortgaged lands.

Upon the whole case, I am clear in the opinion that the Act "for the taxation of railroad and canal property," approved April 10, 1884, is not unconstitutional and void, but is constitutional and valid, in all its parts.

The judgment of the Supreme Court should be reversed.

I have prepared an opinion stating my conclusions, without discussing the whole subject in controversy. The questions raised and discussed on the writs of error to this court relate to the validity of the Act entitled "An Act for the Taxation of Railroad and Canal Property," approved April 10, 1884, and whether, if said law be invalid, there is any other statute under which this court may make or direct a legal assessment. It is not necessary to add anything to what has been already said by other members of the court on the latter part of this proposition; and I entirely agree with the conclusion that no prior statute exists by which these disputed assessments against railroad corporations can be amended or sustained, if this law be invalid, or by which any new assessment can be substituted in the place of these by any action of this court. The former part of the proposition is more difficult to determine. Is this law invalid, so that it cannot be executed without violating the fundamental law of our State? If it be not thus controlled and annulled, it is the duty of this court to give it effect. It is not our province to say whether the law is impolitic, or even oppressive, or unjust in its provisions, so long as it does not violate the constitutional rights of these corporations in the enforcement of what is designed to be strictly a tax law. The judicial power cannot legitimately question the policy or refuse to sanction the provisions of any law not inconsistent with the fundamental law of the State. Cooley, Taxation 34. The power to tax may be exercised oppressively upon persons, but the responsibility of the Legislature is not to the courts, but to the people, by whom its members are elected. So, if a particular tax bears heavily upon a corporation or a class of corporations, it cannot, for that reason only, be pronounced contrary to the Constitution. Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 548 [75 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 487].

A mere suggestion of these familiar principles of law, giving the well defined duties and powers of the co-ordinate branches of our government will dispose of many points in the arguments of counsel and bring us to the real issue which we have the power at this time to decide under the assignment of errors before us. Is this tax law of which these railroad corporations complain unconstitutional? If so, this case is ended. If not, further proceedings may correct its alleged defective execution. That part of the Constitution which is said to be violated by its enactments is article 4, sec. 7, par. 12: "Property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value."

There can be no question that this law imposes a tax on property, and it is not a franchise tax. By subdivision 4 of section 3 of the Act, the value of the franchise is to be estimated and included in ascertaining the true value of all property used for railroad and canal purposes, and the tax is imposed on this total valuation. All is designated in the Act as property, and is within the scope of this paragraph of the Constitution. That the franchise of a railroad or canal company may be thus valued and assessed for general taxes is abundantly settled both by authority and precedent in legislative Acts and in the decisions of courts. It has an appreciable market value not in all cases easy to measure and not always determinable by the same rule or estimate. Corporate rights and privileges by grant from the government are not mere abstractions, or so involved with the other property of the corporation that they cannot be valued. The land, road bed, rails, buildings and materials of which a railroad are composed have a value; and the added worth given to them by the uses to which they may be applied by the public grant of a franchise for such uses may be approximately if not exactly estimated. It has often been done and sanctioned by courts. How this may best be done must be left largely to legislative discretion and judgment. The whole aggregate property of the railroad is thus to be valued and brought together for taxation; and the assessment is laid upon it to supply a revenue for the government of the State. This is an assessment of property for taxation within the above cited paragraph of the Constitution, and, by its terms, must be made under general laws. This I hold is a general law, applicable to all the railroads and canal companies in the State, unless they are protected by express limitations of taxation in their charter, and by what are called, in some cases, irrevocable contracts beyond legislative control. Railroad corporations have peculiar qualities which distinguish them from mere private corporations, or other public or quasi public corporations, in the right of eminent domain to condemn lands, conferred on them by charter; in the uses to which their railroads may be applied by them as carriers of passengers and freight, receiving tolls or fares for the same; in the employment of steam power—a dangerous agency—in passing through the State, and their protection in the careful use of such agency; in the structure of the road, with its rails, cuts, embankments, often built and maintained at a great detriment to other property; in the extent of the road, often through several counties, or across the State; in the depots, freight houses, wharves, and the great accumulation of property at the termini and other points on the line of the railway. Canals have some of the same peculiarities in the construction and maintenance of their water ways. These characteristics, which so clearly distinguish them from other corporations, make it almost a necessity that they should form a class by themselves; and the right to do this for taxation has been recognized in the charters of companies in our General Railroad Act, the General Canal Act, and laws passed prior to and since the amendments to the Constitution in 1875, notably the tax laws of 1878 and 1876, all of which have been enforced and acquiesced in. In the Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 821 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 414], the classification of the property of railroads for taxation is recognized, and in the opinion of the court, Justice Matthews says: "The right to classify railroad property as a separate class for purposes of taxation grows out of the inherent nature of the property and the discretion vested by the Constitution of the State in its Legislature, and necessarily involves the right on its part to devise and carry into effect a distinct scheme with different tribunals in the proceeding to value it."

We have no right to assume that this discretion will be abused and railroads taxed out of existence, as has been said, and to strain the power of the court to protect them in anticipation of such attempt at destruction. If the property of railroad and canal companies admits of this distinctive classification, founded on real differences and not on mere devices for the manifest purpose to oppress and harass them by unequal taxation, then the law which classifies them for taxation is general, within the description of such a law in the well known and oft quoted decisions of our own courts.

The word "all" does not precede the word "property" in the paragraph referred to, and property may, therefore, be classified, and even exempted from taxation, as is sometimes done, without violating the express words of the Constitution.

Besides the requirement that property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws it must also be assessed "by uniform rules." The word "uniform" is defined as "not variable," "not different," "having the same form or manner." As it stands in this paragraph of the Constitution it means that rules must not be variable in their application to the subject of taxation included in the classification of property. In the Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580-594 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 798, 802], in construing the clause of the Constitution of the United States that "All duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States," the court said: "The tax is uniform when it operates with the same force and effect in every place where the subject is found," but that "perfect uniformity and perfect equality of taxation in all aspects in which the human mind can view it, is a baseless dream, as this court has said more than once;" citing State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 612 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 663, 673]. The rules for taxation must be uniform as to the property in the class on which it operates. As to railroad property, all property in that class must be assessed for taxes by the same rules. But suppose the law by its uniformity does produce unequal and unjust results in some cases, is it therefore to be annulled? Suppose, as in this case, that the main stem, which includes the road bed not exceeding 100 feet in width, with its rails, sleepers and depot buildings used for passengers, connected therewith, is assessed at one rate, and the other real estate used for railroad purposes in each taxing district is assessed at another rate, and no good reason is assigned for such difference; or suppose, as in section 6 of this Act of 1884, it is enacted "That whenever in any taxing district there shall be several branch lines of railroad belonging to or controlled by one company, or operated under one management, the assessors shall designate one of said lines as the main stem and the value of the others shall be included in the separate valuation provided for in the second subdivision, section 3, in this bill (that is, the value of the real estate used for railroad purposes in each taxing district in this State, other than the main stem), and that this rule applied to some of the railroads produces unequal and unjust results, will these invalidate the law in whole or in part? These inequalities arise mainly from the fact that some railroad corporations have acquired more of a certain kind of property than others, and they have extended their holding, in many cases, far beyond the width of 100 feet for the main stem of the road as originally intended and provided for in their charters. If all are taxed alike for such excess, the rule of uniformity is not thereby violated. Has not the Legislature the legal right to say that for the main stem of the road 100 feet in width, which the original charter contemplated the railroad companies should hold and use, they will tax at the rate of one half of one per cent for state purposes, which was the amount originally fixed in most if not all of the charters; but for all acquired beyond 100 feet in width a greater tax shall be paid, not to exceed in the aggregate of both taxes the local rate as fixed and assessed for county and municipal purposes? The same rule is applied, by this separation, to all in the class, and they are by this law carefully guarded, not only against assessment at a higher rate than others of the class, but also against a higher rate than is imposed on other property holders in the several taxing districts where their property is located.

The objection that the property of railroads by this law is not assessed by taxes according to its true value because it can only be truly valued as an entirety, and not in parcels, as provided for in the Act, is not well taken. The method of determining the true value of property must be left to the discretion of the Legislature. If this value is fixed as the basis of taxation, the method and the agencies to be used to ascertain it belong to the legislative and not to the judicial province.

Nothing is said in the Constitution as to the apportionment of taxes after they are assessed and collected. If, as in this case, one half of one per cent is reserved for state purposes, and one per cent be distributed for local expenses for which general taxes may be assessed, this court cannot interfere with such apportionment, for the reason that there is no restriction in the Constitution of the power of the Legislature to make such apportionment. This is but a convenient form of collection and distribution of taxes when collected, without increasing the general rate of either the individual taxpayer or the railroad and canal company.

It is argued that "the equal protection of the law" under the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, exempts from any greater burden or charges than such as are equally imposed upon all others under like circumstances, and that this equal protection forbids unequal exactions of every kind, and among them that of unequal taxation. Admitting this to be so, and I am not disposed to deny it, the limitation to all persons and property in like circumstances restricts the comparison to all those within the same classification for taxation. This law does not stand alone in the classification of property for taxation, but it is part of a system of tax laws by which this burden is distributed among all classes of persons and upon all taxable property, with slight exemptions, within the State, and taxes are thereby raised for the expenses of the state, county and municipal governments in their different departments, and according to their several requirements. Thus far, as it appears to me, there has been a fair effort throughout the whole system to place all persons and property, so far as may be practicable, within the equal protection of the laws, both constitutional and legislative. That there are errors in details and in some of the methods of assessment, all will probably admit; and doubtless when these are made plain by the practical working of the law they will be corrected. But substantial and not exact equality is all that can be required under any system of legislation for taxes. Unless this law is manifestly wrong, it should be sustained. In my opinion, it is not, and the judgment should be reversed.

I have reached a conclusion in harmony with the opinion of the court, and therefore shall set forth the reasons for so doing but briefly on the record. Nor would I consider it at all necessary, if such reasons were similar precisely to those formulated in the judgment to be rendered. I think, besides, from the gravity of the matters involved in the determination of the case, that these views should be expressed by more than a mere signification of assent. This is why I propose to add something to what has been said, though not required to sustain or strengthen the decision about to be given.

Until thirty-five years ago, state revenue was raised in New Jersey by assessments imposed on land and certainties, so-called, that is gold and silver coin, and other property of a visible and tangible nature. This system had the merit of simplicity; but public sentiment, after a century and a half of practice, demanded a change because the burden of taxation was distributed unequally and unjustly. So, to remedy this, another species of property, invisible, incorporeal and intangible was brought under the reach of the assessor. But under the new departure, though intended to remove the dissatisfaction existing previously, complaints of injustice were none the less frequent than before, and while the essential features were preserved, the plan was subject to constant modification. Equal taxation, like other abstract propositions, was easy to lay down in words; but to carry out in practice, hic labor, hoc opus erat. Finally, after a quarter of a century of experimental economy, constitutional restriction, to which the legislative authority had not been subjected previously, interposed, and declared that property should be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value. The words are imposing and equitable in sound but, like all similar declarations of a general nature, when submitted to the touchstone of human ingenuity, sharpened by legal acumen, are capable of various interpretations when sought to be applied to a practical result. The case now under consideration is an illustration in point. Difficulties arise at once in establishing any principle of impost on property for purposes of state revenue. Note here how learned legal critics differ as to the meaning of state tax. While that phraseology may be, and for ordinary and distinctive purposes is, distinguished from what, for similar convenience, are recognized as local or municipal assessments, still when considered as a system or science, no tax can be regarded as other than an impost of the State, because no other authority can lay a custom levy. It is in such a character and connection only that a judicial tribunal can contemplate the word "taxes" in a constitutional aspect. As matter of fact, any ordinary state tax, whenever laid, is collected through municipal instrumentality. Any argument drawn from a specious distinction between state and local taxation must be outside of constitutional intent, and therefore fallacious, and should be disregarded in arriving at a final determination of this controversy.

Then, too, the single and simple word "property," the very first in the amendment restricting legislative power in this particular, has elicited vigorous judicial criticism as well as sharp and spicy legal sparring. Who would suppose so little a phrase would involve such a wide variation as shown in the argument? That so much could have been said, so many learned words uttered in attempting to prove the meaning of the classical little logos as used in the constitutional sentence? Property was to be assessed for taxes, nothing else could be. There is a popular definition of the word, in which those who have none are not concerned, and those who have, generally try to keep but little on hand during the summer months. The word would seem to have but one signification for practical purposes. It is something seen and handled, touched, of which there is a visible fixed sign. All agree to that. But it is said property as used in the amendment implies totality; and, if it does not, then some only and not all is assessed. In opposition to this, it is claimed that whatever property is assessed is a totality, is all that is required by the Constitution. Here a difficulty is started that must be settled by a judicial tribunal. What meaning is contemplated by the use of the word? Property is the single logos. It is in the beginning of the sentence, single and simple, not qualified by any limitations. It must signify all or only some. The Constitution does not declare that the whole or part only of property should be assessed for taxes. What is the natural construction of the word in connection with practice and contemporary exposition? Legislative power had been the sole arbiter in matters of financial economy for nearly two centuries in the history of the Commonwealth prior to the restrictions of 1875, and the latter in this respect did not limit the discretion of that power. The same rule has obtained since as was followed before the amendment was adopted. There have been ten years of practice under the new dispensation, and that should go far toward determining the construction of the term. "Property" here is a totality, and "all property" could be no more, for the reason that both would mean whatever property was assessed in the exercise of legislative discretion. The construction that seems to me to be natural and proper is that whatever property the Legislature should determine to assess, whether all or a part, must be taxed after certain mode and manner. That body, untrammelled and sovereign as to this, might select whatever it chose to bear the burden of custom, tithe and tribute; and that would be a totality because it would be all the property made subject to taxation. In my judgment, there was error in the opinion of the supreme court in this respect.

This leads to the consideration of the constitutionality of the law, which is the only action a judicial tribunal can take. The taxing power is a legislative function exclusively, and is the life of a state government. Taxation is a prominent factor in state sovereignty. The power that exercises a prerogative of that high character cannot be stigmatized as a heresy. The exalted nature of the power is dwarfed because the use is so common. That other prerogative, the authority to declare war, is regarded generally as the ultima thule, the limit beyond which a State cannot go, but that must be furnished with the means of existence, or it becomes unavailing as an engine of destruction. It is wondrous because comparatively so uncommon. The light of the sun exceeds in intensity any product of human ingenuity, but is matter of everyday occurrence, and the radiance of his lustre excites no astonishment among men because so common to the eye. State taxation is before the people continually, and so the transcendent nature of the power it wields, the innate, inherent sovereign attributes it possesses are not recognized as if exercised less frequently. Taxation is always with us. Such a power, of necessity, must be arbitrary, more or less, in the execution of its details and destructions. Judicial decision can only restrain the exercise of this power within the limits of the Constitution; all other relief is legislative. In New Jersey this prerogative of the Legislature can be restricted by the interposition of a legal or equitable tribunal, simply and solely because it has run beyond the bounds imposed on it. In that case, it is within the province of a court to grant relief. A township assessor is as much an autocrat in his homœopathic domain as the quadrilateral created by the Act under review is within the limits of its more imperial sway. The acts of each may be supervised by legal authority, but such supervision does not touch or question the right of the Legislature in the premises.

The issue, then, to be determined here is whether this Act does or does not conflict with the Constitution. Had the Legislature authority, under the restrictive amendments of 1875, to pass this particular law for the taxation of railroad and canal property?

Three essential requirements are prescribed. Property taxed is to be assessed under general laws, by uniform rules and according to its true value. My reflections have led me to the conclusion that the last two elements will follow the determination of the first, or that this case turns on the question whether the statute is a general law of the kind contemplated by the Constitution. I shall consider them in the reverse order.

Property is to be assessed according to its true value. The Act requires the assessors to do this, and the opinion admits that such valuation has been made under the law. This is just what the local assessor is required to do, and if he is governed exclusively by municipal interests is rather apt not to do. The state assessors were appointed to perform this work; they report that in the exercise of the discretion intrusted and the powers vested in them, they have determined what they consider to be a true value of the property to be assessed. They have taken all elements into consideration, and have fulfilled the purpose for which they were commissioned. The properties in question, therefore, have been assessed according to the intent of the Constitution; that is, at a true value through agents appointed by law.

Property, when taxed, is to be assessed by uniform rules. If it be found that the Act sought to be overthrown is a general law within the limits of the Constitution, then I fail to see in what way the assessors have done otherwise than cause the property they were required to tax to be so taxed by a uniform rule. The records show that just the same plan was adopted in each case. No discrimination in this respect is manifest. If there was, and it appeared that one road was assessed by one rule, and one by another, and a third by a mode different from either, a multiplicity of rules must have been shown in the result of the work of the commission. After a thorough and careful examination of the records, I find no evidence of this. Should the law stand the constitutional test, I think it clear that all the requisite essentials of uniform rules are preserved in its enactment. Let us see how this may be.

A general law, in the abstract, must be defined in some way before it can be carried out practically. It is by no means difficult to declare that property must be assessed under general laws. This, laid down as a general principle, would seem to command universal assent. Who will venture to disagree with the proposition? No better illustration, however, of the difficulties and differences attending on its execution can be found than is shown in the history of this Statute of 1884. Take a specimen. The appellants insist that the law is general in operation, and the framers designed to adhere to the letter and spirit of the Constitution. No legislator proposed to set up law in contravention of that. Oh, no, say the respondents, that is a mighty mistake; the law is special and not general. I quote directly from the record. Both are satisfied with the sound of the abstract declaration. But when a departure is attempted from that, a variation appears that is as divergent as many minds. Other instances of this divergence could be adduced from the books of the case, of all which it may be said that, like two parallel lines when extended, they run on but never meet, though, unlike those lines in this aspect, they become wider and still more wide apart upon their onward way. I can only say farther, in this connection, that it is the province of the court, under such circumstances, to settle and determine the matters in litigation; and, in my view, this must be decided ultimately by ascertaining whether the statute in question is or is not a general law in the intent of the Constitution. If not, the whole superstructure of the law must fall.

Property in the State is to be taxed in that way only. Then, to be so taxed, a law must run or be coextensive with the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth and not affect simply a portion of the territorial limits. This includes all state territory, for the application of its prescription is not confined to any portion or portions, county or counties, city or cities; not even so much as a township is excepted from its operation. In this view it must be regarded as general. But the purport of the statute is to tax the property of railroads and canals, and no other kind. Is that within the meaning of the restriction? I think so, for the reason that if the word "general" is to have a signification broader or more extended than this, then taxation could be accomplished only under one single law, sweeping in all classes of individuals and property. This would be absurd manifestly, and next to impossible almost, to execute. A strict construction would require a repetition of this process, whenever an alteration or amendment was necessary. The true intent must be that the law-making power could not select certain property, say, for instance, that of the West End Railroad Company, or a pottery in Trenton, or an oyster fishery in Perth Amboy, and take those properties by one method and under one law, and another railroad company, pottery or oyster fishery by another method and under another law. But it does seem to me that it can take "a homogeneous mass of property" throughout the State and now to be found in every county, without such being arbitrary in any sense other than what is justified by the necessity always existing under any system of taxation. Selection in this way is the same as classification. I do not understand that there is any controversy but what a general law permits classification of property, and as that of railroads and canals all over the State is included in the Act, I fail to see by what reasoning it can be part and not the whole of a class. All is brought in alike and taxed; that is, all of this particular property. It is a class by itself, and but one part of a whole system. Acts for this purpose have been passed before, and no court has declared them to be contrary to the meaning of the Constitution. Even corporations created by special laws have been regarded under the state system as a separate class, and to be assessed by a separate method from other corporations and railroads and canals would as certainly be a proper classification. Without extending these remarks, it is clear to me that the Act must be regarded as a general law, within the pale of the Constitution, and I shall vote to reverse the judgment below.

No reference has been made to authorities, as those appear in the opinions already given to sustain the law, nor shall I review or criticise any of those which are adduced to maintain the contrary, farther than to say that I have not been able to discover any analogy between the principle involved in the San Mateo Case and this.

and canal property," approved April 10, 1884, taxes were levied in that year upon all property used for railroad or canal purposes under a franchise in this State. The Central Railroad Company of New Jersey, and thirty-three other railroad and canal corporations sued out writs of certiorari to review the assessments thus made, and thereupon the supreme court held the Act to be unconstitutional, and for that reason set aside the taxes. Writs of error were then brought on behalf of the State, and the records are now before us. Although it is within the province of this court, on writ of error, not only to reverse or affirm the judgment brought up, but also in case of reversal to render such judgment as should have been entered below, if the necessary facts have been settled, yet upon the argument the court confined the present inquiry to the question in substance whether the judgments of the supreme court should stand.

The defendants in error insist that the statute is invalid, because it violates fundamental principles which must be observed in every exercise of the taxing power, because it does not conform to paragraph 12, section VII, article IV of the State Constitution, and because it infringes the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

The general principles of taxation need but slight notice. It is laid down that the power to tax belongs to the Legislature and its agents exclusively, and that the courts, in the absence of constitutional restriction, have no control over its exercise, beyond seeing that the will of the Legislature is enforced. By this is meant, not that the power of taxation is a limitless power, but only that the legislative authority over the subject, taxation, is absolute. Taxation is a thing capable of definition, the boundaries of which in our system of government are to be ascertained from the history of the English and American peoples; but over the area thus determined the will of the Legislature is the supreme law. No doubt impolitic or unjust taxes may be levied, but the only remedy for such impositions is by appeal to the Legislature. The courts may decide whether any particular exaction is a tax or not, but if found to be a tax such as they whose institutions we inherit recognized as coming within the range of the taxing power, it is the duty of the judiciary to uphold the levy, regardless of their own views of its wisdom or equity. The struggle for fairness of taxation must remain in the parliamentary arena, except as it may be removed to some other sphere by constitutional provision.

With regard to the present law, nothing has been urged against it on the general principles of taxation, which may not, with equal force, be urged against it on the words of our Constitution, except the assertion that the Legislature cannot authorize a levy to be made without first determining how much is needed for governmental purposes and confining the levy to that sum. I know of nothing in the history of taxation which gives countenance to this claim, and therefore pass on to consider the constitutional restrictions.

The State Constitution declares that "Property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws, and by uniform rules, according to its true value."

It is clear that the case in hand is subject to this provision, that it is one wherein property is assessed for taxes. This is manifest both from the title of the statute, "An Act for the Taxation of Railroad and Canal Property," and from the body of the law, by which the ownership or possession of property is made the sole ground for and measure of assessment. It is necessary, therefore, to ascertain the meaning of this constitutional clause.

The sentence does not import that all the property within the jurisdiction of the taxing body must be assessed. Such an aim has never been deemed attainable by theorists, such an object has never been sought after by the Legislature of this State, such an interpretation has never, by any branch of the government, been put upon the provision, and its language does not fairly support such a meaning. This clause was engrafted upon our organic law by amendment adopted September 7, 1875, when it was still, as it long has been and yet is, an open question among political economists, how taxes should be distributed over property so that their burdens may be borne by those best fitted to sustain them; and it is reasonable to suppose that, if there had been entertained a design to settle this question by constitutional edict, the design would have been plainly declared. But such an intention cannot be made apparent on the face of this amendment without adding to it a word the importance of which the framers could not have overlooked. "Property" and "all property" are not interchangeable terms, and we are not warranted in substituting one for the other. The whole purpose of the sentence appears to be to define the mode in which property shall be dealt with when it is assessed for taxes. It requires three things in such assessments: first, that they shall be made under general laws; secondly, that they shall be made by uniform rules; thirdly, that they shall be made according to the true value of the property assessed. The signification of these three clauses will afford us the proper tests of the validity of the statute under review.

First. What are general laws?

Since the expression "general laws" became prominent in our theories of constitutional construction, it has been on all hands agreed that a law operating equally throughout the State, and embracing all of a group of objects which naturally form a class by themselves, or which are fairly classified by the Legislature for legislation touching the basis of classification, is a general law. This principle was enunciated by the Chief Justice in Van Riper v. Parsons, 11 Vroom, 1, and is now firmly imbedded in our jurisprudence. For present purposes, the phrase "general laws" needs no further definition.

Secondly. What are uniform rules for the assessment of property?

In Stratton v. Collins, 14 Vroom, 562, it was said that this clause requires that the same imposition should be made upon all the taxable property in the township for township purposes, in the county for county purposes, and in the State for state purposes. This statement, although sufficiently exact for the case then before the court, is broader than the Constitution seems, on reflection, to demand. The expression "uniform rules" is not of wider import than the expression "general laws;" and if the latter may be confined to a class, with equal propriety may the former. Indeed, strictly speaking, a prescript may be a uniform rule, without prevailing over even a class; for it would be a rule, if designed for the government of a single individual, and, if designed for the government of more than one, could be called a uniform rule. But such an interpretation would be too narrow for this constitutional phrase. Its collocation with the words "general laws" indicates that it was to have a corresponding meaning, and the whole sentence becomes harmonious by holding that it requires the same regulations to be applied to every member of each class which the general laws recognize or establish. This signification of the word "uniform" is common. Thus the laws of nature are uniform, although none of them is universal, and many operate in single classes only. The same idea is well illustrated in the practice of the United States Government. The Federal Constitution provides that all duties, imports and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States; yet these taxes have always been levied in divers methods and amounts upon the different classes of property and business. So it empowers Congress "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." But various rules of naturalization have been prescribed and maintained without question, for distinct classes of aliens, as widows, minors, soldiers, seamen, and those residing here before specified dates; and the laws for the bankruptcy of bankers and traders have differed from those concerning other persons. This diversity in uniformity can rest only on the right to classify. The same import is expressly affixed to the word in the Constitutions of Pennsylvania and Illinois, which enjoin uniformity in each class only; but it is held to be implied with equal force in the Constitution of Wisconsin under the provision that "the rule of taxation shall be uniform." Wisconsin Central R. R. Co. v. Taylor County, 52 Wis. 37. Similar views of the meaning of the term are expressed in Youngblood v. Sexton, 32 Mich. 406.

The third clause of the provision: that property shall be assessed for taxes according to its true value, excludes an assessment according to cost, number, weight, measures, fineness, or any other standard except true value, that is, the value which it has in exchange for money, and requires that the tax exacted from each person owning or possessing property of the class assessed shall bear the same proportion to the whole amount of taxes exacted from all persons having property of that class, as the true value of each one's classified property bears to the true value of all the property. With these explanations of the constitutional provision, we come to examine the statute in question.

This enactment is susceptible of two interpretations: one, as being designed to authorize a single annual tax, levied upon all property in the State used for railroad or canal purposes under a franchise; the other as being designed to authorize such a tax, for the direct use of the State, and also an annual tax for each taxing district, to be levied upon so much of the real estate used for railroad or canal purposes in each district, as is described in subdivision II, of section 3 of the statute. A perusal of section 12 shows that while the whole sum chargeable in each year against any company is made a unit for the purpose of collection, constituting a single lien, a single debt, recoverable by a single action, yet up to the point of ascertaining what each company shall pay for the use of the State, and what for the use of each taxing district in which its property lies, the processes of assessment are distinct, or at least quite distinguishable. The court is, therefore, at liberty to adopt whichever view of the Act will most accord with the Constitution and effectuate the legislative purpose to tax.

Let us first consider the law as one to impose a tax for the State and a separate tax for each district.

With regard to the state tax, the law provides for a board of assessors, and directs these officers to ascertain the true value of all property, used for railroad or canal purposes, of each railroad and of each canal company in this State, including its franchises, and embracing in the term "company" not only corporations, but also individuals and associations owning or operating railroads or canals under a franchise; and it imposes an annual tax of one-half of one per centum of such value upon each company. These are the essential features of the assessment. The action contains, besides, some instructions as to the mode of ascertaining true value and of claiming and allowing deductions for debts, etc.; but these are only subsidiary to the main design, and if in themselves misleading or unconstitutional, can be rectified or disregarded, under that provision of the Act which requires the supreme court to correct assessments appearing to have been made upon erroneous principles or for improper amounts. If, therefore, these essential features of the law are consistent with the Constitution, the law is valid, and this tax can be maintained, either as it was levied by the assessors or as it may be modified by the supreme court. Is the law, then, with reference to these features, constitutional?

The property to be assessed is all property used for railroad purposes and all property used for canal purposes. This is, in my judgment, legitimate classification. It is true that things used for railroad and canal purposes are not in essence different from such things when put to other uses. But classification of property need not rest upon the essence of things. The use made of them forms as just and as common a basis of classification as does their essence. So prominent in the very conception of property is the use of things, that it would be singular if property as such had not been often classed upon that basis. Accordingly we find in our Crimes Acts, Execution Acts, Tax Acts and other statutes, that the use for which property is held is constantly made the ground for legislation concerning it. It would be a waste of time to particularize the instances. As long as railroad and canal corporations have existed in this State, the property employed by them under their franchises has been placed apart from other property for both the method and the amount of taxation. The same custom has prevailed elsewhere, and has received the approval of the highest judicial authority. Said the court in Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 321 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 414]: "The right to classify railroad property as a separate class for purposes of taxation, grows out of the inherent nature of the property and the discretion vested by the Constitution of the State in the Legislature." Inasmuch, therefore, as the law is to prevail everywhere in the State, and also relates to entire classes of property, it meets the requirement that laws for the assessment of property shall be general.

The law also directs that the assessments upon these classes of property shall be made by uniform rules, according to the true value of the property. Its simple mandate is that each company shall pay an annual tax equal to one-half of one per centum of the true value of its property used for railroad or canal purposes, including its franchises. Some objection has been interposed to the inclusion of railroad franchises, to the effect that they are not property, and that they have no exchange value, since similar franchises may be acquired by any persons organizing under the general railroad law. It suffices to say, that this Act imposes no tax upon franchises, but merely requires that they shall be considered in ascertaining the value of the property assessed. The franchises intended are but the legal privileges which the company enjoys in the use of its property, and of course therefore should not be disregarded in determining what that property is worth to its present possessor, and would be worth to any other possessor having the same privileges; and their importance is by no means destroyed because any other person who can obtain the same kind of property may use it in the same manner.

The imposition of the tax of one-half of one per cent is in compliance with the Constitution. Let us turn now to the local tax:

Concerning this, the law directs (section 8) that the Board of Assessors shall ascertain separately:

I. The length and value of the main stem of each railroad, and of the water way of each canal; the term "main stem" to include the road bed not exceeding 100 feet in width, with its rails and sleepers and depot buildings used for passengers connected therewith; the term "water way" to include the towing path and berme bank.

II. The value of the other real estate used for railroad or canal purposes in each taxing district in this State.

III. The value of all the tangible personal property of each railroad and of each canal company.

IV. The value of the franchise.

It further provides (section 6) that whenever in any taxing district there shall be several branch lines of railroad belonging to or controlled by one company, the assessors shall designate one of said lines as the main stem, and the value of the others shall be included in the separate valuation provided for in subdivision II of section 8.

It then enacts (section 12) that each company shall pay, in addition to said tax of one-half of one per cent, a tax at the local rate, as fixed and assessed for county and municipal purposes upon other property in each taxing district, upon the valuation of its property in the several taxing districts, separately valued and assessed under the provisions of subdivision II in section 3 of the Act, which tax shall also be computed by the State Board of Assessors; but the last mentioned rate shall in no case exceed one per cent of the valuation of the property valued under the provisions of subdivision II of section 3. This tax, when collected by the State, is to be transmitted to the several taxing districts for their local uses.

The first question here again arising is whether the law for the imposition of this tax is general, whether it embraces entire classes of property. In making the assessment, the property to be valued and upon the valuation of which the tax is to be computed is that described in subdivision II, exclusive of the property mentioned in the other subdivisions. Is such property capable of being regarded as a class or classes of property?

There must be conceded to the Legislature a large discretion on the subject of classification, and the judiciary has no right to thwart its reasonable exercise. But with this in mind, I have not been able to find any fair basis on which the property, thus submitted to special taxation for local uses, can stand as a class by itself. How does the main stem of a railroad to the width of one hundred feet differ, as a class of property, from the main stem lying beyond that width? On what principle are passenger depots ranked with the main stem, and freight depots, water tanks and all the other necessary adjuncts of a railroad excluded? What stamps the locks and berme bank of a canal with one character, and its planes and feeders with another? Or how can the mere designation of one branch line of railroad as a main stem cause it to differ from other branch lines controlled by the same company in the same district? How will you describe or conceive of, as classes of property, groups so segregated? The divisions thus constituted by the Legislature seem to me to be defined by no substantial distinctions, but to be purely arbitrary or fanciful; and a law which deals with them exclusively is special and not general.

That feature of the statute which limits the tax for local uses to one per cent when the local tax on other property exceeds one per cent has also been assailed. But in my judgment such a limitation is permissible, provided the property so favored forms a class by itself. As before stated, the Constitution is satisfied, if, in each taxing district, the same rules of assessment are applied to all members of the same class.

It is not plain, however, that this local tax can, under the Act, be assessed according to the true value of the property on account of which it is levied. The intention expressed in the statute is that the property described in subdivision II shall be valued separately from that mentioned in the other subdivisions. For the purposes of the state tax, this direction is only a means to an end, the end being the valuation of the whole railroad and canal property; and the courts may, and in obedience to the Act itself must, if necessary, renounce the designated means for the sake of the more important end. But for the purpose of local taxes, the valuation of this segregated property is the end itself, the very basis on which the tax is to be computed, and it cannot be disregarded without overthrowing the tax. Now the question arises whether the true value of this property can be ascertained by any process of estimation which leaves out of view the main stem of the railroad, the water way of the canal, and the franchises under which alone the property can be utilized. This question appears to be a serious one; but it is unnecessary to pursue the matter, because, for the reason already stated, the law, so far as it provides for the local tax, is deemed not general, and therefore unconstitutional. If the Act had directed the assessors to ascertain the true value of all the real property used for railroad or canal purposes in each taxing district, and had authorized taxes to be levied thereon by uniform rules for local uses according to that value, the difficulties here stated would have been avoided. The property designated would have composed a class, and its true value could have been determined with reference to the value of the system to which it pertains.

Recurring then to the view of the statute thus far considered, it appears that the law, so far as it directs a tax of one-half of one per cent for state uses, is valid, and so far as it directs a tax for local uses is invalid. There are no insuperable obstacles in the way of upholding the one tax without the other; and the chief perplexities pointed out in argument as attending upon the practical enforcement of the law, will disappear if the local tax fails.

But it was said that the Act might be interpreted as being designed to authorize a single tax to be levied annually upon all property in the State used for railroad or canal purposes; which tax, when collected by the State, would be retained in part for state uses, and in part be distributed among local taxing districts for local uses. If the law can be maintained for the accomplishment of this design, it is our duty to support it.

Under this interpretation the legislative scheme would be that the assessors should ascertain the true value of all property used for railroad or canal purposes; that they should also ascertain the true value of the property included in subdivision II of section 8; that they should then determine how much money would enable the State to retain for itself one-half of one per cent of the value of all the property, and to pay over to each taxing district an ascertainable percentage of the value of such part of that property situated in the district as is described in subdivision II.

So far the steps of the law would not transgress the Constitution. Considering the property to be assessed as the whole property used for railroad or canal purposes, the valuation of the designated portions of this property might be regarded as made only in order to aid in ascertaining the gross sum to be raised and in distributing it when collected. And if the law had then directed or permitted the assessment of this gross sum upon the property assessed, by uniform rules, according to the true value of the property, it might have been upheld. But it does not permit such an assessment. It requires the tax to be apportioned among the several companies, not according to the value of each company's property as classified and assessed, but only in part according to that value, and in part according to the value of a portion arbitrarily selected from that property; and the inevitable result is that the tax exacted from each company does not bear the same proportion to the whole tax as the value of its classified property bears to the value of all the property in the class.

To illustrate this conclusion:

The total valuation of all the property in the State used for railroad and canal purposes is	$190,437,908
The total tax levied is	1,273,670
Which is equal to $6.68 on each $1,000.
The valuation of all the property of the Central Railroad Company used for railroad or canal purposes is	$38,756,838
Its whole tax under the Act is	271,840
Which is equal to $7.01 on each $1,000.
The valuation of all the property of the Easton and Amboy Railroad Company used for railroad or canal purposes is	$8,678,062
Its whole tax under the Act is	53,115
Which is equal to $6.15 on each $1,000.
The valuation of all the property of the New York, Susquehanna and Western Railroad Company used for railroad or canal purposes is	$4,892,428
Its whole tax under the Act is	25,195
Which is equal to $5.15 on each $1,000.

These discrepancies in the rates of taxation do not spring from any errors of the assessors, but are necessitated by the statute itself; and no process of rational construction can conform the Act to any rule of assessment which will obviate them, if the whole sum chargeable against each company is treated as an entire, indivisible tax. If, therefore, the court were shut up to this interpretation, I should be constrained to hold the whole tax invalid, because assessed in violation of the Constitution.

Hence the construction first indicated should be adopted, under which the tax of one-half of one per cent can be sustained.

It remains to consider whether this state tax is opposed to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution, which prohibits any State from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The general object of this provision, as declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, was to prevent unjust discriminations among persons, based upon differences of race or social condition. Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall. 36 [83 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 394]. No such discrimination is observable in the imposition of this tax. The same court has also expressly adjudged that a state law which designates railroad property as a class by itself, and provides a distinct mode of taxation for that class, but which requires the application of the same methods to all constituents of the class, so that the law will operate equally and uniformly upon all persons in similar circumstances, denies to no person the equal protection of the laws, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 321 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 414].

The state tax is in all respects constitutional.

One other suggestion deserves notice. It is, that the court may look behind the statute for other enactments to support state and local taxes against these companies. If this Act had failed to impose any tax, I should have thought the court at liberty to seek elsewhere for legal taxation of railroad and canal property; but the first section of the Act declares that the tax imposed by it shall be in lieu of all other tax ation upon the property subject to taxation under the provisions of the Act; and having concluded that this Act does impose a tax upon all the property used for railroad and canal purposes in the State, no other tax on that property can be maintained consistently with the legislative will.

The judgment of the Supreme Court, so far as it annuls the tax of one-half of one per cent, should be reversed.

Reed, J., delivered the following opinion:

First. The Constitution does not require all property to be subjected to the imposition of a tax levy.

At the time of framing the twelfth paragraph, there were in existence several State Constitutions in which, in variant shapes, was the provision that all property should be taxed. The commission which drafted our amendment deliberately refrained from employing the word "all." Nor do I understand that the assertion in the opinion of the supreme court, that the requirement was that all and not some property should be taxed, meant that a law to conform to the constitutional standard must impose a tax levy upon every kind of property. I think it could only have been intended to signify that all property must be subjected to the operation of tax statutes, but that the law may operate as well by the way of exemption as by imposition. This seems apparent from the admission that it is within the scope of legislative ability to provide that certain kinds of property may be relieved from the burden of taxation, and from the recognition of property used for church, school, college and the like purposes as a kind that may be exempted.

This power of exemption was exercised in the General Tax Act of 1866, which statute was recognized in the case of The North Ward Bank v. Newark, 10 Vroom, 380; S. C. 11 Vroom, 558, as a general law. Since then, in no case, in no argument, in no expression of judicial opinion has the exercise of this power in the Act of 1866 been challenged as opposed to the Constitution.

Second. If, then, the Legislature can impose upon some and relieve other property from the tax rate, upon what rule must the separation of property for these purposes be made? I think it may be assumed that this cannot be done capriciously. Whether the Legislature could so act, even if unfettered by a constitutional limitation, is not a question needing an answer now. That it cannot so act in view of the twelfth paragraph of the constitutional amendment is clear. The degree of the limitation is that both imposition and exemption must operate generally. Generality of operation has by a long line of cases been definitely settled to mean operation upon all of a class. Property must be taxed by general laws, namely: laws each of which includes all property included within its class; so, conversely, property must of necessity be exempted by a class or classes. The line which separates taxed from exempt property must be a line which divides classes.

Third. If taxation must be by laws each of which includes a class, does property used for railroad purposes include a class by itself? Property may be classed by reason of its inherent qualities. Real estate and personalty, tangible and intangible property, are obvious instances of differences which might be the basis of segregation for taxation by reason of inherent qualities. But I think differences may be impressed upon property by reason of the purpose for which it is used, which differences may also be the foundation of classification. A college owns lands and buildings; so does the owner of a hotel. The former may own scientific apparatus and books; so does the dealer in books and telescopes. The property of the college is, by the Tax Act of 1866, exempt, but the same kind of property belonging to the owner of a hotel or a dealer in scientific instruments is subjected to taxation.

If the Tax Act of 1866 is a general law, and the exemption clause in that Act is to be regarded as based upon a proper classification, then the exemption of the property of colleges, seminaries and cemeteries, grounded entirely upon a classification arising by reason of use, must be considered as establishing the right to select property for taxation in accordance with the same rule. I think, also, that the use of property for railroad purposes is in a degree distinctive as compared with all other uses of property. In the opinions of distinguished judges such property has been noticed as sui generis. It is impossible to think of this property in respect to its character for the purposes of taxation without connecting the tangible things themselves with the franchise by which they are utilized. By reason of the manner of its use under a railroad charter, a belt of land which stretches through a hundred taxing districts is welded into something which, for the purposes of valuation, becomes a unit. Its property, both real and personal, is shaped and constructed for the attainment of a purpose which, without a franchise peculiar to railway companies, would be impracticable. The property stripped of the peculiar power of utilization conferred by such a franchise would be comparatively valueless. The graded road bed, the track, the depots, the engines, the cars, for other uses than railroading, would be of little worth; and railroading without the State's charter of power and privileges could be hardly considered a practicable undertaking. The public character of the functions which a railroad company performs; its right to demand fares and freight charges, and to invoke the State's prerogative to condemn lands; its power to run trains across highways and through cities at a high degree of speed; its power to carry an element which, with all practicable guards, is still a menace to adjoining property—these and other powers, while in some respects they may be common to other corporations, are, in the aggregate, peculiar to railroad charters. Certainly the purpose for which property is used under such a charter impresses it with a distinct character, if we once admit that use can be the basis of classification. I conclude, therefore, that a law which includes in its operation all property used for railroad purposes is general.

Fourth. Must property be taxed at a uniform rate by reason of the requirement that property shall be taxed by uniform rules as well as by general laws? The Constitution does not require that property shall be taxed by a single rule, but by uniform rules. If we assent to the proposition that property may be ranged into classes for any purpose of taxation, and also to the proposition that a law which includes all of a class is a general law, I am unable to perceive how a rule that also applies to a class lacks uniformity of operation. Judicial sentiment has been in favor of the view that the constitutional amendment was not intended to affect mere methods of procedure in levying or collecting taxes, but was designed to fix the rules by which the burden of taxation was to be distributed. Inasmuch as all property taxed is to be taxed at its true value by the express terms of the amendment, if it is also held that all property must be taxed at a uniform rate, then the power of classification is a barren privilege. Besides, I think it would follow from this construction that there is no power in the Legislature to exempt property from taxation. And, conversely, if the admitted power to relieve a class or classes of property from taxation exists, how can it be said that uniformity of rule requires uniformity of rate to be imposed upon all property? And if there exists the power to deal with property so as to exempt a class entirely, there must exist the power to relieve a class partially as to rate, and so the right to legislate for classes as to rate of taxation must be recognized.

Fifth. If the statute under consideration be valid, as tested by the views above expressed in regard to the requirements of the Constitution, so far as it provides for the imposition of a tax at the rate of one-half of one per cent upon railroad property used for railroad purposes, I regard it as sound. It includes in its operation an entire class of property, and the imposition of a tax of one-half of one per cent upon all property within this class is within the constitutional authority of the Legislature. Nor do I think there is any doubt concerning the validity of the provision not now involved, however, which taxes all property owned by railroad companies, but not used for railway purposes, in the same manner as other property of the same kind is taxed for local purposes. This property is segregated from other property of such companies by the fact that it is used differently or is unused; and so it is with propriety thrown into the mass of taxable property in the several local taxing districts where it happens to be situate, and is taxed at the local rates.

But there is a further provision in the Act for the taxation of a part of the property owned by these companies and used by them for the purposes of their business for local purposes. The provision selects all the property so used, excepting a main stem one hundred feet in width and the passenger depots, and imposes upon the part of such property which may be considered as belonging to each taxing district a tax at the local rate of not exceeding one per cent. The Act provides that where there shall be several branch lines belonging to one corporation or operated under one management, one of the said lines shall be designated as the main stem, and the others be taxed. These features of the Act I am unable to regard as either general or uniform in their operation upon a class. It exempts from local taxation a strip of land one hundred feet in width, with its tracks, and it also exempts passenger depots, whether within or outside the strip; but at the same time, taxes other property similar in kind and devoted to similar purposes.

The commissioners are empowered to select one of two or more lines owned or managed by one company, for exemption. The one selected is in no respect different from the others which are left for taxation. And upon what ground can a passenger depot be put in one class and a freight depot in another? No ingenuity can discover here a ground for a classification which is not entirely illusive. It must be remembered that this exemption is not an accidental failure to include something within the words of the Act which might properly belong to the class, but it is a well matured design to exempt an important, in some instances the most important, part of the class from the burdens imposed upon the remainder of the class. I am compelled to view it as an arbitrary selection of property for taxation and also for exemption, and so opposed to the text of the twelfth paragraph.

It may be further observed that this lack of generality is accompanied in this, as I think in all cases, by want of uniformity in the operation of this part of the statute.

Uniformity requires an equality of operation upon all property of the same class. It means that each owner of property of the class shall bear his proportion of the tax levied upon all the property comprising the class. If the value of the main stem and passenger depots of each one of all the companies in the State bear a like proportion to the value of its other property of the same class, then the practical operation of this part of the law would be uniform.

But no such condition of affairs as this is conceivable as an existing fact. In truth, the proportions which the two sections of property bear to each other among the different owners vary greatly. The result is that the company having a large amount of outlying property is heavily taxed, while the company whose property consists almost entirely of main stem and passenger depots pays in comparison next to nothing.

It is because laws of this kind operate in the way of discrimination in favor of some and adversely to other owners of the same class, that they are prescribed by the constitutional requirement of generality and uniformity of operation. This part of the statute is, in my judgment, void for these reasons, and the local taxes levied under it should be set aside.

This part of the Act is severable from those portions which provide for the levy of the tax for state purposes, and the record should be remitted to the supreme court for its consideration of those objections to the latter tax other than constitutional, which were reserved.

Depue, J., delivered the following opinion:

The writs of certiorari in these cases brought to the supreme court for review the valuation and assessment of the property of the several prosecutors, consisting of real estate used for railroad purposes, tangible personal property and franchises, made by the State Board of Assessors, and the taxes assessed thereon by the said Board for the year 1884, pursuant to the provisions of an Act of the Legislature approved April 10, 1884, entitled "An Act for the Taxation of Railroad and Canal Property." P. L. 1884, p.

Some of the prosecutors have irrevocable charters. The court directed the argument as to the effect of the Act of 1884 upon charters having an irrevocable quality to stand over until the next term. The charters of the greater part of the prosecutors are such as contain a provision for the payment to the State annually of a certain sum—as, for instance, a per centum on cost or capital stock—with proviso that no other tax or impost should be laid or levied on them, and a clause reserving to the Legislature the power of altering or repealing the charter. These corporations have no contract with the State on the subject of taxation. The only semblance of a contract there is under such a charter is on the part of the company to pay the sum named in its charter as a condition on which its corporate franchise was granted. The proviso that other taxes shall not be imposed is a mere legislative concession, revocable at the will of the Legislature, and rescinded whenever the Legislature, in the exercise of its power of taxation, subjects such corporations to other or additional taxation. State, Morris & E. R. R. Co. v. Comr. 8 Vroom, 228, 9 Vroom, 472; Little v. Bowers, 17 Vroom, 800. These corporations, in virtue of the reserved power of alteration, or repeal, are liable to taxation the same as private persons, and are equally entitled to dispute the validity of the law by which taxes are imposed, as not being a constitutional exercise of the power of taxation.

The tax laid by the Act of 1884 is a tax upon property. The Act is entitled "An Act for the Taxation of Railroad and Canal Property," and the provisions in it which designate the subjects of taxation, the mode of assessment and valuation thereof, and the computation of the taxes thereon, indicate taxation on property as the purpose of the Act. The tax to be assessed and levied has none of the qualities of a tax in personam—none of the characteristics of indirect taxation of franchises. The franchises of the corporations comprised in this Act are made taxable on the true value thereof as property, and as part of the property of such corporations. The counsel on both sides discussed the case on the assumption that taxation by the Act of 1884 was taxation upon property, and in that view I concur. The inquiry which arises, therefore, is whether the taxation provided for by the Act of 1884 is in compliance with the provision introduced by the amendments of 1875, that "Property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value." Const. art. IV, section 17, p. 12.

The theory of our government is that the sovereign power of taxation is unlimited, except as qualified or restrained by constitutional limitations; that this power of taxation consists primarily in the power to select and classify the persons or property which shall be made the subjects of taxation, and when the classes of persons or kind of property set apart for taxation have been designated, then to apportion the tax among those of the class which is to bear the burden, upon the principle of uniformity; that where the burden is common there shall be a common contribution to discharge it. State v. Parker, 8 Vroom, 426; State, Trustees, etc. v. Township Committee of Readington, 7 Vroom, 86. The problem for consideration is how far the constitutional prescription that "property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and uniform rules, according to its true value," has restrained the power of the Legislature in the selection and classification of property for the purpose of taxation.

In the distribution of the powers of government the power of taxation is lodged in the legislative branch. For an unwise, unjust, oppressive or unnecessary exercise of that power by the Legislature, there is no redress except by an appeal to the people. So long as constitutional limitations are not exceeded, or the constitutional rights of the citizen are not violated, the Legislature is the supreme authority which the courts, as well as others, must obey. Cooley on Taxation, 2d ed. pp. 48-45.

But the same plan of government which lodges the power of taxation in the legislative department of the government has conferred upon the judiciary the power, and has imposed upon that branch of the government the duty to determine whether the Legislature, in the method of taxation adopted by it, has exceeded constitutional limitations, or invaded the constitutional rights of citizens. Every intendment will be made in favor of the legislative Act that is permissible; and any construction which is within rational bounds will be resorted to in the endeavor to harmonize the legislative plan with constitutional limitations. But if, on an investigation conducted in this spirit, it be found that the legislative Act is in violation of constitutional limitations, or an infringement upon the constitutional rights of those who are made the subjects of taxation, the duty of the judiciary in the premises can neither be cast off nor evaded.

The constitutional provision invoked relates only to taxation upon property. It leaves unimpaired that branch of the taxing power which consists of the imposition of indirect taxes for the exercise of franchises or the pursuit of business, trades or occupations. Over this subject the discretion of the Legislature is unrestrained, save only by the need of conforming to that essential quality of taxation, that when a class of persons or things is selected for taxation, the tax must be imposed upon individuals of the class under a rule of uniformity.

Nor does this constitutional provision require the taxation of all property which is legitimately the subject of taxation. On that construction, the argument of Mr. Collins, who appeared in this suit for the several municipalities, and contended in their behalf that by force of this constitutional provision the property of these companies became subject to taxation in the several taxing districts of the State in common with other property in those districts, would be irresistible. The second section of the General Tax Act of 1866 (Rev. 1150), and the enacting clause of the Act of 1878 (P. L. 1878, p. 61), in designating the property to be taxed, were comprehensive enough to embrace the real and personal property of all railroads and canals. The taxation of such property was taken out of the provisions of these Acts by section 5 of the Act of 1866, and the proviso in the Act of 1878. The constitutional provision being self-executing, and, propria vigore, abrogating all special legislation on the subject (State, North Ward Bank, v. Newark, 10 Vroom, 380; 11 Vroom, 558), and making void all such legislation in the future, it is difficult to see how, in the light of the decisions of our courts, the exemption in the fifth section of the Act of 1866, of corporations having repealable charters from taxation on real and personal property, or that contained in the proviso in the Act of 1878, could stand consistently with a constitutional requirement of such import. If special charters may be repealed by a general law, as was held by this court and the supreme court in State, Morris & E. R. R. Co. v. Commissioner of Taxation, 8 Vroom, 228, 9 Vroom, 472, much more clearly would the same result be effected by a self-executing constitutional provision, which, as the supreme law of the land, must operate to efface from the statute book every legislative Act repugnant to its provisions.

But I do not assent to this interpretation of the constitutional provision. The power of taxation is not derived from a constitutional grant. Immediately upon the organization of the colony as a free and independent government, and the establishment of a legislative department of the government, the Legislature was, ipso facto, invested with the power of taxation by a fundamental principle of government derived from the mother country, that taxation is a legislative Act, and is necessarily inherent in the legislative branch of the government. Neither of our State Constitutions nor the amendments of 1875 contain any grant of the power to tax. The only provision on that subject is the amendment under discussion, and that is a restriction on the power of taxation which the Legislature possessed from the organization of the government. And it is a fundamental doctrine in the interpretation of constitutional limitations derogatory to the powers of a co-ordinate branch of the government that construction should not be pushed beyond a fair and reasonable interpretation of the letter of limitation.

The framers of the constitutional amendments, recognizing the reasonableness of exempting churches, charitable institutions, and institutions of learning from taxation, and the wisdom and justice, in some instances, of indirect taxation, as by taxes on franchises, trades or occupations, with the General Tax Act of 1866, which did exempt religious, charitable and educational institutions and corporations from taxation upon property, and the Railroad Taxation Act of 1878, which laid a tax upon franchises, before them, seemed to have avoided that expression in the constitutional amendment which would readily have occurred to them if they designed a constitutional provision which would require all property to be taxed. The provision adopted and recommended to the Legislature, and approved by the Legislature and the people, does not require that construction. It interdicted taxation on property unless under general laws and by uniform rules, and according to true values, but left unimpaired the power of the Legislature, by proper classifications, to designate the property which should be brought under a property tax. The supreme court so held in State, Trenton Iron Co. v. Yard, 13 Vroom, 357, and in Stratton v. Collins, 14 Vroom, 562, and in that construction of the constitutional provision I concur. But with the selection of the property to be taxed the power of the Legislature to discriminate ends. The rule of uniformity prescribed for taxation prevents property from being classified and taxed as classed by different rules. Township of Pine Grove v. Talcott, 19 Wall. 666, 675 [86 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 227, 232]; Gilman v. City of Shelby, 2 Black, 510, 518 [87 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 305, 309].

In the next place, the constitutional provision does not touch the machinery by which taxes shall be assessed or collected. Every system of taxation consists of two parts: the one relating to the assessment (the designation of the persons or things which shall be the subjects of taxation and the apportionment of taxation among such persons or things in the ratio prescribed by law), the other the collection of taxes by the enforced payment thereof. The constitutional provision in question relates only to the assessment of taxes, and in that respect concerns only such equalization of the burden of taxation as would result from the designation of the property which shall be the subjects of taxation and the apportionment of the taxes thereon under general laws and by uniform rules, according to its true value. The mere machinery by which taxes shall be assessed or collected is left in legislative discretion. Trustees of Public Schools v. City of Trenton, 2 Stew. 668. A railroad or canal is a peculiar kind of property, and the appraisal and valuation of such property, including the rolling stock, property used in transportation, and franchises as a unit, by a state board of assessors instead of an appraisal of it by local assessors in detached parts, would be indispensable in estimating such property at true value, which is the basis of taxation under the constitutional provision. A law providing for such an appraisal and valuation of all railroads and canals, and the apportionment of the valuation thereof among the proper taxing districts to be taxed by local assessors in common with other taxable property, or providing for the entire process of laying the taxes and the collection thereof by state officers by a sale in its entirety of the property assessed, would be a general law in compliance with the constitutional requirement that property should be assessed for taxes under general laws.

But the constitutional provision does not stop with the requirement that property should be assessed for taxes under general laws. It adds the further prescription that the assessment should be by uniform rules and at true values. The object of this constitutional provision was twofold: the equalization of the burden of taxation in the apportionment of taxes for state purposes among the several counties, and of taxes for state and county purposes among the minor taxation districts in which all taxes are in fact levied and collected, and also the equalization of the burden upon all those who are subject to taxation in the political division for the use of which taxes are laid: in the State if for state purposes; in the county if for county purposes, and in the minor political divisions—townships, cities or wards—if for municipal or local purposes. By uniform rules is meant uniformity in the standard of valuation and rate of taxation. How that uniformity shall be attained will depend upon the purpose for which the particular tax is laid. If it be for state purposes, it must be at the rates of taxation uniformly applied in the State in taxation for state purposes; if for county or municipal purposes, at the same rate at which property is taxed for such purposes. State, Vail's Exrs. v. Runyon, 12 Vroom, 99. As was said by Mr. Justice Dixon, the constitutional provision requires and is satisfied by such regulations as would impose the same percentage of its actual value upon all taxable property in the township for township purposes, in the county for county purposes, and in the State for state purposes. Stratton v. Collins, 14 Vroom, 563.

That part of the Act of 1884 which provides for taxation on the property of railroad and canal companies not used for railroad or canal purposes is not in dispute. The controversy relates solely to the taxation of property used for those purposes. The Act provides in section 3 that property of that description shall be assessed by a state board of assessors, and at true value, and that the board should, in such ascertainment, ascertain separately:

I. The length and value of the main stem of each railroad, and of the water way of each canal, and the length of such main stem and water way in each taxing district;

II. The value of the other real estate used for railroad or canal purposes, in each taxing district in this State, including the road bed (other than main stem), water ways, reservoirs, tracks, buildings, water tanks, water works, riparian rights, docks, wharves and piers, and all other real estate, except lands not used for railroad or canal purposes;

III. The value of all the tangible personal property of each railroad and of each canal company;

IV. The value of the franchise.

Upon the entire assessed valuations of the property in these subdivisions an annual state tax is laid at the rate of one-half of one per cent. Besides the state tax an additional tax is laid upon the property named in subdivision II, for the benefit of the several taxing districts at the local rates at which other property is assessed in such taxing districts for county and municipal purposes; but it is provided that in no case should the last mentioned rate exceed one per cent., and it is further provided that, in case the state tax of one-half of one per cent. and the local tax as limited in the Act would compel any company to pay more tax than the tax such company would pay if it did not pay the state tax, but did pay full local rates on all the property and franchises mentioned in section 3, without any other exemptions than would be allowed to an individual citizen on such property, such deductions should then be made as would make the tax equal to the amount such company would pay on all the property and franchises mentioned in section 3 if assessed at full local rates, without any state tax.

The rate fixed by the Act for local taxation upon that part of the companies' property used for railroad and canal purposes made liable to such taxation is manifestly a departure from the constitutional rule. In taxing districts where the rate of taxation for county and municipal purposes exceeds one per cent, the limitation of the tax on these companies to one per cent produces a discrimination in assessing taxes prejudicial to other taxpayers in such districts, and is in violation of the constitutional rule of uniformity. It is said that the discrimination being in favor of the prosecutors, they cannot avail themselves of that fact to annul the tax assessed against them. If the legislative power to lay the tax was not in controversy, and the objection was simply for inequalities in the execution of the law, the objection would not be heeded. But that presentation of the case does not correctly represent the position in which the matter is placed before the court. Taxes have been assessed against the prosecutors, the collection of which is about to be enforced. They dispute the validity of the law under which the taxes were laid, and if they present legal grounds for sustaining their contention, the court cannot refuse relief on any notion of the propriety or reasonableness of the conduct of parties. The prosecutors say that under their charters and the laws antecedent to the Act of 1884, they were exempt from local taxation on this part of their property; and they insist that that exemption has not been taken away by the Act of 1884, because of the nonconformity of that law to constitutional requirements. It is the prerogative of every citizen and taxpayer to say to the government: tax me according to law, or not at all; and it would be no response to the assertion of that prerogative to reply: if you had been taxed according to law you would have fared worse.

To avoid recurring to this subject again, I may say here, in response to the argument so freely used (that these companies are still a favored class in the matter of taxation), that that fact would be a substantial objection to this law on constitutional grounds; for, as it seems to me, it would be impossible to sustain the law as being constitutional as applied to these prosecutors, and pronounce it to be unconstitutional when other persons upon whose property taxes have been assessed make resistance, on the ground that the taxes assessed upon their property have not been laid upon all property liable to be assessed for taxes by a uniform rule. In State v. Yard, 18 Vroom, 357, and in Stratton v. Collins, the constitutional question was raised by persons whose property had been assessed, on the ground that other property not assessed should have been brought in and subjected to taxation in common with their property and at an equal rate.

The tax levied on the prosecutors for state purposes is a state tax, and is laid exclusively on the property of the prosecutors. The rate of tax fixed by the Act is one half of one per cent, subject to a certain adjustment which I will refer to presently.

I have already said that uniformity in the rate of taxation is determined by the territory or political division for the use of which the tax is laid: that the Constitution requires the same percentage of actual value upon all taxable property in the township if for township purposes, in the county if for county purposes, and in the State if for state purposes. That is the principle enunciated in Stratton v. Collins, and sustained by an unvarying line of judicial decisions. The method of laying state taxes in this State is by an equal percentage upon all the taxable valuations in the State, and the apportionment of the amount to be raised among the several counties in the ratio of taxable valuations in each, for assessment and collection as other taxes are assessed and collected.

At the time the Act of 1884 was passed the Act of 1881, laying a state tax for the support of schools, was in force. The tax laid by that Act was laid, as I have mentioned, by an apportionment among the several counties in proportion to amount of taxable real and personal property in each, to be assessed and collected in the manner in which other taxes were assessed, levied and collected. Acts 1881, p. 120. By these two Acts, the Act of 1881 and the Act of 1884, we have this situation of affairs: two state taxes, the one levied exclusively on the taxable valuations of the property of railroad and canal companies, the other exclusively upon the other taxable valuations in the State. These two systems of taxation cannot stand together or be brought into harmony with uniformity in the rules of taxation. That they will inevitably produce inequality of rates in taxation is apparent. That in fact they bring about that result is demonstrated by a few figures taken from the report of the state comptroller for 1885. The total valuation of real and personal property in the State (other than railroad and canal property) on which the state school tax was laid was $554,828,114.84. The state tax raised thereon was $1,424,244, and the rate of taxation to raise that sum was a small fraction over two and a half mills on each dollar. The valuation of the real and personal property of railroad and canal companies as assessed under the Act of 1884 was $140,236,605.43. The tax for state purposes on that property was $701,182.05, and the rate of taxation was five mills on each dollar. The gross amount of taxable valuations of real and personal property in the State, including the real and personal property of railroad and canal companies, was $695,064,719.76. The state school tax and the tax on the real and personal property of these companies aggregated $2,125,426.05, and, laid on the gross valuation of property in the State, would require a tax a small fraction over three mills (3 6-100 mills) on each dollar.

But it is said that the rate of taxation named in the Act of 1884 was so adjusted by the twelfth section as to secure equality in the rates of taxation both for state and local purposes. The plan adopted by that section is that in cases where the state tax and the local tax exceed the tax the companies would pay if taxed at local rates upon all their property, used for railroad or canal purposes, such deductions should be made as would make the tax equal to the amount such company would pay on all its property and franchises if assessed at full local rates without the state tax.

This plan of adjustment is plainly inefficient to secure equality and uniformity in the rate of state taxes. Local rates are determined by that percentage on taxable valuations in the locality which is necessary for all the local purposes for which such tax is required to be laid: the expenses of local government, the supply of water, the expenses of police and fire departments, the cost of erecting schoolhouses, the cost of public improvements above assessments for benefits, the interest or principal of municipal indebtedness, and the like, and vary with the extravagances or misfortunes in conducting local governments. The state school tax for 1884 was raised by a rate of two and a half mills, one quarter of one per cent. The local tax rate for the same year in Newark was 2.08 per cent; in Orange, 2.62, and in Jersey City, 2.98. A uniform rate of taxation for state purposes can be obtained only on a ratio of the tax to be raised to the taxable valuations in the State.

But I need not pursue this matter further. As I understand the views of the majority of the court, it is not claimed that the Act of 1884 provides for taxation either for state or local purposes on a rule uniform with that on which taxes, state or local, are laid under the General Tax Act of 1886. The position taken is this: that the constitutional provision allows a classification of property for taxation under general laws, and that upon such a classification the rule of uniformity prescribed by the Constitution is complied with if the tax be laid upon property within the classification of an equal percentage without regard to the rate of taxation upon other taxable property in the State; that local taxes may be laid on property in the classification at one rate and upon other property at a different rate, and state taxes be levied with the same diversity in rates, provided only that a uniform rate be observed in the tax upon property within each class; and that property used for railroad and canal purposes may be segregated into a class and subjected to taxation at any rate that may be prescribed by the Legislature.

The power of discrimination asserted in this proposition may well challenge the closest scrutiny. The classification made by the Act of 1884 is either upon the use which is made of property, or upon the ownership of it. On the principle adopted, lands used for agricultural purposes, city lots, lands improved or unimproved, timber, mining or mineral lands, mills and lands used for manufacturing purposes, and the implements used in agriculture or in the various branches of mechanical pursuits, may be set apart into classes and taxed at any variety of discordant rates, provided uniformity of rate be observed within each particular class. Indeed, the capacity which lies within the doctrine of classification is aptly illustrated in this case. A classification which sets apart indispensable parts of the structure of a railroad, as cuts, embankments, switches, turnouts, engine houses and freight depots from the main stem, if beyond the one hundred feet prescribed as the width of the main stem, and puts those parts into a class to be taxed separately for local uses, is regarded as a legitimate classification.

The authority pressed upon the attention of the court with the most confidence, as justifying this construction of our constitutional provision, is the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the State Railroad Tax Cases reported in 92 U. S. 575 [Bk. 2423 L. ed. 663]. The tax in that case had been laid under a statute of Illinois which provided that the entire taxable property of railroad companies should be ascertained by the state board of equalization, and that the state, county and city taxes should be collected within each municipality on this assessment in the proportion the length of the road in such municipality bears to the whole length of the road within the State. The rule for the apportionment and assessment adopted was uniform in its action on all railroad companies, but was not uniform with the method by which other property was taxed under the general tax laws. The question before the court was whether this mode of taxing railroad companies was consistent with section 1 of article 9 of the Constitution of Illinois, which is in these words:

"Section 1. The General Assembly shall provide such revenue as may be needful, by levying a tax by valuation, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her or its property—such value to be ascertained by some person or persons to be elected or appointed in such manner as the General Assembly shall direct, and not otherwise; but the General Assembly shall have power to tax peddlers, auctioneers, brokers, hawkers, merchants, commission merchants, showmen, jugglers, innkeepers, grocery keepers, liquor dealers, toll bridges, ferries, insurance, telegraph and express interests or business, vendors of patents, and persons or corporations owning or using franchises and privileges, in such manner as it shall, from time to time, direct by general law, uniform as to the class upon which it operates."

The court sustained the tax upon the peculiar features of the State Constitution, which expressly excepted certain classes of persons and things, among which were persons or corporations owning or using franchises and privileges out of the general equality clause, and adopted a special equality clause for taxing such persons or things by providing that they should be taxed in such a manner as the Legislature should from time to time direct by general law, uniform as to the class upon which it operated. Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court, placed the decision distinctly on that discrimination in the constitutional provision, "because," as he says, "the latter part of the section in express terms authorizes the Legislature to tax persons and corporations owning or using franchises in such manner as it shall from time to time direct by general law;" and the only restriction on the power, as applied to this class, is that it shall be "uniform as to the class upon which it operates." He then adds: "There can be no doubt that all the classes named in this clause * * * are taken out of the general rule of uniformity prescribed by the first clause; and the only limitation as to them is that of uniformity as to the class upon which the law shall operate."

In this respect the Constitution of Illinois and the Constitution of this State are totally dissimilar. Our Constitution makes no discrimination in the property which the Legislature has subjected to taxation, with respect to the rules by which it shall be taxed. The rules must be uniform, whatever method may be adopted in making the assessment, and in the machinery by which the tax is assessed, laid or collected. The case cited is no precedent for the construction of our constitutional provision.

N. J.

Another precedent cited with a great deal of confidence is the case known as the Kentucky Railroad Tax Cases, reported 115 U. S. 321 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 414]. The complaint in that case was of a statute which discriminated against railroad companies in the fact that railroad property, though called real estate, was classified by itself, distinct from other real estate, and different means were provided for ascertaining its value for the purpose of taxation; and the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States was appealed to for relief. The court denied relief, on the ground that no constitutional provision of the State of Kentucky had been violated. Mr. Justice Matthews, who read the opinion of the court, puts the decision on the ground (to quote his own language) that "There is nothing in the Constitution of Kentucky that requires taxes to be levied by a uniform method upon all descriptions of property. The whole matter is left to the discretion of the legislative power, and there is nothing to forbid the classification of property for purposes of taxation, and the valuation of different methods. The rule of equality in respect to the subject only requires the same means and methods to be applied impartially to all the constituents of each class, so that the law shall operate equally and uniformly upon all persons in similar circumstances." This case is simply an elucidation of the general doctrine that where the power of the Legislature is not restrained by express constitutional limitations, the designation of property to be taxed and the manner of taxation are matters within the discretion of the Legislature. It is a precedent irrelevant to the construction of express constitutional limitations upon the legislative power of taxation.

Union Pacific R. Co. v. Cheyenne, 118 U. S. 517 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 1099], is a case of the same import. The court held that a statute for assessing and taxing the property of railroad and telegraph companies as a whole, and distributing it ratably among the different counties and the several taxing districts in proportion to the number of miles in each, was valid. The tax was laid in the Territory of Wyoming, and there was not there any express constitutional restraint upon the power of taxation.

Another class of cases cited from federal and state courts is also inapplicable to this subject. I refer to decisions on the legislative power of indirect taxation by taxes on privileges, franchises, trades and occupations and excise duties, of which Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall. 594 [73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 897]; Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580-594 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 798, 802]; Commonwealth v. Cary Improvement Co. 98 Mass. 19; Youngblood v. Sexton, 32 Mich. 406; New Orleans v. Kauffman, 29 La. Ann. 288; Kittanning Coal Co. v. Commonwealth, 79 Pa. 109, are types. This branch of the legislative power of taxation is universally admitted not to come within the equality clauses in constitutional provisions relative to taxation upon property; and in constitutions which simply provide that all taxation shall be equal, a distinction is made between taxes on property and taxes on franchises, occupations and pursuits, for the reason that in property there is always present the element of market value as the basis on which equality in taxation can be attained by the application of a uniform rate on such values. But in franchises, trades or occupations there is no element of value in common, and hence the rule of equality is not violated by taxation on these subjects by a rule which is uniform as to each class. The cases on this subject are cited by Mr. Justice Cooley in discussing the constitutional provisions of the several States. Cooley on Taxation, 2d ed. pp. 176-200, and on page 379.

It may also be remarked that in State, N. J. Southern R. R. Co. v. Board of R. R. Comrs. 12 Vroom, 285, and State, Central R. R. Co. of N. N. v. Mutchler, Id. 96, no constitutional question was raised or considered. The first case was submitted on briefs, which appear in the printed report of the case, and neither in the reasons filed nor in the argument of counsel was any constitutional question presented. Nor was any question of that character raised by counsel or considered by the court in the other case, and in that case the company was exempt from taxation such as that from which it was relieved by its charter and by the General Tax Act of 1866, irrespective of the Act of 1873. The State v. Township Committee of Redington, 7 Vroom, 66, was decided before the constitutional amendments were adopted or framed.

With the exception of the decisions upon the peculiar language of the Constitution of Illinois, the precedents in state and federal courts on express constitutional limitations upon the powers of taxation designed to secure equality in taxation are uniformly against any discrimination in taxation upon property. In Ohio the constitutional provision is that "Laws shall be framed taxing by a uniform rule all moneys, credits, investments," etc., "and all real and personal property according to its true value in money." The Supreme Court of Ohio, in a case so often quoted, in construing the language "taxing by a uniform rule," said: "Taxing by a uniform rule requires uniformity not only in the rate of taxation, but also uniformity in the mode of assessment upon the taxable valuation. * * * But this is not all. The uniformity must be coextensive with the territory to which it applies. If a state tax, it must be uniform all over the state; if a county, town, or city tax, it must be uniform throughout the extent of the territory to which it is applicable. But the uniformity in the rule required by the Constitution does not stop here. It must be extended to all property subject to taxation, so that all property must be taxed alike—equally—which is taxing by uniform rules." Exchange Bank of Columbus v. Hines, Ohio St. R. 1.

The constitutional provision in Wisconsin is "that the rule of taxation shall be uniform and taxes shall be levied upon such property as the Legislature shall direct." The charter of the City of Janesville provided for an annual tax upon all the property in the city subject to taxation, not exceeding one per cent for current expenses, and such additional taxes for roads, bridges and the support of the poor as the common council might deem necessary. Within the corporate limits of the city, but outside of the recorded plot of the original Village of Janesville, was a large quantity of farming or agricultural lands. By a subsequent Act the Legislature provided that lands used, occupied or reserved for agricultural or horticultural purposes should not be taxed for city purposes beyond one-half of one per cent., nor for roads, bridges and support of poor more than one-half as much per dollar as should be levied for such purposes on property within the recorded village plot. This latter Act was held to be unconstitutional, as being in violation of the constitutional rule of uniformity. Knowlton v. Board Supervisors of Rock. Co. 9 Wis. 410.

In a later case in the same court a city charter provided for taxation upon real and personal property, and in one section gave the common council power to lay and collect a tax on all the lots and land in the city, not including any improvements thereon, to pay the city's bonded debt. This section was held to be in violation of the constitutional rule of uniformity. Mr. Justice Lyon, in the opinion of the court, said: "The true doctrine unquestionably is that while the Legislature may by law exempt certain specific property or classes of property from taxation, such exemption, to be valid and operative, must be absolute and total. The Legislature has no power to exempt property from one tax, or from taxation for one purpose, and hold it liable to taxation for other purposes; and this for the reason already indicated, that it is impossible to do so without violating the rule of uniformity which the Constitution requires the Legislature to observe." Hale v. City of Kenosha, 29 Wis. 599-604.

The Supreme Court of the United States, dealing with a statute of the same State empowering a city to lay a tax for a particular purpose on real estate exclusively (real and personal estate being taxed for other purposes) held it to be unconstitutional, and Mr. Justice Swayne, in the opinion of the court, said that "It was beyond the constitutional power of the Legislature to make any discrimination. Property must be wholly exempted or not exempted at all. No partial exemption or discrimination is permitted. To impose certain taxes exclusively upon one class of taxable property is as much a discrimination as to vary the rates of the same or other taxes upon different classes of property." Gilman v. City of Sheboygan, 2 Black. 518 [67 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 809].

In a later case the same learned judge, speaking of the constitutional provision of the State of Michigan, that the Legislature shall provide a uniform rule of taxation except as to property paying specific taxes, said: "The object of this provision was to prevent unjust discriminations. It prevents property from being classed, and taxed as classed, by different rules. All kinds of property must be taxed uniformly or be entirely exempt." Township of Pine Grove v. Talcott, 19 Wall. 666-675 [36 U. S. bk. 23, L. ed. 227-232]. The decision of the court in Cummings v. National Bank, 101 U. S. 154 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 908], though directed against systems of valuation intended to operate unequally, has a direct application to laws which are so framed as to produce that inequality.

These decisions establish the principle by which constitutional provisions designed for the protection of property from unequal taxation must be construed.

The endeavor in this case is to take the constitutional limitation out of this rule upon the words "under general laws."

The words "general laws" were brought into prominence by the peculiar provisions of paragraph 11 of section 7 of article IV of the amended Constitution which provides that the Legislature shall not pass private, local or special laws in certain enumerated cases, as, for instance, regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties, but shall provide therefor by general laws. The place this expression has in this paragraph is totally unlike that which it occupies in the paragraph on the subject of taxation. In paragraph 11 the only restriction on the legislative power is that it shall legislate by general laws, and when a classification by a general law is once made, the power of the Legislature to legislate over that class is unlimited. In paragraph 12, relating to taxation, an additional restriction is added. The mandate is that property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws and by uniform rules at its true value. A construction which gives a controlling effect to the words "general law" practically excises the other member of the sentence; for, independent of the constitutional prescription, it was an essential quality of taxation that, when a class of persons or things is selected for taxation, the burden must be distributed among the members of the class on the rule of uniformity.

In the construction of constitutions as well as of statutes, it is a cardinal principle that words are to be taken in their natural and ordinary sense, and that every word shall have a part, if possible, in declaring the intention of the maker. The words "under general laws" in this paragraph can have full scope and operation without detracting from the effect of the other words in it. I have already said that, for the purpose of assessment and valuation, and even the completion of the whole process of taxation upon railroad and canal property, the Act of 1884 is for that purpose a general law. It accomplishes the purpose contemplated by the Constitution by securing the true value of property which otherwise would be valued inadequately. It fulfills the purpose of the Constitution in requiring the assessment of taxes under general laws, in order that special modes of assessment and valuation which might produce inequalities in taxation should not be resorted to. But the words "under general laws" cannot be permitted to control the whole sentence of which they are only a part without overriding a fundamental rule of construction.

A construction which conforms to proper rules, at the same time will secure the object such constitutional restrictions are presumed to have been adopted to promote: equality in taxation, which can be secured only by the application of uniform rates of taxation to property at its true value. The language of this constitutional provision, giving words their natural meaning and the sentence a grammatical construction, can be made to signify nothing else. If the language had been that "property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws by uniform rules according to its true value," it would be possible, by a refinement of construction, to impute to it the meaning that all that was required was that property should be classified for taxation, and then taxed by rules uniform as between members of the same class. But the paragraph as inserted in the Constitution is given a complex form by the conjunction of the two members of the sentence in the use of the word "and," which lexicographers define to signify "that a word or part of a sentence is to be added to what precedes." Webster, Dic., "and." Property is to be taxed "under general laws," and "by uniform rules according to its true value." Both the constituent parts of the sentence "general laws" and "uniform rules" are made essential to a valid act of taxation. A simple reading of the sentence carries with it at once that meaning. Contrasting the language of this paragraph with the proviso in the Constitution of Illinois, or even with the language used in opinions read this morning to express a different construction, will indicate the difference in language and expression necessary to effect that purpose. A constitutional provision expressed in that language, placed alongside of this constitutional provision, would appear to be another and a different instrument.

Under an organic law for taxing property at its true value, there can be no classification except as a means of ascertaining true values. Different kinds of property have different grades of value, but true value is a characteristic of all kinds of property, and peculiar to no one species so as to make it a class by itself. The classification adopted in this Act is upon the use to which the property is devoted; but the use to which property is applied does not alter its true value. An engine is of the same market value in the shop of a manufacturer as when placed upon a railroad track. A locomotive moving a train of cars on the track of a railroad has no characteristics distinguishing it from an engine moving the machinery in a factory, except that one is movable and the other stationary. Passenger cars on a steam railroad track have no characteristics distinguishing them from passenger cars on a horse railroad track, except that the former are more costly and of greater true value. Horses drawing boats for a canal company have no characteristics distinguishing them from horses drawing drays upon the streets of a city. Boats used in transportation upon canals have no peculiarities distinguishing them from boats of the same kind used in the carrying business upon the Passaic and the Hudson. The docks along the Hudson, from which ocean steamers and vessels employed in freighting or carrying passengers to domestic ports sail, have no characteristics distinguishing them from the adjacent slips from which the ferryboats of railroad companies run. The miles of wharves along the Passaic used for the shipping and discharge of freight by private owners or navigation companies are not characterized by any peculiarities distinguishing them from the wharves owned by the canal company which would put them in one group for one rate of taxation and the canal company's wharves into another group for taxation at another rate.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, under a constitutional provision of that State that "all taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects," held that the Legislature might select its subjects of taxation, but that the tax, upon whatever laid, must be uniform, and that in the taxation of property there was no distinction between natural persons and corporations. Fox's Appeal, 8 Cent. Rep. 561, 566. In the Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575 [Bk. 24, L.

ed. 668], the tax in question was not laid upon railroad property exclusively, nor was the rate of taxation different from the rate upon other property. The property of railroad companies was included in the taxable valuations in common with other property, and the rate of taxation thereon was the same. The objection was with respect to the mode in which such property was valued and its value apportioned among the several taxing districts. The court sustained the rule adopted for the valuation and apportionment under the peculiar provision of the Illinois Constitution, and, as appears by the opinion of the court on page 611, held that taxes assessed upon such property by that rule were uniform when the rate of taxation was the same on the assessment thus ascertained as it was upon other property. The Constitutions of these States recognize classification in the assessment of taxes, but, as construed by judicial decisions, afford no warrant for the classification of property for the purpose of laying a particular tax on one class exclusively, or of taxing it at a different rate.

But it is said that the property of these Companies possesses peculiar qualities distinguishing it from the property of private individuals or of other corporations, in the fact that it is associated with and is necessary for the exercise of corporate franchises or the business of operating railroads or canals, and therefore may be disassociated from other property intrinsically of the same nature, for a different sort of taxation, or for taxation at a different rate. Such a mode of taxation is not taxation on property at its true value. It is that method of taxation which can lawfully be resorted to only in the exercise of the power of indirect taxation, by taxation upon franchises, trades or occupations; and this Act has none of the features of such a mode of taxation. It is what its title imports: taxation of property. As such, I think the mode in which it is exercised is not in conformity with the constitutional provision.

Mindful of the great importance of this case, and of the public interest in the question involved, I have given the subject a careful and thoughtful consideration. If my investigation had left my mind in doubt, I would defer to the opinions of my associates. But investigation has produced in my mind a conviction that the law is in violation of constitutional restrictions, so strong that I cannot yield my judgment to the opinions of others. The taxation imposed is said to be an equitable and fair method of taxing these companies. It probably is, and the law has been executed by the Board of Assessors with a commendable regard to fairness. But it is not the equity or fairness of the system, but the legislative power to tax by this method, that is brought before the court for decision.

A faulty construction of a statute does a wrong, but the injury is temporary. The statute may be altered or repealed. The construction of constitutional law is not for a day or an occasion, and the introduction of an erroneous principle of construction is an abiding wrong that will work incalculable mischief. Every citizen holds his rights and his property under the protection of the Constitution, and is interested that at all times and upon every occasion, sound rules of constitutional construction shall be laid down and adhered to. In the construction of this constitutional provision every citizen having property has a direct interest. It is a part of the organic law adapted to be a barrier against injustice by unequal taxation. The construction proposed to be put upon it in effect eradicates it from the Constitution, and puts the power of taxation where it was before the amendment was adopted, and even enlarges the power of selection and classification beyond the limits imposed by settled principles of taxation. The right to classify, and to subject property to taxation in classes at such rates and for such purposes as the Legislature may will, affects property of every description and ownership in the State. By this Act it is applied to the property of the prosecutors, but who can foretell to what purposes or to what property this doctrine of classification may be extended in the future?

For these reasons, I shall vote to affirm the decision below.

On the question: Shall the judgment of the Supreme Court be reversed as to the tax for State purposes?

For affirmance: Depue, 1.

For reversal: The Chancellor, Dixon, Parker, Reed, Scudder, Brown, Clement, Cole, McGregor, Paterson, Whitaker, 11.

On the question: Shall the judgment of the Supreme Court be reversed as to the tax for county and municipal purposes?

For affirmance: Depue, Dixon, Reed, 3.

For reversal: The Chancellor, Parker, Scudder, Brown, Clement, Cole, McGregor, Paterson, Whitaker, 9.

PENNSYLVANIA.

SUPREME COURT.

Michael HAYES, Appt.,

1. The lien of contractors and laborers for work done in the construction of a railroad, although of indefinite duration, is subject to the common-law presumption of payment arising from the lapse of twenty years.
2. A bill in equity for the enforcement of the lien so framed that it disclosed the presumption of payment, and containing no allegation of facts in rebuttal of the presumption, will be dismissed on demurrer.

CERTIORARI sur appeal from a decree of Common Pleas No. 1 of Philadelphia County, sustaining the appellees' demurrer and dismissing the appellant's bill. Affirmed.

This was a bill in equity filed September 8, 1884, by Michael Hayes, the appellant, against the Bald Eagle Valley Railroad Company, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, lessee, and the Fidelity Insurance Trust and Safe Deposit Company, mortgagee, the appellees.

The bill alleged that in the years 1857, 1858 and 1859 the plaintiff, as a contractor, did grading, bridging and mason work for the Tyrone & Lock Haven Railroad Company, a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania, on its line of road between Tyrone and Lock Haven, to the amount of about $20,000; that the plaintiff was unable to state the exact amount because he never received final estimates and never had access to the books of the company; that the said Tyrone & Lock Haven Railroad Company, while indebted to plaintiff for said work, without his consent, executed a mortgage upon all its road bed, franchises and property of every description for $500,000; that on June 6, 1860, proceedings in foreclosure were instituted in this court, and on December 7, 1860, this court decreed that said premises should be sold; that on January 29, 1861, the said railroad and its franchises, pursuant to said order and decree, were sold to Philip M. Price for $21,000, which was a grossly inadequate price; that the sale was fraudulently conducted, and bidders were intimidated, in order that said Price and his confederates might become the owners of said railroad for the smallest possible sum, and thus defraud the plaintiff and the other contractors and laborers of the money justly due them for work and labor done; that by Act of Assembly, on March 25, 1861, the said Philip Price and his associates were created a body politic and corporate, under the name of the Bald Eagle Valley Railroad Company, one of the defendants herein; that upon the sale of said railroad and franchises, as aforesaid, the Tyrone & Lock Haven Railroad Company suspended business and ceased from the ordinary business for which it was created, and ceased to have an existence as a corporation; that by the said Act of Assembly, all the rights, franchises and privileges, together with the property of the said Tyrone & Lock Haven Railroad Company, were transferred to and became vested in the said Bald Eagle Valley Railroad Company, and it became the successor of said Tyrone & Lock Haven Railroad Company, and as such successor it took possession of said railroad, franchises and property, including the work and labor done by the plaintiff, and proceeded to equip and use said railroad without paying the plaintiff any part of the money due him as contractor, laborer and workman; that on December 7, 1864, the Bald Eagle Valley Railroad Company leased its railroad franchises and property to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company for the term of ninety-nine years; that on January 1, 1880, the Bald Eagle Valley Railroad Company, without the consent of the plaintiff having been previously obtained, mortgaged all its railroad property and franchises to the Fidelity Insurance, Trust and Safe Deposit Company for $400,000.

The bill alleged further that the plaintiff was legally and equitably entitled to receive from the Bald Eagle Valley Railroad Company and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company the aforesaid balance or sum of $20,000, with interest from March 8, 1859, or whatever sum may be found due the plaintiff upon a full settlement for said work and labor done upon said railroad as contractor, laborer and workman, as aforesaid; and because the said Tyrone & Lock Haven Railroad Company had ceased to exist and the plaintiff had no remedy in law.

The bill prayed discovery; that an account be stated between the plaintiff and the Tyrone & Lock Haven Railroad Company, and that the amount of the liability of the defendants be definitely ascertained; that the court direct the defendants to pay the plaintiff such sum as might be due him; and for further relief.

The defendants filed a general demurrer which was sustained by the court and the bill dismissed.

The assignment of error specified the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill.

Mr. Bertram Hughes, for appellant:

The assets of an insolvent corporation are a fund for the payment of its debts. The holders of the property take it, charged with a trust in favor of creditors, which a court of equity will enforce.

Curran v. Ark. 15 How. 307 (56 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 707).

The parties have been joined as defendants, in the manner approved by this court.

Shamokin, etc. R. R. Co. v. Malone, 85 Pa. 25-36.

The plaintiff, being a contractor, has an absolute, indefinite lien upon the railroad and franchises of the Tyrone & Lock Haven Railroad, in the possession of the Bald Eagle Valley Railroad Company and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. As to the plaintiff, the mortgages and the proceedings thereon are null and void.

Act of Jan. 21, 1843, P. L. 367; Shamokin Valley etc., R. R. Co. v. Malone, 85 Pa. 35; Tyrone & C. R. R. Co. v. Jones, 79 Pa. 64.

The plaintiff's claim is not barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The seventh section of the Act of April 25, 1850; P. L. 570, provides that:

"The provisions of the Act of the 27th of March, 1713, entitled 'An Act for the Limitations of Actions,' shall not hereafter extend to any suit against any corporation or body politic which may have suspended business or made any transfer or assignment in trust for creditors, or who may have, at the time or after the accruing of the cause of action, suspended the ordinary business for which said corporation was created."

When the corporation became extinct and ceased "from the ordinary business for which it was created," the statute then stopped running, and the legal bar is not in the plaintiff's way.

Shamokin etc. R. R. Co. v. Malone, 85 Pa. 34.

The claim is not stale. We are suing to enforce a strictly legal cause of action, but are compelled to resort to an equitable form, because the Act has not provided us with means to enforce it at law. We cannot obtain a judgment against the Tyrone & Lock Haven Railroad, because it is an extinct corporation.

Id.

The decisions upon suits of this kind hold that a claim of this description does not become stale.

Hox v. Seal, 22 Wall. 424 (89 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 774).

A presumption of payment may arise from lapse of time. That is not conclusive, but casts upon us the burden of rebutting it:

Reed v. Reed, 12 Pa. 121.

Equity, by analogy, follows the Statute of Limitations. In this case there is no limitation. Act of April 25, 1850.

Mr. David W. Sellers, for appellees:

Equity follows the law in stale claims.

Hamilton v. Hamilton, 18 Pa. 20; Irrin v. Cooper, 92 Pa. 304; Wagner v. Baird, 7 How. 284 (48 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 681); 2 Story, Eq. § 1520.

Where the obligation is liquidated, either by a bond or a judgment, after the lapse of twenty-one years by all the cases payment is presumed, and a fortiori is an unasserted claim barred.

Cope v. Humphreys, 14 Serg. & R. 15; Foulk v. Brown, 2 Watts, 214; Diemer v. Sechrist, 1 Pen. & W. 419; Ankeny v. Penrose, 18 Pa. 192; Pryor v. Wood, 31 Pa. 145, 148; Baily v. Vehmeyer, 7 W. N. C. 195; Potter & Page's Est. 54 Pa. 465; Reed v. Reed, 46 Pa. 239; Bentley's App. 11 W. N. C. 422; Commonwealth v. Snyder, 62 Pa. 157; Seibert's App. 2 W. N. C. 53, 557; Eckert's App. 6 W. N. C. 21; Bentley's App. 11 W. N. C. 422; Davis v. McHenry, 11 W. N. C. 305.

It does not follow because the Act of April 15, 1850 (P. L. 570), as to debts and liabilities incurred to contractors, laborers and workmen, under the resolution of 1848, excludes the provisions of the Act for the limitation of actions, that the presumptions of payment and in bar of stale claims do not arise.

The presumption, where the time elapsed is sufficient, is absolute and is nowhere qualified by any circumstance except such as rebuts it. Before the Act of 1798 the lien of a judgment on land had no limitation; yet (Cope v. Humphreys, 14 Serg. & R. 15) the presumption is said to be derived from analogy to a Statute of James. It must therefore have existed before the Act of 1798.

No statutory law limits the lien of a recognizance; but it is subject to the legal presumption of payment.

Ankeny v. Penrose, 18 Pa. 193.

A case somewhat in point is Slaymaker v. Wilson, 1 Penr. & W. 219, which was an action by a pledgee against a pledger on the contract which was secured by the pledge. It was a simple contract, and twenty-three years had elapsed before suit. But the court below decided that the continued holding of the pledge prevented the operation of the Statute of Limitations.

Indeed these views have been emphasized by this court in its opinion in Biddle v. Girard Bank, 16 Weekly Notes, 397 (1885), wherein—although the claim had passed into judgment—the garnishees were released from the effect of an attachment not prosecuted.

In Shamokin etc. R. R. Co. v. Malone, 85 Pa. 35, the claim was not stale nor was the contractor chargeable with laches nor had any presumption arisen from lapse of time.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

That the plaintiff had a lien of indefinite duration, prior to all other liens on the property, for the sum due him by the Tyrone and Lock Haven Railroad Company, as contractor for the construction of the road, is incontrovertible. The lien remained, notwithstanding the judicial sale in the proceeding on the mortgage. Tyrone etc. R. Co. v. Jones, 79 Pa. 60; Shamokin etc. R. R. Co. v. Malone, 85 Pa. 25.

To that debt the Statute of Limitations does not apply.

Although the debt is an indefinite lien, there is nothing in the statutes to save it from the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of time. This presumption arises upon every species of security for the payment of money. The lien of a recognizance is indefinite, yet it lasts not forever; it is subject to the legal presumption of payment, after twenty years from the time of payment. Ankeny v. Penrose, 18 Pa. 190.

The rule is in the nature of the Statute of Limitations, furnishing indeed not a legal bar, but a presumption of fact, not subject to the discretion of the jury; they are bound to adopt it as satisfactory proof until the contrary appears. Cope v. Humphreys, 14 Serg. & R. 15.

After the lapse of twenty years all evidences of debt excepted out of the Statute of Limitations are presumed to be paid. This is a rule of convenience and policy; the result of a necessary regard to the peace and security of society. Transactions cannot be fairly investigated and justly determined after a long time has involved them in uncertainty and obscurity. Justice cannot be satisfactorily done when parties and witnesses are dead, vouchers lost or thrown away, and a new generation has appeared on the stage of life. Foulk v. Brown, 2 Watts, 209.

The plaintiff's bill sets forth that the debt was due on March 8, 1859, from which date he claims that it bears interest; that on January 29, 1861, pursuant to an order and decree of the supreme court, in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage, the road bed, franchises and property of the Tyrone & Lock Haven Railroad Company were sold to Philip M. Price, for a grossly inadequate consideration; that on March 25, 1881, said Price and others were created a corporation under the name of the Bald Eagle Railroad Company, which Company was invested with all the franchises and property of the Tyrone & Lock Haven Railroad Company; and that the sum due to the plaintiff is still unpaid.

This bill was filed on September 8, 1884, twenty-five years after the debt became due and payable, and twenty-three years after the judicial sale of the property of the debtor, and the organization of the Bald Eagle Railroad Company, one of the defendants. What has been the cause of delay in bringing suit nowhere appears in the bill. Not a circumstance is stated showing that the debt is unpaid. Hence, on the face of the bill, the presumption is that the debt has been paid; and the action fails unless it is unnecessary to show facts repelling the presumption of payment.

Where a bill is so framed as to present the objection that from lapse of time there is a legal presumption of fact that the debt has been paid, without any attendant circumstances to obviate it, courts of equity act on the analogy of the law as to the Statute of Limitations and will not entertain a suit for relief, if it would be barred at law. And this objection may be taken advantage of by demurrer; but if it does not appear on the face of the bill it must be taken by way of plea or answer. Story, Eq. Pl. § 503; see §§ 751, 813.

In Piatt v. Vattier, 9 Pet. 405 [34 U. S. bk. 9, L. ed. 173], a bill for conveyance of the legal title to real estate was dismissed, aside from the Statute of Limitations, because lapse of time was a bar, there being no circumstances stated in the bill or shown in the evidence to overcome the adverse possession; and courts of equity will not entertain stale demands. The remark of Lord Camden was approvingly quoted: "A court of equity, which is never active in relief against conscience or public convenience, has always refused its aid to stale demands, where the party has slept upon his rights, or acquiesced for a great length of time. Nothing can call forth this court into activity but conscience, good faith and reasonable diligence. Where these are wanting, the court is passive and does nothing; laches and neglect are always discountenanced; and therefore from the beginning of this jurisdiction there was always a limitation of suits in this court." See Wagner v. Baird, 7 How. 234 [48 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 681]; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1520 and note.

George W. BRIETSCH.

1. A certificate of the separate acknowledgment of a married woman, although omitting to state that she delivered as well as signed and sealed the deed without compulsion, etc., is not invalid, if otherwise in the usual form; it is a substantial compliance with the statute, and therefore sufficient.

2. The evidence in this case held sufficient to warrant the finding that the mortgage was not given as collateral security.

CERTIORARI sur appeal from a decree of the Common Pleas of Franklin County, dismissing exceptions and confirming the report of the auditor to make distribution of the proceeds of a sheriff's sale. Affirmed.

In proceedings by scire facias to foreclose a mortgage the real estate covered by the mortgage was sold by the sheriff for $2,250, and O. C. Bowers, Esq., was appointed auditor to make distribution.

The auditor found as a fact that the mortgage was given in 1881 by Michael Gable and Leah, his wife, upon real estate belonging to the wife, under the following circumstances:

Michael Gable having served a term as sheriff of the county, employed H. Gehr to collect the fees due him. Gable was indebted to George Brietsch, the appellee, for bread furnished to the county jail; and Gehr, having also in his hands Brietsch's claim for collection, proposed that if Gable and wife would give this mortgage of the wife's real estate to secure the debt he (Gehr) would advance the money upon it and pay off Brietsch. This was done; but when Gehr offered to pay Brietsch the money, Brietsch preferred to take the mortgage instead, and accordingly Gehr assigned it to him. The certificate of the wife's separate acknowledgment stated that "she did voluntarily, and of her own free will and accord, sign and seal" the mortgage, but omitted to state in the separate acknowledgment that she also delivered it, although the certificate stated in the usual form that they acknowledged that they delivered it, etc.

There was at the time the mortgage was given money enough due Gable upon his book accounts, over and above exempt property, to pay Brietsch's claim, but Gable afterwards used nearly all the money as fast as it was collected, and at the time of the sale was insolvent.

The auditor found as facts, inter alia, that it was no part of the arrangement that Gehr was to hold the mortgage as a security, and that he should repay himself out of Gable's costs as he should collect them, and that it was not a condition of the giving of the mortgage that it was to be paid out of money to be collected from his books. The testimony is reviewed in the opinion of the court below.

The auditor also found as matter of law that the acknowledgment was sufficient, and that the mortgage was entitled to be paid out of the fund. He reported a schedule of distribution in accordance with these conclusions. To this report exceptions were filed by Leah Gable. The exceptions related both to the findings of fact and the conclusions of law.

Rowe, P. J., overruling the exceptions, said, inter alia:

"An objection has been made, but not much insisted upon, as to the form of the acknowledgment. No doubt the acknowledgment is a substantial compliance with the Act of 1770. That the wife is of full age need not be certified. Michael Gable is referred to as 'her said husband.' Both acknowledged that they signed, sealed and delivered the same as their voluntary act and deed.

"The magistrate, in taking an acknowledgment, is required to do two things: 1, to examine the wife separate and apart from her husband; 2, to make known to the wife the full contents of the deed. The contents may not be made known upon the separate examination. It is required, however, that upon the separate examination she shall, in substance, declare that she did voluntarily and of her own free will and assent seal and, as her act and deed, deliver the deed, without any coercion or compulsion of her husband. Now the certificate states that she did declare that she did voluntarily, and of her own free will and accord, sign and seal the written indenture, without any compulsion on the part of her said husband, to the end the same might be recorded as such as her act and deed.' This is equivalent to saying that as her act and deed she delivered the same. And the whole is to be understood as declared upon her separate examination. Hornbeck v. Mut. Build. & Loan Assn. 88 Pa. 64; Jamison v. Jamison, 8 Whart. 457; Shaller v. Brand, 6 Binn. 435.

"Coming to the main question, I think that the right of Mr. Brietsch to participate in the fund for distribution, depends on this: whether Mrs. Gable executed the Gehr mortgage upon the faith of his agreement to repay his advance out of the moneys collected by him for Michael Gable; in other words, whether the mortgage was given as collateral security.

"Mr. Gehr was collecting costs for Sheriff Gable. George Brietsch had a claim for bread furnished to Gable amounting to $600, which he put in Mr. Gehr's hands for collection. The costs due Gehr would more than pay Brietsch, if applied to his claim after collection, and were liable to Brietsch's attachment. Gehr offered to furnish the money necessary to satisfy Brietsch, upon the security of Leah Gable's mortgage. The mortgage was executed. Gehr offered Brietsch the $600, but the latter preferred to take an assignment of the mortgage, which was transferred to him. Mr. Brietsch had nothing else to do with the transaction. Mr. Gehr never spoke to Mrs. Gable herself about the business. She knew that the object of the mortgage was the satisfaction of the Brietsch claim against her husband. She was told by her husband of the costs in Gehr's hands for collection, to an amount greater than the sum secured by the mortgage; and was assured that they would be applied to the mortgage debt and that there would be no trouble.

"There was, so far, no fraud, misrepresentation or concealment in procuring the mortgage, nor was there a fraudulent or even harmful use made of it in transferring it to Mr. Brietsch; for what difference whether Gehr satisfied Brietsch with money or the mortgage, seeing that it was simply held until her land was sold upon another lien?

"But Mrs. Gable testifies that her husband told her that Mr. Gehr was to repay himself out of the costs collected, and that it was on the faith of this that she gave the mortgage. The auditor has not accepted her testimony, because in this and some other material particulars she differs from her husband and Esquire Seiders, whose evidence is to be preferred.

"First, as to what took place between Mr. Gehr and Sheriff Gable; the former testifies, 'When I took this Brietsch mortgage to myself, I had no agreement or understanding with Mr. Gable, or anyone else, that it was to be paid out of his costs. Mr. Gable was after me time after time for his costs, and I paid them to him as fast as I collected them.'

"Michael Gable testifies that Mr. Gehr said, 'he would make it out of the books * * * he would make up the money for Brietsch, and that would give Mr. Gehr time to collect the money from the books, and save me from being harassed or sued by Brietsch.' * * * The witness, being asked to state fully what transpired between him and Mr. Gehr, said: 'Mr. Gehr said we should give him the mortgage and he would advance the money and keep Brietsch from harassing me, and would make the collections out of the books and pay Brietsch off.'

"Now, I do not think that it can be collected, from a view of the evidence of these two as to what was said between them, that Mr. Gehr agreed or undertook to apply the moneys he should collect for costs to this debt; but only (if so much) that the costs were mentioned as a fund out of which the debt could be paid. The action of Mr. Gehr in paying out the money as fast as collected to Sheriff Gable, or upon his order, shows clearly how he understood the arrangement, for it is not supposable he would have paid out the money to others, without hesitation or question, which he knew were to be appropriated to the Brietsch debt.

"Second, as to what Sheriff Gable told his wife about the arrangement. Esquire Seiders testifies, 'Mr. Gable told her his books were in the hands of Brewer & Gehr, and that there was money enough coming on them to more than pay off this mortgage; that as fast as the money came in it was to be applied to that purpose.' Here it is to be noticed that he did not say that Mr. Gehr had so promised or agreed.

"Michael Gable puts it in different ways: 'I told my wife there would be no trouble about that, as Mr. Gehr would make the money out of the collections within a year.' Again: 'She said, What does this mean? I told her I owed Mr. Brietsch and Mr. Gehr; said by doing this it would keep Brietsch from harassing me, and give him time to collect the money from the books. I told her Mr. Gehr would hold this mortgage and there would be no trouble about it.' Subsequently, in answer to the question: How were her objections removed? he said: 'I just told her there would be no trouble about it; that Mr. Gehr would make the money very easily; that there was plenty of money there to do it with.'

"Now upon the evidence of these two witnesses, Seiders and Sheriff Gable, I do not think that the auditor could safely find that Mrs. Gable was told that Mr. Gehr had agreed to apply the costs to the Brietsch claim; nor could Mrs. Gable fairly infer, and therefore she was not at liberty to infer, that it was to be paid out of the costs, and that her mortgage was only to be a collateral security. They show this only:

that she had the promise and assurance of her husband, whose debt she was about to secure, that he had the means in the costs due to him to meet the debt, and that they should be so applied. But every surety receives the same promise and assurance that he will not be troubled. If she had shown that she was told that Mr. Gehr had so agreed (that is, that he would look to the costs for repayment in the first instance), then, on the authority of Cridge v. Hare, 98 Pa. 561, she might perhaps successfully dispute the right of the Gehr mortgage to participate in the fund, because costs enough were, in fact, collected to pay the Brietsch claim. "The exceptions are overruled, the report and distribution of the auditor is confirmed."

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in overruling the exceptions.

Messrs. Thad. M. Mahon and W. N. Brewer, for appellants:

The giving of the mortgage to Brietsch, without the consent of Mrs. Gable, was such an alteration of the original arrangement as in law discharged the surety.

Misrepresentation committed prior to the execution of a guaranty, destroys its operation, and may be either verbal or in writing.

De Colyar, Guar. p. 374; Blest v. Brown, 8 Jur. N. S. 603; 3 Giff. 450.

The surety is discharged by a variation which is not in itself material, where the surety has contracted on the faith of the original or has expressly made the terms of it part of his contract. The surety is held to become surety on the faith of the original agreement, if notice was given to him of the terms of the contract between the creditor and the principal debtor, and if after such notice he executed the guaranty.

Garrett v. Handley, 4 Barn. & C. 664; Glynn v. Hertel, 8 Taunt. 208; Bacon v. Chesney, 1 Stark. 192; Cridge v. Hare, 98 Pa. 561.

The Act of Assembly provides that a married woman must acknowledge not only that she signed and sealed, etc., but that she delivered the indenture without any coercion of her husband.

Messrs. H. Gehr and Jno. Stewart, for appellee:

The report of an auditor upon the facts, approved by a judge, must stand until plain error is pointed out.

Liggett Spring & Axle Cos.' App. 2 Cent. Rep. 318; Messinger's App. 1 Cent. Rep. 126.

Not every misrepresentation or variation from the original understanding necessarily operates as a discharge of a surety. It must be a material misrepresentation, or a variance that results prejudicially to the surety.

Kerr, Fraud, 74; De Colyar, Guar. 391.

A substantial compliance with the form of certificate of acknowledgment prescribed by the Act of Assembly is sufficient.

Hornbeck v. Mutual Build. & Loan Asso. 88 Pa. 64.

In Jamison v. Jamison, 3 Whart. 457, the omission was the same as here. It was said by the court that although there were literal deviations from the Act of Assembly, yet the certificate was substantially in compliance with it, and therefore sufficient, according to the decisions in McIntire v. Ward, 5 Binn. 301, and Shaller v. Brand, 6 Binn. 435.

Per Curiam:

An examination of the whole evidence fails to convict the auditor of error in his finding of facts. The finding was approved and confirmed by the court. The facts thus found clearly sustain the decree of distribution. The certificate of acknowledgment is a substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellants.

v.

Alfred PHILLIPS et al.

1. In an action of ejectment by a plaintiff, claiming as an innocent purchaser for value, without notice, the record of an agreement for the sale of the land in dispute, to the plaintiff, recorded after the commencement of the action, is admissible as evidence; but its rejection is not ground for reversal if the original agreement was admitted.
2. A point presented to the court for consideration should be so answered that the jury will clearly understand whether it is affirmed or denied.
3. That the plaintiff in an action of ejectment has been permitted to testify to matters occurring in the lifetime of the deceased ancestor of defendants, either with or without objection, does not render the widow and son of the ancestor competent to testify to such matters for the purpose of sustaining the defendants' title.
4. The widow and son, being tenants in common with the defendants, in whom an outstanding title is alleged to exist, are not competent witnesses for the defendants, alleging their title.
5. The record of a deed by the executors of a deceased vendor, in a written agreement for the sale of land in this State, to the vendee thereof, executed by direction of a court in another State, is not admissible in an action of ejectment for the land attempted to be conveyed by the deed.
6. A vendee with notice of a former conveyance, or who, with such notice as should have put him on inquiry whether his grantor's title was disputed, neglected to inquire concerning it, is not an innocent purchaser and takes no title.
7. In an action of ejectment, declarations of a deceased grantor, under whom plaintiff claims title, that he had sold the land to the ancestor of the defendants, are admissible.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Sullivan County, to review a judgment in favor of defendants, in an action of ejectment. Reversed. At the trial before Judge P. J., the following facts appeared:

David Phillips, being the owner of the land in dispute in 1849, leased it as alleged, by a written lease to continue for seven years, to his son Jonathan Phillips, who took possession. On August 20, 1850, David Phillips executed the following paper:

August the 20, 1850. I do hereby agree that Jonathan Phillips shall have the land which he is posetion of now for the labor he done for me over age and this shall be his receipt for all my "writes" and claims against the land.

David Phillips.

This paper was never recorded.

Jonathan Phillips remained in possession of the land until his death in 1860; and after his death, his widow and children remained, without further writings, until April 1, 1862, when David Phillips, who was administrator of Jonathan Phillips, leased the land to the widow by a written lease for one year.

At the expiration of the lease the widow, at the request of David Phillips, quit the premises. The plaintiff then took possession as tenant of David Phillips, and on October 17, 1863, in a written agreement, contracted to buy the land of him, paying a part of the purchase money.

David Phillips having moved to Michigan and died, without having executed a deed to the plaintiff for the land, his executors (having been paid by plaintiff the balance of the purchase money, in accordance with a decree of the court in Michigan) executed and delivered to plaintiff a deed in 1875, which was placed on record in Sullivan County.

On April 7, 1881, the defendants, being sons of Jonathan Phillips, took possession of the premises by breaking into the house thereon, the plaintiff residing on an adjoining farm. They refused to leave; hence this action was brought.

After the commencement of the action, the agreement between David Phillips and the plaintiff, dated October 17, 1863, for the sale of the land to the latter, was put on record. The record was offered in evidence and refused. First assignment of error.

The original agreement was afterwards offered and admitted. The record of the deed by the executors of David Phillips to the plaintiff, executed under direction of the court in Michigan, was offered in evidence and refused. Second assignment of error.

The widow of Jonathan Phillips was called as a witness for the defendants, to testify to transactions in the lifetime of David Phillips. The testimony was admitted under objection. Sixth and tenth assignments of error.

John Phillips, a son of Jonathan Phillips, and a brother of the defendants, was offered for the same purpose. Objected to because the witness was a party in interest.

THE COURT. Inasmuch as Henry Swank has testified to matters in the lifetime of David Phillips, it being a part of the record, we will not exclude the witnesses on that ground. Ninth assignment of error.

Defendants also called witnesses to testify to declarations of David Phillips, made against his interest. They were objected to by the plaintiff, but permitted to testify. Seventh and eighth assignments of error.

Griffith Phillips was called by the defendants and testified without objection, as to conversations with the plaintiff prior to October 17, 1863, as to the title of Jonathan Phillips to the land in dispute.

Two of the points presented by the defendants with the answers of the court thereon were as follows:

Fourth: That the plaintiff, claiming the land under an unrecorded conveyance, cannot recover the land in dispute from the defendants, who are in possession of the land claiming under a prior unrecorded conveyance from the same grantor.

Answer: In this case neither party has a deed, and neither party has a conveyance upon record. The actual possession at the time of bringing suit is not the only criterion of equitable title. If the plaintiff purchased with notice that Jonathan Phillips died seised of that land, claiming to be owner, it was enough to put him upon inquiry; and notice of the equitable title to Jonathan Phillips may be inferred from evidence that he had such notice. Third assignment of error.

Fifth: That if the jury believe that Henry Swank had notice of the fact that Jonathan Phillips was the owner of the land or was in possession of the land under a claim of ownership, the verdict of the jury must be for the defendants, and if from the evidence they believe that Henry Swank knew that Jonathan Phillips was in possession of the land for a number of years, that fact should be taken into consideration by the jury in determining the question of notice.

Answer: If the jury believe that Henry Swank had notice that Jonathan Phillips was the owner of the land or in possession of the land under claim of ownership at the time he died, he cannot recover in this action.

The court charged, inter alia, as follows:

"In this case it appears that Jonathan Phillips did not put this conveyance to him upon record, neither did Swank put the agreement which he obtained upon record. Therefore we have these cases: two parties, neither of them having what is called a legal title to the land; each of them having an agreement by which he claimed the land, yet neither complying with the law respecting the recording of deeds. These two parties therefore stand upon an equal footing so far as the recording Act is concerned." Fourth assignment of error.

"But if he (Swank) had the means of knowing (and such notice as should have put him upon inquiry to find out) by what title this land was held, then he would no longer be an innocent purchaser; for however innocent his intentions might be, that notice is a notice which should have put him upon inquiry and he might find the facts if he wanted to do so." Fifth assignment of error.

Verdict for defendants and judgment thereon; whereupon, plaintiff took this writ.

The assignments of error specified the ruling of the court on the testimony as above stated, the answer of the court to defendant's fourth point, and that part of the charge of the court above cited.

Messrs. E. M. Dunham and R. J. Thomson, for plaintiff in error:

"All bargains and sales, deeds and conveyances of lands and tenement and hereditaments in this province, may be recorded in said office."

Bright. Purd. p. 567, pl. 19.

The next section of the Act of 1715 provides the manner of proof of the execution of deeds, etc., by the subscribing witnesses.

The fact that the article of agreement was recorded after suit brought can make no difference; as the Act of 1834, section 1, provides, that "Whenever provision has been made or hereafter shall be made by law for the recording in the proper office any paper or papers, the record and records thereof made, and exemplifications of the same, lawfully certified, shall be legal evidence in all cases in which the same would be competent testimony.

Brightly, Purd. p. 729, pl. 36.

An exemplification of a record is not evidence of a secondary quality, but stands upon an equality with the original.

The plaintiff must have the entire right at the time suit is brought; he cannot afterwards strengthen it.

The Act of 1849 P. L. p. 620, § 8, simply provides a plan by which instruments of writing made out of this State may be made eligible for record within it. It does not cure the defects in the instrument to be recorded. It is true that the Act of May 27, 1878, P. L. p. 98, does declare that certain deeds made by executors without the State and recorded within it shall be good deeds. But they are deeds made under the authority of any last will and testament.

If there was no authority in the will of David Phillips for his executors to make a deed to Henry Swank, and it does not appear that there was, then it required the decree of a court having jurisdiction authorizing specific performance of this contract. This jurisdiction is vested in the orphans' court in this State; and this jurisdiction is exclusive.

Musselman's App. 65 Pa. 488.

In Poth v. Anstatt, 4 Watts & S. 307, and Pa. Salt Mfg. Co. v. Neel, 54 Pa. 9, the deeds were recorded before suit brought.

Rearick v. Rearick, and Wager v. Chev, 15 Pa. 66, 323.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

That it was error to exclude the record of the agreement is too plain for question. It was legal evidence under the Act of February, 21, 1834, P. L. 63; Curry v. Raymond, 28 Pa. 144. But its rejection is not ~~error~~ for reversal, for afterwards the original agreement was offered by the plaintiff, and admitted; otherwise the first assignment would have to be sustained.

When the plaintiff had the agreement recorded, the defendants were already in possession, and this action was pending. At the trial he did not claim to recover because his agreement was recorded; he claimed to be an innocent purchaser without notice; nor is there anything in the statutes relative to recording of deeds to aid him. If he had notice of the outstanding title, it bars his recovery as effectually as if it had been recorded.

The defendants' fourth point, namely: "That the plaintiff claiming the land under an unrecorded conveyance, cannot recover the land in dispute from the defendants who are in possession of the land, claiming under a prior unrecorded conveyance from the same grantor," should have been unqualifiedly refused. Its mere refusal could not have been misunderstood. The answer was very nearly the substance of the defendants' fifth point, and also of the answer to that point, and also of what the court had said respecting notice in the charge.

It is but fair to the parties when one puts a well constructed and definite point, that it be either affirmed or denied. To do neither in express terms, and take occasion to repeat the substance of another point by the same party is likely to be unsatisfactory to the other, if not ground for a reversal. Although a lawyer would understand the point was refused because it was not affirmed, it is uncertain whether the jury would so understand.

The defendants are two of the children of Jonathan Phillips, deceased, and claim under him as heirs. Against the plaintiff's objection, the widow and a son of said decedent were permitted to testify, respecting matters which occurred in the lifetime of said Phillips. The court gave no reason for so permitting the widow to testify, but remarked that the son would not be excluded, inasmuch as the plaintiff had testified to such matters.

In Morris v. Travis, 7 Serg. & R. 220, an action arising from a dispute about lines, the defendant was allowed to show the extent of his improvements on the land he had in possession, and this court held that it was competent for him to do so (if for no other reason), to rebut the evidence the plaintiff had given on the same subject. That is the sole authority cited to support the ruling that when an incompetent witness has testified on one side, no matter whether with or without objection, an incompetent witness must be admitted if offered by the other side to testify on the same matter. And we think the case has no application to the ruling. Had objection been made to Swank, and error committed in permitting him to testify, that error could not be corrected by committing another.

Was the brother of the defendants interested? If so, it is not pretended that the statute qualifies him. One of several tenants in common in whom an outstanding title is alleged to exist is not a competent witness for the defendant alleging his title. In such case the witness comes to maintain his own title, and to keep those in possession who recognize it. If the defendants succeed, the title of the witness is found by the verdict, and he can call on the defendants to attorn to him or commence an action to recover possession. Lodge v. Patterson, 3 Watts, 74.

A tenant in common is a competent witness for his cotenant in an ejectment brought by the latter; in that case the cotenant is interested in the question, not in the event of the suit. Bennett v. Hethington, 16 Serg. & R. 193.

It was there said "that a tenant in common is not competent to support the possession of his cotenant when the latter is defendant in an ejectment, founded on a title adverse to the title of both." And the reasons were pointed out why a cotenant is competent to testify when called by the plaintiff in an ejectment, and cannot be a witness for the defendant in an ejectment for the land.

Not only was the brother of the defendants (he being their cotenant) incompetent, but so also was their mother. The moment their title is established, her right to the widow's interest under the intestate laws is established. Her interest in the event of the suit is certain. The sixth, ninth and tenth assignments of error are sustained.

In the court below no point was made that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the plaintiff, prior to his purchase, had notice of the title of Jonathan Phillips. On the contrary, the plaintiff's points indicate that he believed the evidence was sufficient to submit, for he prayed instruction that the plaintiff was entitled to recover if the jury found that he purchased in good faith, without notice of the title which the defendants claimed. Unless there was evidence of notice there was no question about it for the jury.

At present nothing will be said of the sufficiency of the evidence. It may not be precisely the same at the next trial. Then it may appear whether Griffith Phillips is a near relative of the children of Jonathan Phillips, or a stranger. At the argument it was not contended the instructions on the question of notice were erroneous, in case there was evidence to submit.

No error is in the rulings complained of in the second, fourth, seventh and eighth assignments, and there is no occasion to note them specially.

Judgment reversed and venire facias de novo awarded.

v.

1. A devise of land, without words of limitation, to a married daughter, followed by the words "and I hereby authorize and empower her to sell and dispose of the same as she may think proper, but in case of her death and the property as aforesaid remaining unsold, then it is to be equally divided among her children share and share alike as they arrive at the age of twenty-one," and in the light of other clauses in the will, gives to the daughter a life estate in the land and a power to appoint, by way of sale or otherwise, to other uses than those specified by the will.

2. A deed of conveyance of the land in fee simple, without the joinder of the husband, is a valid execution of the power.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Blair County, to review a judgment for the plaintiffs in an action of ejectment. Reversed.

At the trial before Bucher, P. J., the plaintiffs proved that Aaron Burns died in 1842, seised of the land in controversy and leaving the following will:

"First, it is my will, and I do order that all my just debts and funeral expenses be duly paid and satisfied as soon as conveniently can be after my decease.

"Item. I give and bequeath to my daughter Sarah Anne my secretary, two of my best beds and bedding at her choice, and one hundred dollars' worth of household and kitchen furniture, which she may keep at the appraisal if she chooses so to do; also the four acre out lot including the house and garden at the upper end of the Town of Williamsburg (house and garden now occupied by David Stephens); and after she arrives at the age of twenty-one years, do hereby authorize and empower to sell and dispose of the same, or otherwise hold it as she may think proper. I also give and bequeath to my said daughter in addition to the foregoing two thousand dollars in money, as follows: five hundred dollars when she arrives at the age of twenty-one years, five hundred dollars one year thereafter, and the balance, one thousand dollars, to be paid one year after the last five hundred dollars are paid.

"Item. I give and bequeath to my daughter Mary, intermarried with Jos. S. P. Harris [the land in controversy]; and I do hereby authorize and empower my said daughter Mary to sell and dispose of the same as she may think proper; but in case of her death and the property as aforesaid remaining unsold, then it is to be equally divided amongst her children, share and share alike, as they arrive at the age of twenty-one. I also give and bequeath to my said daughter Mary two thousand dollars in money, to be paid to her as follows: one thousand dollars one year after my death, and one thousand dollars two years after my death; and no voucher or receipt for the payment of the money as aforesaid shall be of any value except her own, unless in case of her death; then the same to be equally divided amongst her lawful heirs as they arrive at the age of twenty-one years. I will and bequeath to my daughter Mary the balance (if any) due me on a final settlement of the debts and credits of the late firm of A. Patterson & Co. after first deducting the balance from me on my private account remaining on the books of said firm.

"Item. I give and bequeath to my daughter Rachael Rebecca, intermarried with Dr. Alex. McKamey, the house I now occupy [and certain other lands] for her entire use and benefit, to sell the same or hold it as she may think proper; and I do hereby authorize and empower my said daughter Rachael Rebecca to sign, seal, execute and acknowledge all such deed or deeds of conveyance as may be requisite and necessary for the granting and issuing the same to the purchaser or purchasers thereof. I also give and bequeath to my said daughter Rachael Rebecca three thousand dollars to be paid to her in money, as follows: five hundred dollars one year after my decease, one thousand dollars three years after my decease, and one thousand dollars four years after my decease; but in the event of her death the money as aforesaid remaining unpaid to be put out on interest for the use of her lawful heirs, to be paid to them share and share alike, as they arrive at the age of twenty-one years, and the house and lots given and bequeathed to my said daughter Rachael Rebecca as aforesaid in the event of her death, and the same remaining unsold is to be distributed amongst her lawful heirs, in the same manner and form as the money.

"Item. I will and bequeath to my son Joseph [a certain house and lot], one good bed and bedding and three thousand dollars in money, to be paid to him as follows: five hundred dollars to be paid to him one year after he becomes of age; five hundred dollars one year after that; one thousand dollars when he arrives at the age of twenty-four years, and one thousand dollars when he arrives at the age of twenty-five years; but in the event of the decease of my said son Joseph without any lawful issue, and the money as aforesaid remaining in part or in whole, or not all due, then and in that case to be divided among my other children then living and my children that may have died and left lawful heirs, share and share alike.

"Item. I give and bequeath to my grandchildren Mary Ann Rhule and Jonathan Albert Rhule, each, eight hundred dollars in money, to be put out on interest until they arrive at the age of twenty-one years; and in the event of the decease of either of them before they arrive at the age of twenty-one, then and in that case the survivor is to receive the whole sum of sixteen hundred dollars; but in the event of the decease of both of my aforesaid grandchildren before they arrive at the age of twenty-one, then and in that case the said sixteen hundred dollars is to fall back to my estate and to be divided amongst my children then living and my children that may have deceased and left lawful heirs, share and share alike.

"It is my will and desire and I hereby order and direct my representatives to sell at public sale three shares I hold in a tract of land in Allegheny Township, bought of Jacob and John Kinsel and Jacob Burkett, who is married to one of the heirs of said estate, containing one hundred and ninety acres, sale to be made in one or two years, as may be thought best and advisable; and I hereby authorize and empower my said representatives to transfer my title to the purchaser and purchasers.

"And as touching all the rest, residue and remainder of my personal estate which will amount to from four to five thousand dollars, which is not disposed of, that when all is settled up, the balance or remainder of my estate, I will and bequeath to my children share and share alike, and my two grandchildren Mary Ann and Jonathan Albert Rhule to have what would be coming to their mother if living.

"All the houses, lots, etc., given to any of my children in this my last will and testament, are to be taken charge of by them immediately after my decease, and to receive the income and profits arising out of the same; the said houses and lots are all leased for the present year except the one I now occupy. And whereas, I have made sundry deeds of trust of real estate to my children, which are my lawful acts and deeds, and desire that the same may be carried into full effect as intended so to be by the said deeds of trust for the benefit and interest of each of my children named therein; and if any one of my children are dissatisfied with the said deed of trust or this my last will and testament, and commences a suit at law or occasions any disturbances promoting any suit or suits at law, that child or children, son-in-law or sons-in-law, so misbehaving to have no part of my estate, and his or their share or shares to be equally divided amongst the rest of my children share and share alike.

"All promissory notes and receipts for money lent or advanced or for any other purpose including all accounts which I might have held against any of my children or sons-in-law are considered fully settled and discharged, except a balance of rent which Jos. S. P. Harris is to pay after making certain improvements on the farm he now occupies, amounting to one hundred and fifty dollars, due April 1, 1848.

"It is my will and desire that Jos. S. P. Harris and Dr. Alexander McKamey may settle my estate by entering such bail as the orphans' court will require; and if they cannot obtain such bail, then my request is that Adolphus Patterson, Jno. K. Neff and Jos. S. P. Harris become my administrators; and if said Harris cannot find bail, he is to assist the others, as he knows more than anyone else concerning my business; and the administrators as aforesaid are to allow said Harris for his time and trouble, to be paid out of my estate."

The plaintiffs proved also the death of Mary, wife of Jos. S. P. Harris in 1860, leaving four children, three of whom, with their father Jos. S. P. Harris, who had acquired the share of the fourth child, now deceased, were the plaintiffs, and rested.

The defendants offered in evidence the deed of Mary Harris, formerly Mary Burns, to James Stevens, dated March 25, 1851, for the land in controversy, to be followed by proof that James Stevens and the defendants claiming under him had been in possession since 1851 under the deed.

Upon the objection of the plaintiffs the court rejected the defendants' offer, upon the ground that the will gave Mary an estate in fee, "with the right to sell, if she saw proper; but that this did not give her power to sell and convey without her husband joining her."

The court directed a verdict for the plaintiffs; whereupon the defendants took this writ.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court in rejecting their evidence and in instructing the jury to find for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Samuel S. Blair, for plaintiffs in error:

A power has no effect on the limitation over until it is executed. Until then it is as if 256 it had no existence; but if it carries the fee, when executed, it will operate as a divestiture. Fearne, Contingent Remainders, 226; Phyllis's Estate, 2 Brewst. 179.

Whether the limitation precedes or follows the power makes no difference.

Fearne, Contingent Remainders, 227.

Sometimes the testator gives in his will a power of disposition and then devises over the estate to take effect if and in case the power shall not be exercised. Limitations of the latter kind are regarded as remainders, and as vested, although liable to be defeated if the appointment shall be made to another.

2 Washb. Real Prop. 586.

No inference in this case of an intention to give a fee can be drawn from the devise being general or indefinite, as the Act of 1833 provides that "All devises of real estate shall pass the whole estate of the testator in the premises devised, although there are no words of inheritance or perpetuity, unless it appear by a devise over, or by words of limitation or otherwise, in the will, that the testator intended to devise a less estate."

A devise of an estate generally or indefinitely with a power of disposition over it carries the fee; but where the estate is given for life only the devisee takes only an estate for life, though a power of disposition or to appoint the fee by deed or will be annexed.

Morris v. Phaler, 1 Watts, 390; 4 Kent, Com. 819; Fisher v. Herbell, 7 Watts & S. 78; Second Ref. Pres. Church v. Diabrov, 52 Pa. 223.

A devise for life with a power to dispose of the thing at his death is but an estate for life; and if the devisee or legatee does not dispose of it, it goes (when there is no devise over) to the heir or next of kin of the testator, according to the nature of the property.

Flintham's App. 11 Serg. & R. 16.

A feme covert may execute any kind of power whether simply collateral, appendant or in gross; and it is immaterial whether it was given to her when sole or married. The concurrence of the husband is in no case necessary.

4 Kent, Com. 324; Sugden, Powers, 148.

The mode of executing the power of sale given to Mrs. Harris is not specified in the will. It was a power to sell. She did sell and received the purchase money. The power would have been well executed by a parol sale.

Silberthorn v. McKinstler, 12 Pa. 67.

If the power is required to be executed by deed, nothing less will satisfy the words; and it must be sealed and delivered as a proper deed without reference to the power of the donee to make a proper deed; therefore a married woman must seal and deliver the deed as if she were sui juris.

2 Sugden, Powers, 308.

Ordinarily a power of disposal annexed to a fee is merged in the estate; but where a married woman is the devisee in fee and the donee of a disposing power, the power, the execution of which may be necessary to pass her estate, should not be regarded as merged.

2 Sugden, Powers, 107; Abbott v. Burton, 11 Mod. 181; Downs v. Tippetton, 4 Russ. 334.

Mr. Aug. S. Landis, for defendants in error:

Under the ninth section of the Act of April 8, 1833, Mrs. Harris took an estate in fee simple. The Act says: "All devises of real estate shall pass the whole estate of the testator in the premises devised, although there be no words of inheritance or perpetuity, unless it appears (by a devise over or by words of limitation or otherwise in the will) that the testator intended to devise a less estate." The superadded words of the testator, whereby he authorized her to dispose of the land as she thought proper, will in nowise diminish the estate; but emphasizes the full and perfect measure of the estate, as there is no stronger evidence of the absolute dominion over property than the power to sell it in any way or upon any terms preferred by the seller.

The gift of the proceeds of a thing is the gift of the thing itself; and it is the settled law of this State that a devise with the power to sell vests in the devisee an estate in fee simple.

Morris v. Phaler, 1 Watts, 389; Culbertson v. Duly, 7 Watts & S. 195; 4 Kent, Com. 819; Caldwell v. Fulton, 81 Pa. 479; Church v. Disbrow, 52 Pa. 219.

As there was no life estate, there was no remainder. When the testator directed that in case she died without having sold the land it was to be divided among her children, share and share alike, as they came of age, it was the grant to them of a fee after her fee, by executory devise.

Pells v. Brown, Cro. Jac. 590; Hinde v. Lyons, Leon. pt. 2, p. 11; 2 Bl. Com. 178, 174; Hauer v. Shitz, 3 Yeates, 221; Langley v. Heald, 7 Watts & S. 96; Evans v. Evans, 9 Pa. 192.

A power is technically an authority given to some one to do an act in relation to lands which the owner might himself lawfully perform. It is said to be collateral when conferred upon a stranger without interest; appendant when the person along with his interest and within its compass has the power of revocation or appointment; in gross when the life tenant has the power of appointment out of the compass of his estate.

Sugden, Powers, 82; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 802-806.

Until the Statute of 3d and 4th William IV., a married woman could only convey by the fictitious method of fine and recovery. That Act authorized her "to release or extinguish any power vested in or reserved to her in regard to lands of any tenure, as effectually as if she were a feme sole; but her husband must concur in the deed, and the deed must be acknowledged as required by the Act."

2 Sug. Vend. 90.

The only modification of this was in 1874, by the Act of 87 and 88 Vict. 78, when she was authorized to execute a deed as a feme sole when she was a mere trustee. There are no statutes on this subject in Pennsylvania.

Even if Mrs. Harris had a power to sell, she was not empowered to convey. It is a rule in regard to powers that a strict compliance with the language of the grant is absolutely necessary. What is not there cannot be supplied.

2 Washb. Real Prop. 316.

Here nothing was said as to how she should convey; and with that omitted, the law would supply the usual method, with her husband. In the devise to Rebecca, the testator authorizes her "to sign, seal, execute and acknowledge all such deeds of conveyance as may be requisite and necessary." Whatever that may avail with her, he studiously avoids going so far with Mrs. Harris.

Mrs. Harris had an estate in this land, and unless she conveyed it as the law required, her conveyance was void. The second section of the Act of February 24, 1770, 1 Purd. Dig. p. 460, requires the husband to join in the deed. The Act of April 11, 1848, made no change in this respect.

Peck v. Ward, 18 Pa. 506; Thorndell v. Morrison, 25 Pa. 326; Glidden v. Strupler, 52 Pa. 400; Ulp v. Campbell, 19 Pa. 361; Richards v. McClelland, 29 Pa. 835; Buchanan v. Hazzard, 95 Pa. 240.

Mr. Justice Sterrett delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1842 Aaron Burns died seized of the lots in controversy, having first devised the same, inter alia, as follows: "I give and bequeath to my daughter Mary, intermarried with Joseph S. P. Harris, the house and lot," etc., describing the property; "and I hereby authorize and empower my said daughter Mary to sell and dispose of the same as she may think proper; but in case of her death and the property as aforesaid remaining unsold, then it is to be equally divided among her children, share and share alike as they may arrive at the age of twenty-one."

In 1860 the devisee Mrs. Harris died, leaving her husband and four children surviving her. In 1873 this action of ejectment was brought by three of the children and the husband who had acquired the interest of the fourth child then deceased. They contended that the property had not been sold or disposed of by Mrs. Harris in her lifetime; and hence, according to the terms of the will, the title in remainder was vested in her children.

The defendants, on the other hand, claiming under the deed of Mrs. Harris, of March 25, 1851, to Rev. James Stevens, contended that the lots in controversy were conveyed to him in fee for the consideration of $1,400; that this was done in execution of the power of sale contained in the will. In support of this position the deed was offered in evidence, but the court rejected it because the grantor's husband was not a party thereto; and thereupon a verdict was directed for plaintiffs.

If the deed had been received and full effect given to it as a conveyance, the defendants would have been clearly entitled to a verdict. It will thus be seen that the controlling question presented by the record is whether the deed of March 25, 1851, operated as a conveyance of the lots to Stevens, under whom defendants claim. The solution of that question depends upon the construction given to the devising clause above quoted.

It was contended by plaintiffs in error that Mrs. Harris took merely an estate for life, with power independently of her husband to sell or otherwise dispose of the devised property as she might think proper; and, in the event of her dying without having executed the power of sale, an indefeasible estate in remainder was given to her children; that the deed above mentioned was a good execution of the power, and therefore operated as a conveyance of the title in fee to her vendee, James Stevens.

An examination of the will has satisfied us that the construction thus contended for is correct and in harmony with the general scheme of the testator, as evidenced by other clauses of his will. Construing the devising clause in question according to the plain import of the language employed and in the light of other provisions of the will, we think the testator intended to give Mrs. Harris a life estate in the lots, with remainder in fee to her children, subject, however, to divestiture by the execution of the power of sale given in express terms to the life tenant.

The power thus given to Mrs. Harris by her father is a power to appoint, by way of sale or otherwise, to other uses than those specified in the will; and was therefore well executed by herself alone without her husband joining in the deed of conveyance to Stevens. Nothing is better settled than that a feme covert may, without the concurrence of her husband, execute any kind of power, whether given to her when single or married. 4 Kent, 324; Sugden, Powers, 148.

To require his concurrence might not only embarrass the depositoe of the power in its execution, but in case of his refusal to concur it would prevent its execution altogether and thus defeat the testator's intention. It is obvious from a consideration of the entire will in this case, that the intention of the testator was to exclude the husband from all interest in or control over the property to which the power of sale relates. Stevens, the vendee of Mrs. Harris, derived title to the lots in question, as part of the estate of Aaron Burns, under and by virtue of the power of sale, and not by virtue of any estate in Mrs. Harris herself. The only estate she had was for life; but the power of sale when executed, as it was by a regular deed of conveyance, vested in him the fee to the lots in controversy; and the plaintiffs in error, claiming under him should have been permitted to show their title.

Judgment reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

APPEAL OF Joseph McCULLOCH, Guardian, et al.

The Act of April 8, 1833, allowing after born children to take against the will, applies only to those physically born after the execution of the will, and does not apply to those legitimated after the making of the will.

Reported below in 2 Pa. C. C. R. 181.

Rufus C. Elder was appointed auditor to make distribution of the estate. Pending distribution, an issue was directed to decide whether Jennie P. Fetzter, born April 4, 1833, of the body of Mary A. Stetler, subsequently married to George Fetzter, was begotten by George Fetzter. The jury found in the affirmative.

The auditor found further that George Fetzter made his will August 7, 1833, and married Mary A. Stetler August 9, 1833. No provision was made in the will for Jennie P. Fetzter. She claimed before the auditor the right to take against the will as an after born child.

On this point the auditor reported:

"We now come to consider whether the two Acts of Assembly, viz.: May 14, 1857, and April 8, 1833, place this child in the position claimed by her counsel and give her any share of this estate. Does the Act of 1857 invest this child with the same rights which a child unborn at the time of the execution of its father's will would possess?

"The words of the Act are: 'shall thereby become legitimated and enjoy all the rights and privileges as if they had been born during the wedlock of their parents.'

"The contention for the child is that the words 'as if they had been born, etc.,' gives it the rights of a child born on the day of the wedding, after the ceremony, and as it happened in this case two days after the making of the will.

"This would amount to a legal reborning (if we may use the word) of the child, and would place her in a more favored position than any legitimate child born before actual execution of the will could attain. The spirit and intention of the Act of 1833, as the auditor takes it, is to provide for a child born after execution of a will and of whose existence the father was or might be ignorant at the time of making his will. The reason for it was the ignorance of the parent, of its existence. There is no possibility of the presence of such reason in this case. The child was born, the father knew and acknowledged her as his child and lived in the same house with the child from April 4, 1833, to August 7, 1833, or from her birth until the day he made his will, and indeed to the day of his death; and if he desired to provide for her had the full opportunity to do so.

"'As if born during, etc.,' in the Act are simply descriptive of the rights and privileges which the child would enjoy, and meant the fullest rights of a legitimate child.

"Legitimation on a certain day does not give the child the rights of a child born on that day. A legitimate child born before the execution of its father's will would not take under the intestate laws by virtue of the Act of 1833. This Act provides, 'shall make his last will and testament and afterwards shall marry or have a child or children not provided for in such will and die leaving a widow and child or either a widow or child or children, although such child or children be born after the death of their father, every such person, so far as shall regard the widow or child or children after born, shall be deemed and construed to die intestate, etc.'

"The words and meaning of this Act are perfectly plain. They provide for an after born child and the auditor cannot see how they could include an after legitimated one. In all cases where we have a judicial interpretation of this Act the necessity of the claimant being after born is distinctly set out.

"Had this child been born on August 8, the day after the will was made, and become legitimated by the marriage of her parents on August 9, then she would have been entitled to the benefits of the Act of 1833.

"This child was entitled to the right of inheritance on the marriage of her parents; but there was nothing to inherit, everything being disposed of by will at that time.

"Jennie P. Fetzer is not an after born child and is not entitled to anything out of this distribution."

Exceptions were filed which were sustained by the court.

The opinion of the court below, by Bucher, P. J., after stating the facts, was as follows:

"There are no decisions under the Act of 1857, known to us, which bear upon the question on hand; but the statute gives forth no uncertain sound. It seems to assume (and it is a fair inference) that a man afterwards marrying and cohabiting with a woman who has given birth to a bastard child was its father. In any event, the fact is not disputed that the testator was the father of the child and subsequently married the mother, and cohabited with her.

"The design and theory of this Act was to lift the unfortunate illegitimate out of the dust, and endow him with the quality and dignity of an heir. Until the marriage of his mother to his natural father he is the son of nobody, and sometimes called filius nullius, sometimes filius populi. He has had a physical birth, but is incapable of heirship. His blood is corrupt and he is denied the inheritance, is not the 'lawful heir,' and would not, as in the ancient apologue, have been slain that thieves could steal the inheritance. But the statute gives him a new birth, and he is an heir by the fiat of the law. There is no doubt that the legal birth is the time when heirship developed upon him. Any other construction would defeat his right as heir, and thus the statute fail of its purpose.

"The contention is that this Act of 1857 is retroactive and was intended to make the bastard legitimate from the date of its birth, as it is 'to enjoy all the rights and privileges as if it had been born during the wedlock of the parents;' that is, if the parents marry, the illegitimacy of the child is purged and it is to be considered as if it had always been legitimate. To give the Act this construction would involve the anomaly that the child was legitimate when its parents were unmarried.

"We shrink from such an interpretation of the Act. Even if the effect of the marriage of the parents was made retroactive, so as to legitimate from birth, still a court would hold, to prevent injustice, that the child was only born into the inheritance upon the marriage.

"Then is the case within the Wills Act. That statute says when any person shall make his last will and testament, and shall afterwards marry or have a child not provided for in such will and die, although such child be born after the death of the father (that is, if he has a child after making his will, even if it should be born after his death, as if to say no matter when born so it is born after making the will and unprovided for) as to such child the will is inoperative.

"The third proposition in Walker v. Hall, 34 Pa. 483, is stated thus: 'If a man makes his will and has an after born child or children not provided for in such will, and dies leaving such after born child or children, so far as regards such child or children he dies intestate and his will is revoked pro tanto.'

"The provision for the case of birth after the decease of the testator was to meet a child in ventre sa mere, so that although in esse when the will was made, still, if born after, the will falls as to it. McKnight v. Read, 1 Whart. 213.

"In Young's App. 39 Pa. 115, the child was born after making the will, and the day before the testatrix died, and the will was held revoked.

"In Grosvenor v. Fogg, 81 Pa. 401, one child was born a year before the death of the testator, another three years before, and a third six years prior, but all subsequent to the date of the will; and it was held that the will was revoked pro tanto as to them all. The auditor denied the claim of the child, upon the ground that the object of the Wills Act was to provide for a child of whose existence the father was ignorant when he made his will, and that the Act could only apply to a child physically born after the date of the will.

"It must be conceded that all the cases of which we have knowledge, decided under this Act, were cases in which the child was physically born after the date of the will. If the words 'after born' in the Act are to be confined to mean physical birth only, the child would be excluded. On the other hand if the child's legitimate existence is to date from the marriage of its parents and not from the day of its natural birth, the will must open so as to allow it to share in the inheritance. The object of the Act was to provide for a change of circumstances in the condition of the testator after he had made his will, which were unknown to him at the time of making it.

"Indeed, the common-law theory of the revocation of wills by the subsequent birth of issue is that the testator's circumstances have so altered that new duties have accrued to him subsequent to the date of the will, such as may be presumed to produce a change of intention. When such is the case it will amount to an implied revocation. This is based upon the idea that the testator must be supposed tacitly to have annexed a condition to his dispositions that the will shall stand, provided no such change happens in the relations of his duty as shall call for a different distribution. Coates v. Hughes, 3 Binn. 514.

"In the case on hand the testator knew of the physical existence of the claimant at the time he made his will, but at that time he owed it no duty other than that imposed upon him by the Bastardy Act found in the Penal Code. It was a stranger to his blood; but the marriage having been consummated after the date of the will, new duties developed upon him in relation to it. He was then not only under a natural and moral obligation to provide for it, but under a legal obligation as well, because it then became his child with the same force and effect as if it had been then born unto him.

"We think that the marriage produced such a change in the circumstances of the testator in relation to this child after the date of the will as to revoke it pro tanto. In this way alone can we give effect to the Act of 1857, which legitimates bastard children upon the marriage and cohabitation of their parents, and to the Wills Act of 1833, which declares that the will must open and let in a child which the testator has after the date of the will. This child acquired a legal birth after the date of the will and it would be contrary to all equity to debar it from the inheritable qualities which the law conferred upon it by virtue of this birth."

The matter was recommitted to the auditor who, in accordance with the opinion of the court, awarded a share of the estate to Jennie P. Fetzer. The appellants, legatees, took this appeal, the appellee being said Jennie P. Fetzer, by guardian.

The assignments of error specified the action of the court: 1, in sustaining the exceptions to the auditor's report; and 2, in decreeing that Jennie P. Fetzer is entitled to any portion of the fund in the hands of the administrator; in directing a new distribution and confirming the same.

Messrs. C. S. Marks, J. A. McKee and T. M. Uttley, for appellants:

All our rules in such cases are statutory, established by the Legislature by which the common law has been either repealed or altered, or enforced by positive legislative sanction, and therefore not open to the doctrine of implied presumption.

Walker v. Hall, 34 Pa. 489.

Whenever the court has construed the Act of April 8, 1833, physical birth of the child after the execution of the will is what constitutes the change of circumstances and works the revocation of the will as to the child.

Young's App. 39 Pa. 115; Walker v. Hall, 34 Pa. 498; McKnight v. Read, 1 Whart. 212.

Mr. Horace J. Culbertson, for appellees:

The Wills Act refers to the child or children a testator has after he makes his will, and it is immaterial how long he has known of their existence; provided such child or children are unprovided for in said will, said will as to such child or children is revoked pro tanto.

Act April 8, 1833; Walker v. Hall, 34 Pa. 498; McKnight v. Read, 1 Whart. 213; Young's App. 39 Pa. 115; Grosvenor v. Fogg, 81 Pa. 401.

The Act of May 14, 1857, intended to give an illegitimate child, legitimated by the marriage of its parents, all the rights and privileges of a legitimate child.

Big Black Creek Improvement Co. v. Commonwealth, 94 Pa. 455.

Mr. Justice Sterrett delivered the opinion of the court:

The single question presented by the specifications of error in this case is whether Jennie P. Fetzer, appellee's ward, should be considered an after born child of the testator within the meaning of the Act of April 8, 1833, § 15, which provides:

"When any person shall make his last will and testament, and afterwards shall marry or have a child or children not provided for in such will, and die leaving a widow and child, or either a widow or child or children, although such child or children be born after the death of their father, every such person, so far as shall regard the widow, or child or children afterborn, shall be deemed and construed to die intestate; and such widow, child or children, shall be entitled to such purparts, shares and dividends of the estate, real and personal, of the deceased as if he had actually died without any will." Purd. 1477, pl. 18.

The facts, definitely settled by the auditor's report and verdict of the jury are, that Jennie P. Fetzer, born in April, 1833, was the natural child of George Fetzer and Mary A. Stetler, who were afterwards lawfully married in August of same year. Two days before their marriage George Fetzer made his will, in which he bequeathed to Miss Stetler, mother of the child, $1,000 "for her kind treatment of him," and gave the residue of his estate, real and personal, to his son, grandchildren and sister, without making any provision for the child born as aforesaid, out of lawful wedlock.

Before the auditor, charged with distribution of testator's estate, it was contended that under the Act above quoted, in connection with the Act of May 14, 1857, the child in question must be regarded as an "after born" child and therefore entitled to a child's share of testator's real and personal estate. This contention was not sustained by the learned auditor; but the orphans' court, being of a different opinion, entered a decree in her favor. From that decree this appeal was taken by those claiming under the will, and thus arises the question above stated.

The learned auditor, as we think, rightly held that the Act of 1833, in providing for after-born children means a physical birth, and not a mere legislative legitimation, after making the will; that it was intended to provide for children, actually born after the execution of a will, and of whose existence their father is supposed to be ignorant at the time of making his will, and not to those previously born and then in full life.

This certainly accords with the plain, unambiguous wording of the Act, and we have no doubt as to its correctness. Nor do we think the Act of 1833, above quoted, has been, in this respect, qualified by the subsequent Act of 1857, which provides: "In any and every case where the father and mother of an illegitimate child or children shall enter into the bonds of lawful wedlock, and cohabit, such child or children shall thereby become legitimated and enjoy all the rights and privileges as if they had been born during the wedlock of their parents."

Upon no reasonable construction of this Act can it be held that appellee's ward was born after testator's will was executed. The conceded fact is, she was born four months before, and therefore in no proper sense of the term can she be regarded as an after born child within the purview of the Act. The reasoning of the learned auditor is so satisfactory and conclusive of the correctness of his position that it is deemed unnecessary to discuss the subject.

We think the learned court erred in not decreeing distribution of the fund in accordance with the first schedule of distribution reported by the auditor.

Decree reversed, at the costs of appellee; and it is now adjudged and decreed that the net balance, remaining after appropriations made to payment of debts and expenses of audit, viz.: $5,451.19 be distributed as follows, viz.:

To Mary A. Fetzer, widow	$1,817.06
Joseph McCulloch, Guardian of Ellen Fetzer, minor	$1,730.53

Joseph McCulloch, Guardian of Gertie Fetzler, minor, etc. $1,730.53
 Louisa Wollaver $173.07
By the court.

Mary E. LUCK, Exrx. of Jeremiah Luck, Deceased, Plff. in Err.,
v.

Israel Lincoln LUCK.

1. A father took possession of a messuage and tract of arable land, in 1873, under a devise to him and his ten years old son, as tenants in common, subject to the payment of certain legacies to other children of the testator "to equalize said property amongst his children." The son lived with his father until 1880, when he went away. The father paid the legacies and farmed the land until his death in 1884. The son, a few months after he came of age in 1885, brought an action of assumpsit against his father's executrix for a moiety in value of the crops, without offering to pay his share of the legacies. The court below refused to instruct the jury:
 (a) That there could be no recovery because the plaintiff had not paid his share of the legacies;
 (b) That the presumption was that the plaintiff had received his share of the profits;
 (c) And refused to allow a set-off for lime necessarily spread upon the land from 1874 to 1884.
2. On writ of error to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff, the court was divided as to whether the action would lie, which would have resulted in an affirmance of the judgment; but judgment reversed for refusal to allow set-off.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Snyder County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff in an action of assumpsit by one tenant in common against another for a moiety of the crops. Reversed.

Israel Luck died in 1873, having devised some forty-three acres of land, of which he devised, to his son Jeremiah Luck and his grandson Israel Lincoln Luck, son of Jeremiah Luck, "in common," "and in order to equalize said property amongst my said children, the said Jeremiah Luck and Israel Lincoln Luck, his son, shall pay on in manner following, to wit: to my daughter Margaret, $75 annually, commencing payments one year after my decease, without interest, until due, continuing said payments until the sum of $376.67 shall be paid; and my said son Jeremiah Luck and Israel Lincoln Luck, his son, shall pay unto my daughter Elizabeth $40 annually, also commencing paying out one year after my decease without interest until done, continuing said payments until he shall have paid her the sum of $156.67."

On April 1, 1874, Jeremiah Luck took possession of this land and at once commenced farming the same, which he continued to do until August, 1884, when he died. Jeremiah Luck paid the whole of the legacies. Israel Lincoln Luck, his son, was born in February, 1864, and consequently was ten years old on April 1, 1874, sixteen years old in August, 1880, and twenty-one years old in February, 1885. From 1874 to 1880 the son was an inmate of his father's family on this land. In

NOTE.—Rights and remedies of cotenants inter sese. Norris v. Gould, 15 W. N. C. 187, is a case very similar to the above. In it Thayer, P. J. of the Common Pleas of Philadelphia County, deduces the following principles from the authorities:

1. One tenant in common cannot maintain trespass for mesne profits against his cotenant, without proof of actual ouster or acts amounting to it.
2. Nor can he maintain assumpsit for mere use and occupation, except upon an express promise of his cotenant.
3. The Statute of 4 Anne, chap. 16, enabling a tenant in common to maintain account render against his cotenant "as bailiff for receiving more than comes to his just share and proportion, without proof that he had expressly constituted him his bailiff," applies only where one tenant in common receives the money or something else from another person to which both cotenants are entitled.
4. No action will lie, either in law or equity, for mere permissive occupation.

Henderson v. Eason, 9 Eng. L. & E. 387; 79 E. C. L. 701, cited by defendant in error in the above case, is authority for the third proposition and is accepted by Judge Thayer as the reasonable and just exposition of the Statute of Anne. The authorities cited by defendant in error from Massachusetts, Maine and other States may also be authority for the same position.

Poppe v. Harkins, 16 Ala. 321, seems to belong here too, as it was an action for rents actually received.

Decisions in California and Texas seem to support the last proposition, that no remedy exists either in law or equity for mere permissive occupation. Pico v. Columbet, 12 Cal. 414; Neil v. Shackelford, 46 Tex. 119.

See Brooks v. Howison (N. H.), 1 New Eng. Rep. 245, for elaborate collection of authorities and where the decisions from some twelve or more States appear to support Judge Thayer's view.

One of the latest English decisions is Leigh v. Dickeson, 24 Am. Law Reg. 499, where it is stated, PA.

although not the point decided: "Both [cotenants] may enjoy the property; but the one in possession, unless the other is ousted, is not liable for rent."

The case of Luck v. Luck, reported above, would seem to put the question in doubt in Pennsylvania, if it was not already. Judge Sharswood, in delivering the opinion in Kline v. Jacobs, 68 Pa. 67 (1871), states the law to be that unless there was an express contract to pay rent, there could be no recovery. The case was tried before Hare, P. J. of the Common Pleas of Philadelphia County and the learned editor of Smith's Leading Cases in Equity. In Kline v. Jacobs, however, there was an express contract. The dicta of Judge Sharswood, in Kline v. Jacobs, are in direct conflict with Borrell v. Borrell, 33 Pa. 492, which held that assumpsit would lie, upon proof that the whole of the profits was received by the defendant.

Borrell v. Borrell is not noticed in Kline v. Jacobs, although cited with approval by Judge Sharswood in 1872 in Allegheny Ins. Co. v. Ransom, 68 Pa. 600. Borrell v. Borrell was decided in 1868. The court was divided, Porter, J., delivering the opinion of the court, and Lowrie, C. J., and Woodward, J., concurring, and Thompson and Strong, JJ., dissenting.

In the recent case of Supple v. Yerkes, 1 Ches. Co. R. 401, 578 (1883) an action of assumpsit by one tenant in common against one of three others in possession, Futhey, P. J. of the Common Pleas of Chester County, held that the action would not lie, relying upon Kline v. Jacobs. The case was affirmed by the Supreme Court in a per curiam opinion, citing Kline v. Jacobs, but apparently deciding the case upon the ground, that "the ascertainment of the equities between the parties involved an investigation of their several rights which could not properly be determined in this form of action against one cotenant."

For Repairs. The case of Leigh v. Dickeson, supra, decides that one tenant in common is not entitled to recover in a common-law action, from his cotenant, contribution in respect of repairs done to 1880 he went to live with friends and strangers, earning his own living.

Jeremiah Luck made his last will and testament, in which he gave his entire estate to Mary E. Luck and his son, Ossie D. Luck, the only child by his second wife. He appointed Mary E. Luck sole executrix of his will.

The plaintiff Israel Lincoln Luck brought this action July 21, 1885.

The declaration contained common counts for goods sold and delivered; work and labor done; money lent and advanced, and paid, laid out and expended; money had and received and money due upon an account stated; and also the following special count:

"For that whereas, the said Jeremiah Luck in his lifetime, to wit: on the — day of August, A. D. 1884, at Penn Township, in the county aforesaid, was indebted to the plaintiff in $2,000, being the value of the crops and products, or aggregate annual value (due the plaintiff) of all that certain tract of land in said township and county which Israel Luck by his last will and testament devised to the said Jeremiah Luck, deceased, and the plaintiff—the said Jeremiah Luck, deceased, having kept and appropriated to himself in his lifetime, to wit: before August, 1884, all the crops, products and annual value of said tract of land, to wit: for about twelve years, the one moiety of which crops, etc., was and is due the plaintiff, which the defendant promised to pay to the plaintiff in the above suit." The defendant pleaded non assumpsit; non assumpsit infra sex annos; payment, payment with leave and set-off.

On the trial before Bucher, P. J., the plaintiff showed the title and occupancy of the land, the amount and value of the crops and the rule between landlord and tenant in cropping on shares.

the common property, although such repairs may have been reasonable and necessary. The decision is rested upon the principle that "If money is voluntarily expended by one in such circumstances that another is obliged to reap the advantage of it, his accepting what he is not at liberty to refuse is no evidence of adoption or ratification; and therefore the other must suffer for his generosity." To the same effect, see Converse v. Ferr, 11 Mass. 328; and Calvert v. Aldrich, 90 Mass. 74.

In Leigh v. Dickeson, the court refers to a common-law writ in Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium, and to Coke on Littleton, 200 b, where it is said: "If two tenants in common, or joint tenants, be of a house or mill and it fall in decay, and the one is willing to repair the same and the other will not, he that is willing shall have a writ de reparatione facienda, and the writ saith ad reparationem et sustentationem ejusdem teneatur, whereby it appeareth that owners are in that case bound pro bono publico to maintain houses and mills which are for habitation and use of men."

The court, in Leigh v. Dickeson, says: "On looking at it [the writ in Fitzherbert] I find that it assumes an obligation, on tenants in common to do repairs. * * * I cannot but think he [Coke] has mistaken the writ in Fitzherbert. If the sole owner of a house is not under any obligation to repair, I cannot see how joint owners are."

In Pennsylvania it is generally conceded that an action would lie, on the authority of the above quotation from Coke, although the point is not necessarily involved in the decision. See Deck's App. 57 Pa. 497; Beaty v. Bordwell, 91 Pa. 488; Crest v. Jack, 3 Watts, 238; Kelsey's App. 4 Cent. Rep. 99.

Leigh v. Dickeson holds, however, that an allowance for improvements can be recovered, when the cotenancy is terminated by partition proceedings, in chancery. The money derived from the sale is increased by the improvements, or, if there is a division of the property, in specie, the property to be divided is increased. "It may be that it is considered that what has been done is adopted by taking the

The defendant was allowed to set off the plaintiff's share of the legacies above mentioned, and the taxes and other expenses incurred by Jeremiah Luck.

The court rejected the following offer of evidence:

"Defendant's counsel proposed to prove by this witness that he in a proper manner limed this land to keep it in proper condition, from the time these parties moved on this property, April, 1874, down to the time of his death; and that it was necessary to put the lime on that was put on by Jeremiah Luck. This for the purpose of showing a reduction of the plaintiff's claim."

Plaintiff's counsel objects to this evidence; first, unless it be shown that the lime was put upon this land within six years prior to the bringing of this action; second, that as between tenants in common of arable land, no recovery can be had for improvements put upon the common property of the tenants in common. Also objects that this evidence is incompetent unless it is first shown that the lime, which it is proposed to be proved was put on here, was necessary.

By the court: We sustain the objection on the authority of Beaty v. Bordwell, 91 Pa. 440, and reject the evidence. To which the defendant excepts and bill sealed. Twelfth assignment of error.

Defendant requested the court to charge, inter alia, as follows:

That unless the jury believe from the evidence in the cause that there was an express contract or agreement on the part of Jeremiah Luck to pay Israel Lincoln Luck rent for the use and occupancy of the land, or to give him a part or portion of the grain and other produce raised on the land, then the plaintiff is not en-improved value or the improved state of the property in severalty." The court also says that no case has been found (in the English reports) where one co-owner has been made to pay, except in case of a partition suit.

In Pennsylvania, in equitable partition, a tenant in common is entitled to improvements made by him which are reasonably necessary for the proper enjoyment of the land, and not injurious to the estate of the other cotenants. Kelsey's App. 4 Cent. Rep. 99. The court says: "It may be conceded that there may be cases of partition in which the improvements should be held to inure to the benefit of all the cotenants. It is well intimated that such might be the case where one cotenant undertakes to improve the whole estate, as by erecting a building covering the whole of a city lot." The improvements allowed in that case were a dwelling house costing some $19,000, on a coal bearing tract of forty-three acres in the City of Scranton, also coal breaker, office and blacksmith shop. The same rule is held in equitable partition in many other States. See report of master in Kelsey's App. supra.

As a legislative interpretation that the common-law remedy is inadequate, the Pennsylvania Act of April 25, 1880, may be mentioned. Section 24 provides: "In all cases in which any coal or iron ore mines have been or shall be held by two or more persons, or tenants in common, and coal, iron ore or minerals have been or shall be taken from the same, by any one or more of said tenants respectively, it shall be lawful for any one of said tenants in common to apply, by bill or petition in equity, praying that an account may be taken, etc." See also the Act of April 22, 1886.

See on the subject generally, Pickering v. Pickering (N. H.) 2 New Eng. Rep. 248; Cooter v. Dearborn (Ill.) 2 West. Rep. 399; Foltz v. Wert (Ind.) 1 West. Rep. 856; Long v. McDow (Mo.), 2 West. Rep. 130; Tuers v. Tuers (N. Y.) 1 Cent. Rep. 284; McKinley v. Peters (Pa.) 1 Cent. Rep. 908; Fell v. Bennett (Pa.) 1 Cent. Rep. 409. [J. M.]

titled to recover. Refused. First, second and third assignments of error.

If the jury believe from the evidence in the cause that Jeremiah Luck in his lifetime paid Elizabeth Maurer the sum of $156.67, and Margaret Luck the sum of $376.67, for the land devised to Jeremiah Luck and Israel Lincoln Luck by the last will and testament of Israel Luck, deceased, which sums of money by said will were to be paid by Jeremiah Luck and Israel Lincoln Luck jointly, and that Israel Lincoln Luck never paid or offered to pay Jeremiah Luck, nor said legatees, the one half of said sums of money, then the plaintiff cannot recover in this suit. Refused. Fifth assignment of error.

That if Jeremiah Luck and Israel Lincoln Luck went jointly into the possession of the land devised to them by the will of Israel Luck, deceased, in April, 1874, and continued in the joint possession until August, 1880, and farmed it, then the presumption is that each one received his share of the rents, issues and profits during that period of time.

Answer. The law is as stated in this point, if the jury find the fact to be that Jeremiah Luck and the plaintiff too farmed the land; but you must not so find in the absence of evidence. The uncontradicted evidence is, if you believe it, that the lands were farmed by Jeremiah Luck alone: that the plaintiff was in his minority, and lived on the land as an inmate of his father's family, and not as a cofarmer with him of the land. In such case, the plaintiff being between ten and sixteen years of age, the presumption would rather be that the father did not hand over to him his share, by reason of his incapacity to properly take care of it. Sixth assignment of error.

The court charged the jury, inter alia, as follows:

"[The declaration is not for use and occupation. If it had been, the contention of the defendant that the action would not lie upon mere proof of the occupation, although the possession was permissive on the part of the plaintiff, would be sound. In such case the action would not lie in the absence of a proof of an express promise on the part of Jeremiah Luck, the cotenant, to pay. Such an express promise has not been shown. But such is not the case before us. The plaintiff is seeking to recover the crops which grew upon the lands held in common, which his cotenant in his lifetime received in excess of his share.]

"The supreme court decided in Gillis v. McKinney, 6 Watts & S. 78, that assumpsit may be maintained by one tenant in common against his cotenant, to recover a share of the rent, upon proof that the whole was received by the defendant. It is true in this case there was an express promise on the part of the defendant to pay, but the court says that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain assumpsit, upon proof that the defendant had taken all the proceeds of the land and sold it.

"This was followed by Borrell's Admr. v. Borrell, 33 Pa. 492, in which it was distinctly held that one tenant in common could maintain assumpsit against his cotenant to recover a share of the profits, upon proof that the whole was received by the defendant. In such case the law raises an implied promise to pay over the plaintiff's share.

It is insisted that these cases have been overthrown by the decisions in Kline v. Jacobs, 68 Pa. 57, and Norris v. Gould, 15 W. N. C. 188; but we do not think so. In the former the action was for use and occupation, and the court held that the tenant in common could not recover against his fellow for the use and occupation of the common property without proof of an express contract to pay rent. An action for use and occupation depends not upon privity of estate, but upon privity of contract.

"The court does not notice the cases of Borrell's Admr. v. Borrell and Gillis v. McKinney, just referred to, and we do not feel at liberty to regard them as overruled. We best discharge our duty by leaving the responsibility of doing that to the supreme court. We are mindful that Mr. Justice Thayer, in Norris v. Gould, holds that they are overruled by Kline v. Jacobs; but he does not say that the supreme court has plainly declared that such was its intention. While we concede his great ability as a judge, yet we decline to follow his ruling, on account of the serious consequences that would ensue if his views of the law be correct. He there holds that, in a case like the one on hand, where one cotenant passively permits his fellow to have the exclusive possession of the lands held in common and to receive all the rents, issues and profits, he cannot recover, in the absence of an express promise to pay, either by action of assumpsit, or account render under the Statute of 4 Anne, chap. 16, or by bill in equity, or in any other way whatsoever. It is a maxim of the law that it affords a remedy for every wrong. We therefore prefer the doctrine enunciated by the supreme court in the cases which are claimed to be overthrown, and hold that they are still the law and that assumpsit will lie. This remedy is far preferable to the now almost obsolete action of account render, and superior to any that can be invoked, unless it be by bill in equity. [In assumpsit a jury can settle all the equities between the parties and do ample and complete justice. We therefore charge you that this action can be maintained and that the plaintiff cannot be defeated, upon the ground that he has misconceived his action, if you find from the evidence that the plaintiff was the cotenant with Jeremiah Luck, of the land upon which the crops in dispute grew, and that he received more than his share.]

"In such case the plaintiff can recover whatever the defendant received over and beyond his share. It is undeniable that the will of Jeremiah Luck, deceased, given in evidence by the plaintiff, constitutes him a cotenant with Jeremiah Luck, of the lands therein devised to them as tenants in common. [The contention of the plaintiff is that Jeremiah Luck entered upon these lands devised to them as tenants in common in April, 1874, and farmed the same and raised crops thereon until his death, in August, 1884, and that during this entire period of about ten years he appropriated to his own use all the crops, and plaintiff received none of them. How this is will be for you to find from the evidence.]

"The plaintiff called a number of witnesses to testify to the fact that Jeremiah Luck thus farmed the land; and the evidence fails to show that he paid or delivered any portion of the proceeds to the plaintiff. In other words, the contention of the plaintiff is that the evidence will justify you in finding that Jeremiah Luck received all the crops himself, to the exclusion of the defendant. If you find this to be so you will have to ascertain how much this excess is, and that will be your verdict for the plaintiff.] If, however, you find such is not the fact you will find for the defendant.

In determining the amount of the excess, the jury will have to determine the amount of the crops raised, and from this you will have to deduct the cost and expense of growing the crops, as well as the ordinary necessary repairs put upon the land by Jeremiah Luck; also the taxes paid by him as well as the payments made by him to certain legatees named in the will of Jeremiah Luck, deceased, which the plaintiff and Jeremiah Luck were required to pay."

Verdict for plaintiff for $1,058.85, and judgment thereon. The defendant thereupon took this writ.

The assignments of error were the rejection of the above evidence, the refusal of the above points, and the portions of the charge enclosed in brackets.

Mr. Charles Hower, for plaintiff in error:

"Neither at common law nor under any statute can assumpsit for use and occupation be maintained upon the mere occupation, although it might be shown to be permissive. Each tenant has an equal right to the possession of the whole; and without an express contract to pay rent, account is the only remedy under the Statute of Anne."

Sharswood, J., in Kline v. Jacobs, 68 Pa. 59.

Neither trespass nor assumpsit will lie for mere permissive occupation.

Norris v. Gould, 15 W. N. C. 187; Chambers v. Chambers, 14 Am. Dec. 587, and notes on pages 586, 587; Griffith v. Willing, 3 Binn. 817; Steffen v. Hartzell, 5 Whart. 450; Irvine v. Hankin, 10 Serg. & R. 219; Anderson v. Greble, 1 Ashm. 186.

An action to recover a share of the products of the land must be for the use and occupancy of the land. Proof of the crops raised and the value of them is only evidence to show what the occupancy was worth.

It is true that one tenant in common cannot put new and valuable improvements upon the common property and make his cotenant pay his share of them, for by doing this he might improve his cotenant out of his property. But this is not the rule as to ordinary and necessary repairs, so as to keep the property in a tenantable condition. Liming land of this kind is absolutely necessary in order to keep it in a condition proper for agricultural purposes.

Anderson v. Greble, 1 Ashm. 186; Decl's App. 57 Pa. 472.

Before the plaintiff can claim or recover the products, he must show that he paid or offered to pay Jeremiah Luck the one half of the legacies.

Gregg v. Patterson, 9 Watts & S. 197.

Mr. Chas. P. Ulrich, for defendant in error:

At common law one tenant in common could maintain an action of account against his co-tenant, only where he had expressly constituted him his bailiff of his part. The Statute of 4 Anne, chap. 16, § 27 (Roberts, Dig. 48), allows the action of account render without proof of an express contract. Of course account was the only remedy expressly given under the Statute of Anne, which allows the action against the cotenant "as bailiff for receiving more than comes to his just share or proportion," and these words were held to apply only where he has received more than his just share from others; as, for instance, if one tenant in common should rent the common property to a third party and receive all the rent.

Henderson v. Eason, 9 Eng. L. & E. 337.

This court has decided that assumpsit does lie, under facts exactly similar to those in this case.

Gillis v. McKinney, 6 Watts & S. 78; Borrell's Admr. v. Borrell, 38 Pa. 492; Wright v. Cumpsty, 41 Pa. 112.

In Brigham v. Ezeleth, 9 Mass. 538, it is held, where two were joint owners of a machine and one used it for a considerable period, that assumpsit lay for its use.

In Jones v. Harrison, 9 Mass. 540 (in note), where one part owner in possession of a ship made a profit by it, held, that the other could recover his part in assumpsit.

In Fanning v. Chadwick, 8 Pick. 420, the part owner of a ship was permitted to recover for a share of the profits made while it was in the occupancy of the other part owner.

Again; in 9 Pick. 84, it is decided that if one tenant in common of a wood cut off and sell a portion, his cotenant can maintain assumpsit for money had and received. See also Gardiner Mfg. Co. v. Heald, 5 Greenl. 381.

Assumpsit by one cotenant against another, to recover his share of the rents and profits received by the latter, has been sustained in several of the other States on the grounds: 1, that whenever account can be maintained indebitatus assumpsit may also; and 2, that the Statute of Anne, supra, being remedial, ought to receive a liberal construction.

Moses v. Ross, 41 Maine, 360; Miller v. Miller, 7 Pick. 136; Munroe v. Luke, 1 Met. 464; Shepherd v. Richards, 2 Gray, 424; Dickinson v. Williams, 11 Cush. 260; Buck v. Spofford, 40 Maine, 828; Gouen v. Shaw, 40 Maine, 58; Dyer v. Wilbur, 48 Maine, 287; Piquet v. Allison, 12 Mich. 829.

In Brolasky v. Ferguson, 48 Pa. 435, this court defines the conditions which must exist, to sustain the action for "use and occupation." Strong, J., says an express contract to pay for the use of the land must be shown, or the law must presume a promise to pay a reasonable rent where the occupancy has been by the permission and knowledge of the plaintiff. Applying these principles to tenants in common it is plain that the action for "use and occupation" can never be maintained against a cotenant, unless an express contract is shown, for none can be presumed from the mere occupation, for the occupancy is not permissive but of right, by reason of his estate.

This suit was not brought to recover rent. The crops having grown out of the land are independent of it; and Jeremiah Luck having received all and having converted the same to his use he is liable for money had and received. We are asking for that which he received belonging to us, and which is ascertained, fixed and independent of the land.

Kline v. Jacobs, 68 Pa. 57, is distinguished by all that we have said on this subject. Again; the question now raised was not a point in that case, but the errors assigned were on the admissibility of testimony. Much that was said was only incidental. But all that was said on this question was that "Assumpsit for use and occupation" cannot be "maintained upon the mere occupation."

Norris v. Gould, 15 W. N. C. 187, C. P. of Phila. No. 4, as an authority is not binding here. It adheres to that narrow construction of the Statute of Anne, outlined by us above, which fritters away the Statute, so as to confer but little, if any, benefit in ordinary cases.

At the time Jeremiah Luck paid these legacies he was indebted to his son, Israel Lincoln Luck, by reason of the crops which he received, in excess of his share, from the common property. Even assuming that the rule is applicable here, which requires a purchaser under articles to pay or tender the purchase money before bringing ejectment, yet the fact stated above would be sufficient to dispense with such rule.

Smith v. Lessee of Patton, 1 Serg. & R. 84.

This was not an action of ejectment, and the title was complete under the will. This distinguishes the case from Gregg v. Patterson, 9 Watts & S. 209.

Where one tenant in common pays in relief of a common burden, contribution may be enforced from the other; all of which was accomplished in this suit.

Weaver v. Wible, 25 Pa. 272.

Analogous to this is the rule laid down as to improvements by one tenant in common.

Crest v. Jack, 3 Watts, 289.

"A tenant in common is liable to his cotenant for repairs that are absolutely necessary to houses and mills already erected and in being, which fall into decay; but the rule does not extend to wood land nor to arable land."

Mercur, O. J., in Beatty v. Bordwell, 91 Pa. 441. See also Crest v. Jack, 3 Watts, 289; Gregg v. Patterson, 9 Watts & S. 209.

"In this case, added to the equal source of knowledge, there is the further element of legal incapacity, a knowledge of which is always imputed, and in this case an admitted fact, which takes away all claims to equity."

Gliddon v. Strupler, 52 Pa. 405.

Mr. Justice Paxson delivered the opinion of the court:

This was not an action of assumpsit by one tenant in common against his cotenant, to recover the value of the crops raised by the latter upon the common property; in other words, for the use and occupation of the land. I am of opinion that the action will not lie, under the facts of this case; in which opinion two of my colleagues concur. Three of them, however, are of a contrary opinion, and as our brother Trunkey did not hear the case we are unable to pass upon the first three assignments of error.

We all agree, however, in reversing the case upon the twelfth assignment. The defendant's counsel offered to show the amount of lime the defendant had put upon the land, and that it was necessary to put it on in order to raise the crops. The learned judge excluded this evidence upon the authority of Beatty v. Bordwell, 91 Pa. 440.

This was error. That case does not rule this.

This action was assumpsit for the value of the crops. The most that the plaintiff could recover would be the value of the crops after a proper allowance for expenses. The lime or other fertilizer, put upon the land for the purpose of growing the crops, was as much a part of the expenses as was the labor of planting or harvesting it. This is too plain to need elaboration. We notice nothing in the remaining assignments which requires discussion.

Judgment reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

PENNSYLVANIA COAL COMPANY,
Plff. in Err.,

J. Gardner SANDERSON and Wife, in Right of the Wife.

1. Everyone has the right to the natural use and enjoyment of his own property, and if, while lawfully engaged in such use and enjoyment, without negligence or malice, unavoidable loss occurs to a neighbor, it is damnum absque injuria.

2. The maxim Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas does not apply to landed property where the injury is caused by acts necessary for the natural use of the land.

3. The right to mine coal is a right incident to the ownership of coal property, and when exercised in the ordinary manner and with due care, the owner can not be held liable in damages to a riparian owner for permitting the natural flow of mine water over his own land, into the water course, by means of which the water supply of a riparian owner is affected in quality or quantity, the mine owner introducing nothing into the water to corrupt it, the impurities being from natural and not artificial causes, and the result being a mere personal injury and not affecting the general health and well being of the community.

4. The working of lower strata of coal by shaft, according to the present practice of mining, and the discharge of water in the shaft by the artificial means of pumping, would seem to be necessary for the natural use of the coal lands.

5. Where the cause of action is the pollution of a water course by water from a coal mine, and where the injury was caused by a combination of mine water which flowed naturally from the mines, which was damnum absque injuria, and water pumped from the mines, if as to the latter there would be a liability for injury inflicted, where the injury is estimated without distinguishing between these sources, the judgment will be reversed.

6. Cases reviewed, discussed and distinguished, and the case of Pa. Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 86 Pa. 401, overruled.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, to review a judgment for plaintiffs in an action on the case. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

The second and eleventh specifications of error were as follows:

Second. The court erred in rejecting the following offer of defendant. Counsel for defendant offer to prove by the witness on the stand and other persons having experience in the mining of anthracite coal: 1, that the mining of coal at Gipsy Grove Mine was conducted in a prudent and careful manner, and in the mode in general practice in all similar mines in the anthracite region; 2, that the coal is mined at the said breaker in the only mode feasible or possible; 3, that it is indispensably necessary to the mining of coal at said work to free the mine from water by pumping; 4, that the water pumped from said mine naturally flows into Meadow Brook and cannot be disposed of in any other way; 5, that the mine is properly located.

Eleventh. The court erred in the answer to defendant's first point, which point is as follows: 1. "If the jury believe from the evidence that it was impossible for the defendant to mine the coal on its lands along this stream without discharging the mine water from its mines, and the mining was done without malice or negligence; and that no foreign substance was introduced into the water by the defendant; and that when the mine water was so discharged it followed the law of gravity as directed by the natural conformation of the land and flowed by a natural flow into this stream and thence through the plaintiffs' property; then, even if thereby the plaintiffs were damaged, it is damnum absque injuria, and plaintiffs cannot recover."

Answer of the court: My answer to this is: this the law herein stated is ruled by the several decisions of the supreme court made in this case; and in accordance with the decision of that court, this instruction to you must be refused.

Messrs. J. M. & W. P. Gest, Henry W. Palmer, Willard & Warren, Henry M. Hoyt and Andrew T. McClintock, for plaintiff in error:

The question involved here is one of new impression in this State and, notwithstanding previous decisions of the court in this case, is still open to discussion.

Judge Woodward, in his opinion reported in 86 Pa. 401, after laying down the general rule: "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas," admits that, from necessity, the rule is sometimes relaxed; and cites in illustration, Acton v. Blundell, 12 M. & W. 324, where the owner of land, in mining in the usual way, drains the springs which supply his neighbor's well; followed in Halckman v. Bruckhart, 45 Pa. 514, and Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 528.

In mentioning Smith v. Kenrick, 7 C. B. (M. G. & S.), 515, as establishing another exception, he expresses the opinion that "as a precedent it will probably prove of doubtful value." On the contrary, it was applied by Agnew, J., before whom this present case has been argued, and approved with the remark, by way of caution, that the rule there laid down does not apply to a case where the upper mine owner has been guilty of malice or negligence, which no one pretended it did.

Locust Mountain C. & I. Co. v. Gorrell, 9 Phila. 247.

In England, Smith v. Kenrick has been ever since recognized as authority.

Bramwell, B., in Smith v. Fletcher, L. R. 7 Exch. 805, said that he fully agreed with the case. See also Baird v. Williamson, 15 C. B. N. S. 890, and Jegon v. Vician, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 742.

This point is important, as the principle of Smith v. Kenrick, as we show in our argument, is strongly in our favor.

The learned judge then argues from the principle that if a man brings or uses a thing of a dangerous nature on his own land, he must keep it at his peril and is liable for the consequences if it escapes and does injury to another; a doctrine which had its origin in the old common-law rule which required a man, at his peril, to keep his beasts from trespassing on his neighbor's land.

But this doctrine has no application to this case, where: 1, the water was naturally there; 2, it was naturally and unavoidably discharged from our mine; and 3, unavoidably, by the law of gravitation, flowed down the natural water course which necessarily drained that part of the country.

See the remarks of Beasley, C. J., in Marshall v. Welwood, 38 N. J. L. 339.

Judge Woodward states as the language of Denman, C. J., in Mason v. Hill, 5 Barn. & Adol. 1, what was only a statement of the proposition for which the plaintiff contended. That case has no application here.

Wood v. Sutcliffe, 16 Jur. 75, is a very different case, namely: the pollution of a stream with dye stuff, indigo and potash discharged from the defendant's manufactory. Judge Woodward was under the belief that the injunction was granted in that case, and so states as a fact. This is a mistake; Vice Chancellor Kindersley refused to grant an injunction; and one of his reasons was that by so doing "I should inflict serious damage upon the defendant without doing any practical good to the plaintiffs." 8 C. 2 Sim. Ch. 163.

Pennington v. Brinsop Hall Coal Co. 46 L. J. Ch. 773; 8 C. 37 L. T. N. S. 149, and 25 Week. Rep. 874; and in all these reports, and in the carefully prepared syllabi, not a vestige can be found of the doctrine which Judge Woodward has built upon in this case. The most careful report of the argument is found in 25 Week. Rep. 874.

Judge Woodward stated the case very unfairly to us when he said that "While the plaintiff's claim (in Pennington v. Brinsop Hall Coal Co.) involved the assertion of a prescriptive right, it was discussed mainly in view of the position of the plaintiff as subriparian owner by the justice who granted the injunction." It was not so discussed. The question was not discussed at all. It was not even hinted at by counsel or court.

The Little Schuylkill Nav. R. R. & Coal Co. v. Richards Admr. 57 Pa. 142, was a case of deposit of dirt in the bed of a stream.

Damages resulting to another from the natural and lawful use of his land by the owner thereof are, in the absence of malice, damnum absque injuria.

When the maxim Sic utere tuo ut alienum non ledas is applied to landed property, the plaintiff must show, not only that he has sustained damage but that the defendant has caused it, by going beyond what is necessary in order to enable him to have the natural use of his own land.

The obvious reason of the decision in Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. Eng. & Irish Apps. 339; S. C. 3 Hurl. & Colt. 774; and L. R. 1 Exch. 265, was that the defendant had collected in his reservoir a mass of water which was not naturally there. See also Pigott, Torts, London, 1885, for comment on this case.

One who does an act lawful in itself, from which damage results to another, is not answerable for such damage unless he has been guilty of negligence or other fault in the manner of doing the act.

Loose v. Buchanan, 51 N. Y. 476.

In this case Fletcher v. Rylands was cited and stated by the court to be in direct conflict with the law as settled in this country.

In Garland v. Towne, 55 N. H. 57, Ladd, J., said he was not aware that any court in this country had gone so far.

See also Marshall v. Welwood, 88 N. J. Law, 339.

In Phelps v. Nowlen, 72 N. Y. 89, it is ruled that the maxim, Sic utere tuo, etc., does not apply at all to an act lawful in itself, even where the act complained of was done with the express intention to injure the plaintiff.

See also Pizley v. Clark, 32 Barb. 268.

But the doctrine of Fletcher v. Rylands has been restricted by subsequent decisions in England to such an extent as to show that even there it is considered unsafe as a general rule of liability.

In Nichols v. Marsland, L. R. 10 Exch. 255, S. C. L. R. 2 Exch. Div. 1, it was held that it did not apply to the case of an escape of water stored in reservoirs in consequence of extraordinary flood.

Boz v. Jubb, 27 Week. Rep. 415, went a step further in extending the defense of vis major or the act of God, to a case where the damage was caused by a third party, over whom defendants had no control, releasing water from defendants' reservoir and thus overflowing the plaintiff's land.

Ross v. Fedden, L. R. 7 Q. B. 661, held that the tenant of an upper floor of a building is not liable, in the absence of negligence, for damages caused by water escaping from the plumbing to the lower floor.

The same point arose in Pennsylvania in Warren v. Kauffman, 2 Phila. 259, and the court ruled that while negligence was prima facie made out, yet the defendant was not responsible if he could show that the damage was not caused by his negligence.

Madras R. Co. v. Zemindar of Carvatenagarum, L. R. 1 Ind. App. 364, was a case illustrating the influence of usage and custom upon the ordinary rules of law. The suit was to recover damages for injuries occasioned to the plaintiff's railroad by the bursting of two tanks or reservoirs upon the defendant's land.

In Smith v. Kenrick, 7 C. B. (M. G. & S.) 515, 564, the defendant was the owner of a colliery on a higher level than that of the plaintiff. Upon the removal of certain coal by the defendant, from his own mine, the lower mine became exposed to the accumulations of water in the defendant's mine which flowed down into that of the plaintiff.

In Fletcher v. Smith, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 781; Smith v. Fletcher, L. R. 7 Exch. 805; L. R. 9 Exch. 64, it was decided by the House of Lords that "A mine owner will not be liable to the owner of an adjacent mine for injury occasioned to such adjacent mine, where such injury proceeds from natural causes, in themselves beyond his control, although his own acts may have conduced to produce the injury, if his acts have only been those of the proper and ordinary working of his own mine, without default or negligence."

In Wilson v. Waddell, L. R. 2 App. Cases, 95, it was held that the right to work mines was a right of property, which being properly exercised begot no responsibility; and therefore, when the ordinary working of a mine caused a subsidence of the surface land, a consequent flow of rain water into a lower coal field gave no right of action, as the injuries complained of arose entirely from gravitation and percolation.

In Baird v. Williamson, 15 C. B. N. S. 376, 4 Morrison Mining Cases, 368, it was held that "The owners of the higher mine have a right to work the whole mine in the usual and proper manner, for the purpose of getting out any kind of mineral in any part of that mine; and they are not liable for any water that flows by gravitation into an adjoining mine from works so constructed. We think the law was correctly laid down to that effect in Smith v. Kenrick."

In West Cumberland Iron & Steel Co. v. Kenyon, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 77, S. C. L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 788, the defendant maintained, as we do here, that he had done certain things on his own land which he had a lawful right to do. He sunk a shaft on his own land and, finding that it was getting filled with water, made a drain from the bottom of the shaft to some hollows on his own land, from which the water found its way into the plaintiff's land in exactly the same place, and in exactly the same way, and to exactly the same extent as it would have done if the defendant had not done what he did. The court of appeals sustained this view of the case, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 786.

The only case in which the contrary doctrine has been even suggested is the New Boston Coal & M. Co. v. Potomac Water Co. 54 Pa. 164, in which the water company sought to enjoin the coal company from pumping its mine water into the stream. The court refused the injunction, although without expressing an opinion on the present question.

Kauffman v. Griesemer, and Martin v. Riddle, 26 Pa. 407 and 415, decided that the owner of the superior heritage may improve his lands by agricultural or mining operations, although thereby the quantity of water discharged upon the inferior owner is changed. This is said to occur when necessary for carrying on agricultural and mining operations. By a parity of reasoning the same rule should include a necessary alteration in the quality of the water.

Kauffman v. Griesemer was adopted in the precisely similar case of Hughes v. Anderson, 68 Ala. 280, Stone, J., remarking: "The rough outline of natural right or natural liberty must submit to the chisel of the mason, that it enter symmetrically into the social structure."

Judge Agnew, in Locust Mountain Coal & I. Co. v. Gorrell, 9 Phila. 247, followed and approved the rule as stated in Smith v. Kenrick, 7 C. B. (M. G. & S.) 564, cited above, that it would seem to be the natural right of each of the owners of two adjoining coal mines to work his own in the manner most convenient and beneficial to himself, although the natural consequence may be that some prejudice will accrue to the owner of the adjoining mine, so long as that does not arise from the negligent or malicious conduct of the party.

In Howell v. McCoy, 3 Rawle, 256; Wheatley v. Chrisman, 24 Pa. 298, and McCallum v. Germantown Water Company, 54 Pa. 40, the water had been fouled by the admixture of dye stuffs or some other injurious substance.

"The right of land owners to deal with surface water and all water mixed with the soil, or coming from underground springs, in any manner they may deem necessary for the improvement or better enjoyment of their own land is most unquestionable. And if by so doing, in good faith and with no purpose of abridging or interfering with any of their neighbors' rights, they necessarily do damage to their neighbors' land, it must be regarded as no infringement of the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, but must be held damnum absque injuria."

Judge Redfield, in note to Swett v. Cutts, 11 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 24.

What constitutes a reasonable use of the water course, under the necessities of the case?

"Everything must be looked at from a reasonable point of view; therefore, the law does not regard trifling and small inconveniences, but only regards essential inconveniences." Locality and all other circumstances must be taken into consideration, and in counties where great works have been carried on, parties must not stand on extreme rights.

St. Helen's Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 11 H. L. Cas. 642; Snow v. Parsons, 28 Vt. 462.

The question how much and what shall constitute a legal wrong must necessarily, it seems to us, be a question of what, under the circumstances, is a reasonable use.

Cooley, Torts, 588.

The rule of "reasonable use" is also applied to the case of cities which are compelled to use streams as outlets for their sewers.

Merrifield v. Worcester, 110 Mass. 216; S. C. 14 Am. Rep. 592.

In Gibson v. Puchta, 33 Cal. 303, the defendant inundated his own land for the purpose of irrigation. The water percolated through a tunnel in the plaintiff's mine and prevented it from being worked.

In Colorado the right of appropriation of water for the purposes of irrigation is stated in Schilling v. Rominger, 4 Colo. 100, to be not only given by statute, "but, in a country like Colorado, to arise ex necessitate rei." See also Funk v. Nichols, 1 Colo. 551.

In Pennsylvania, in Hetrich v. Deachler, 6 Pa. 32, it was held that "The reasonableness of the detention of water by the riparian owner above, to the damage of the riparian owner below, depending as it must on the nature and size of the stream, as well as the business to which it is subservient, and on the ever varying circumstances of each particular case, must necessarily be determined by the jury and not by the court."

To the same effect is Hartzell v. Sill, 12 Pa. 248.

In St. Helen's Co. v. Tipping there were two questions submitted to the jury: first, whether the business there carried on was an ordinary business for smelting copper, and whether it was carried on in a proper place. The judges held that the directions are such as we have given in these cases for the last twenty years.

These were practically the instructions given in Hole v. Barlow, 4 C. B. N. S. 334, except that the location there was required to be convenient and proper.

The later case of Bamford v. Turnley, 3 B. & S. 62, showed that this test of mere convenience was misleading; but in holding that the locality was not to be considered, this case went too far, and when relied on in the argument of St. Helen's Co. v. Tipping, its doctrine was not adopted.

In Huckenstine's App. 70 Pa. 102, the court refused to enjoin the burning of bricks because it was essential to brick making, which the court regarded as a useful and necessary business, and necessarily exercised near towns.

In Carlyon v. Lovering, 1 H. & N. 784, a custom to discharge into a stream the waste product of mines was maintained.

In Rogers v. Brenton, 10 Q. B. 26, the court recognized the validity of a custom to take up tin mines.

In Morton v. Solambo Co. 26 Cal. 527, it was held that where any local mining customs exist, controversies affecting a mining right must be solved and determined by the customs and usages of the bar or diggings embracing the claim to which such right is asserted or denied, whether such customs and usages are written or unwritten.

In another case the local custom of the diggings required every man to work his claim two days in every ten, from May to November. Failure to do so worked a forfeiture of the claim.

Mr. Justice Field in Atchison v. Peterson, 20 Wall. 507 (87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 114).

In Snow v. Parsons, 28 Vt. 459, the reasonableness of the use of a stream by the upper riparian owner was held to be a question of fact, to determine which testimony showing the uniform usage of the country was admissible.

A custom in booming logs is considered in Saunders v. Clark, 106 Mass. 381.

In Watts v. Hoch, 25 Pa. 411, it was held that the custom of the merchants of Pittsburgh to charge interest after six months on goods sold is so universal and notorious that the courts are bound to take notice of this custom as a part of the law; following Koons v. Miller, 8 Watts & S. 271, where a similar custom of the Philadelphia merchants was recognized as valid and binding.

So in Frankford etc. Turnpike Co. v. Philadelphia etc. R. R. Co. 54 Pa. 345, a case of fire caused by sparks from an engine, it was held that evidence of the common use of a stack, by many others in the same business, was admissible on the question of the safety of the stack.

In McMasters v. Pennsylvania R. R. Co. 89 Pa. 374, proof was admitted of the mode of delivery by a common carrier, according to the practice of the place.

This case was fully sustained by the present Chief Justice in Carter v. Philadelphia Coal Co. 77 Pa. 286.

Jones v. Wagner, 66 Pa. 429, relied on by the other side, was a different case: an action for damages for falling in of the surface of the land, caused by removal of the underlying coal. The right of support arises ex jure natura, and is essential to the absolute preservation of the surface. A custom to deprive the land of its subterranean support might well be considered unreasonable. It is certainly very different from a custom to mine in the only way the necessity of the case admits of.

Mr. A. Hicketts, for defendant in error, referred to the discussion of the principles in 86 Pa. 401, and, as to custom, 94 Pa. 802, but did not print a detailed argument.

Mr. Justice Clark delivered the opinion of the court:

The Pennsylvania Coal Company is the owner of some 1,600 acres of anthracite coal lands, in the Lackawanna Valley, situate above the City of Scranton, in the basin of a small tributary of the Lackawanna River, known as Meadow Brook, into which, owing to the natural conformation of the surface, the water from these lands is drained.

The Company first opened the coal seams on this land by a drift or tunnel in the year 1867 or 1868; it drove three other tunnels and sunk a shaft, and thereafter mining operations were extensively engaged in, the establishment being known as the Gipsy Grove Coal Works. From the time the first tunnel was driven the mine water flowed by the natural course of gravity into Meadow Brook. As the operation of the mines was increased, the volume of mine water increased. The water which percolated into the shaft was by powerful engines pumped therefrom, and as it was brought to the surface it passed with the flow from the tunnel, by an artificial water course, over the defendant's own land, into Meadow Brook, which we have said was the natural water course for drainage of the entire basin.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Sanderson, in the year 1868, purchased a tract of land in the City of Scranton, some three miles below the Gipsy Grove Works on Meadow Brook, near its mouth. The existence of the stream, the purity of its water and its utility for domestic and other purposes, it is said, was a leading inducement to the purchase. She began and, in the year 1870, finished the erection of a house upon the land; in connection therewith dams were built across the brook to form a fish and ice pond, and to supply a cistern; the water was forced by a hydraulic ram from the cistern to a tank in the house, and was used for domestic purposes and for a fountain.

It is alleged that the large volume of mine water, which the defendant poured into Meadow Brook, has corrupted the water of that stream to such an extent as to render it totally unfit for domestic use; that the fish in the brook have been totally destroyed, the plaintiffs' pipes corroded, and their entire apparatus for the utilization of the water rendered wholly worthless; and that in consequence, about the year 1875, the same was abandoned. This action was brought to recover the damages which the plaintiffs allege they have sustained in consequence of the alleged pollution of the stream.

At the trial of the cause in February, 1878, in the Common Pleas of Luzerne County, the court, after hearing the plaintiffs' case, entered a nonsuit, on the ground that the discharge of the mine water was a necessary incident to mining; that there was neither malice nor negligence shown in the operation of the mine, and the case was therefore one of damnum absque injuria. A writ of error was taken to the refusal of the court to take off the nonsuit, and the case was presented for the consideration of this court. 86 Pa. 401.

Upon consideration of the questions involved, this court was then of opinion that, except where it is qualified by the existence of peculiar conditions, the duty of the owner of property is defined by the maxim "Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non ledas," that this case exhibited none of those peculiar conditions, and that the plaintiffs' proofs exhibited a case which should have been submitted to the jury. A procedendo having been awarded, the cause was again brought to trial in the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, where, in October, 1879, a verdict was rendered for the plaintiffs. A writ of error was then taken, by the defendant, but this court adhering to the opinion contained in 86 Pa. 401, the judgment was affirmed. [94 Pa. 302].

The plaintiffs, however, sued out a second writ to the same judgment and assigned for error the ruling of the court as to the proper measure of damages; and upon this the judgment was reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded. [102 Pa. 870].

The cause was again tried in the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County in February, 1885; judgment was again entered for the plaintiffs; and it is to this judgment that the present errors are assigned.

The questions which are now to be considered, with a single exception, perhaps, being identical with those which were previously considered and embraced in the judgment reported in 86 Pa. 401, the argument has been practically a reargument of the original case. We have before us not only the same parties and the same questions, but the same case; and if it be true, as it is most persistently argued, that this court was mistaken in its former ruling it is well that the error should be righted in the same case in which it occurred.

If we lay aside our own previous decisions of this case, and regard the cause as coming before us upon a reargument, the main question involved is one of new impression in this State. This court was not then and is not now in harmony with reference to it.

It has been stated that 30,000,000 tons of anthracite and 70,000,000 of bituminous coal are annually produced in Pennsylvania; it is therefore a question of vast importance, and cannot on that account be too carefully considered,—for if damages may from time to time be recovered, either in the present form or as for a nuisance, punitive sums may be resorted to to prevent repetition or to compel the abatement of the nuisance; indeed, if the right to damages in such cases is admitted, equity may and under the decisions of this court undoubtedly would, at the suit of any riparian owner, take jurisdiction; and upon the ground of a continuous and irreparable injury enjoin the operation of the mine altogether.

Whatever rights Mrs. Sanderson may have to the use of this water, and whatever remedy she may have in this case, or in any other form, in law or in equity, is the right and remedy of every other riparian owner along Meadow Brook; and whatever may be the rights and remedies of the owners on Meadow Brook are of course the rights and remedies of all other riparian owners throughout the Commonwealth. It may be that Mrs. Sanderson adopted a more extensive arrangement for the use of this water than any other person, and is consequently more inconvenienced on that account; but the law is the same in her case as in all other cases; if she may recover damages in a large amount others similarly, but less, affected may recover in a less sum.

Besides, these riparian owners are not limited to their present modes of enjoyment. It is impossible to foresee what other modes of enjoyment they or their successors in title may adopt; or to estimate the extent of damages to which the continued pollution of the stream might proceed; hence, if the responsibility of the operator of a mine is extended to injuries of the character complained of, the consequences must be that mining cannot be conducted, except by the general consent of all parties affected.

It will be observed that the defendant has done nothing to change the character of the water or to diminish its purity, save what results from the natural use and enjoyment of its own property. It has brought nothing on to the land artificially. The water as it is poured into Meadow Brook is the water which the mine naturally discharged; its impurity arises from natural, not artificial causes. The mine cannot of course be operated elsewhere than where the coal is naturally found, and the discharge is a necessary incident to the mining of it.

It must be conceded, we think, that every man is entitled to the ordinary and natural use and enjoyment of his property; he may cut down the forest trees, clear and cultivate his land, although in so doing he may dry up the sources of his neighbor's springs, or remove the natural barriers against wind and storm. If, in the excavation of his land, he should uncover a spring of water, salt or fresh, acidulated or sweet, he will certainly not be obliged to cover it again, or to conduct it out of its course, lest the stream in its natural flow may reach his neighbor's land. It has always been considered that land on a lower level owes a natural servitude to that on a higher level, in respect of receiving, without claim for compensation by the owner, the water naturally flowing down to it. In sinking his well he may intercept and appropriate the water which supplies his neighbor's well. Acton v. Blundel, 12 Mees. & Welsh 324; Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 523; Haldeeman v. Bruckhart, 45 Pa. 514.

Or if his own well is so close to the soil of his neighbor as to require the support of a rib of clay or of stone, on his neighbor's land, to retain the water in the well, no action will lie against the owner of the adjacent land for digging away such clay or stone which is his own property, and thereby letting out the water. Whart. Neg. 939.

He may to a reasonable extent, jure natura, divert water from a stream for domestic purposes and for the irrigation of his land. Messinger's App. [1 Cent. Rep. 423].

So, also, each of two owners of adjoining mines has a natural right to work his own mine, in the manner most convenient and beneficial to himself, although the natural consequence may be that some prejudice will occur to the owner of the adjoining mine. Smith v. Kenrick, 7 C. B. [M. G. & S.] 515.

One mine owner may thus permit water naturally flowing in his own mine to pass off by gravitation into an adjoining or lower mine, so long as his operations are carried on properly and in the usual manner. Bainbridge, Mines, 297.

count of the property. By deed of September 15, 1850, Pratt conveyed the property to Samuel and James. They then paid $1,000 on account of the purchase money and gave a mortgage for the rest, $2,000. Samuel swears that at his father's death he had of his own money $880, all of which he put into the property. The $2,000, the payment of which the mortgage was given to secure, were paid by Samuel and James as follows: $500 in September, 1851, $500 in May, 1852, and $1,000 in September in that year. The family lived in the hotel (it being kept by Samuel and James, who supported the family there) up to 1856, when the mother removed to another house near by, belonging to Samuel and James.

In 1867 Samuel and James made a division of some of the property which they held together as tenants in common, and in that division Samuel conveyed his interest in the hotel property, except the stable lot, to James. They had, it may be remarked, made very extensive additions to the property both in land and buildings. The bill in this case was not filed until August 23, 1884, thirty-four years after the conveyance of the property by Pratt to Samuel and James, and twenty years after the complainant attained her majority.

In 1883 she called the administrators to an account in the orphans' court for their administration. In that account they were charged with the household goods contained in the inventory, although part of them had been taken by members of the family including the complainant herself, and the rest had been used up by the family while living together with the mother. The result of the accounting was that it was decreed that they were liable to pay a balance of $377.98. All of the family except the complainant voluntarily released them from payment of any part of the balance. The complainant's share thereof, with interest, was tendered to her, but she refused to receive it. The administration, however, is not involved in this case, which has reference only to the claim of the complainant to the hotel property.

The claim is founded in the first place upon the allegation that Samuel and James were in equity tenants in common of the hotel property with the complainant, and that in taking the title thereto they in equity took it in trust for her to the extent of one-seventh part thereof, and that she is entitled to that share and to an account of the rents and profits in this court, out of her share of which her proportion of the purchase money is to be paid. The claim cannot be supported.

It is clear from the evidence that, as before stated, the heirs of Tobias S. Hendrickson were unable to complete the purchase which he had made, and if Samuel and James had not taken the property, the money paid by their father on account of it would have been lost to the estate, and Pratt would have been free to sell to any one else. Samuel and James not only did not seek to take any advantage of the complainant and her brothers and sister, but they were reluctant to take the property at all, and it was only upon the urgency of Pratt's agent and their mother and friends of the family that they were induced to buy it, and it appears they were led to that determination not so much by hopes of gain as by a desire to benefit their mother and the younger children by keeping a home for them and providing for them until the children could take care of themselves. It will not be out of place to add that it appears that in all things they discharged with commendable generosity, and to the full, their duty in the premises. The kinship between them and their brothers and sisters did not create a fiduciary relation in the purchase. The heirs of Tobias S. Hendrickson did not upon his death become tenants in common of the property. As such heirs they had a right to have a conveyance of the property to them upon their complying with the terms of sale. It being impossible for the other heirs to comply with those terms, Samuel and James were as much at liberty to buy the property for themselves as a stranger would have been. In view of the circumstances of the other heirs, the contract between Pratt and Tobias S. Hendrickson was properly held by Pratt and Samuel and James to be at an end, and Pratt was at liberty to sell the property again and they or anybody else was at liberty to buy it.

It may be added that both Samuel and James swear that they did not know that there was any written agreement between their father and Pratt for the sale of the property, but that all they know about the matter was that their father had agreed to buy the property and had paid the amount of the Haight incumbrance on account of the price.

The complainant's counsel urges also that it was the duty of the administrators to sell the contract in order to raise the money to pay the price, i. e., the $3,000 which remained unpaid. In the first place they had no right to sell any interest in real estate without the order of the orphans' court, and such order could not have been lawfully made. The orphans' court is authorized to order the sale of lands, tenements, hereditaments or real estate of a decedent, if necessary to pay his debts. But the land in this case was not the land of the decedent; it was Pratt's property. The court could not order that it be sold. An equitable interest in land under a contract of sale is not within the statute. It may be remarked that it does not appear that the price at which Tobias S. Hendrickson purchased the property was below its value. Some evidence as to its value at that time is to be found in the fact that when he made the agreement he held the property as tenant under Pratt at a rent of $250 a year, from which it would seem that $3,000 would have been a full price for it.

There is another important consideration against the complainant's claim which should be mentioned before leaving the case, although the decision, as will have been seen, in no wise rests upon it, and that is the great length of time (over twenty years) which elapsed after the complainant came of age before she brought this suit. It is also in this connection noteworthy that she never, before bringing it, made any claim upon Samuel and James or either of them in respect to the property. And she has lived in Red Bank all her life.

There is no ground on which the bill can be sustained. It will be dismissed with costs.

BILL for injunction and to quiet title.
Decree accordingly advised.

The facts are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. W. H. Vredenburg, for complainant.

Mr. H. G. Clayton, for defendant.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

The complainant purchased the lands described in his bill at judicial sale, which sale was confirmed by an order of the court, directing the officer to execute a deed to the complainant. At the time the premises were being offered, the defendant exposed in the presence of bidders, of whom the complainant was one, a mortgage, and declared that he held it as a lien upon the premises. To overcome that claim and to quiet the title as to that mortgage, the complainant comes into this court.

I will briefly state the history of the mortgage, so far as the defendant is concerned. It was given by one Cooper in 1856 for $6,500, on premises which were afterwards purchased by the defendant's father. In 1859 the owner of the mortgage assigned it to Wm. Norton. In 1862, when the principal and interest were reduced to $2,270, the defendant says he paid that amount upon the bond, and took the bond and mortgage into his possession, and has had the possession of them ever since as his security. He took no written assignment and makes proof of no assignment other than the delivery. There were indorsed upon the bond by the agent of the owner these words: "April 11th, 1862. Received two thousand two hundred and seventy dollars on the principal and interest in full to this date on this bond and mortgage." Signed "Isaac Norton for William Norton." No claim or any pretense of claim has been in any way proved or attempted to be proved on the part of the defendant against his father, who at the time of the payment was owner of the premises and continued to be until the year 1879, nor against anyone else, since his death, until the period of this judicial sale in 1884.

After the most careful consideration I am unable to give the claim of the defendant that credit which is necessary to warrant me in dismissing the complainant's bill for want of equity. It is true the mortgage was not canceled of record. It is true the defendant holds it, and also the bond which it was given to secure. It is also true that he swears that he paid the $2,270 and took possession of the bond and mortgage for his protection. He says that that money was his own, admitting, however, that when he went to make the payment his father paid him a portion of it, but insisting that that money, which his father so paid him, he had previously lent to him.

At the time of this transaction the defendant was unmarried and living at home with his father, and was at the age of about 85. There was no account or statement of any kind between the father and son with respect to this bond and mortgage, and the amount due thereon. The defendant accounts for the absence of any understanding between him and his father, by saying that within the next three or four years his father purchased other lands, and agreed with him and his brother George that if they would work his two farms and earn for him, the father, so much money that he could invest $12,000, he would then convey to them his said two farms, the one having the mortgage on, to the defendant; he says they accepted this offer and worked and managed said farms until the year 1878, when they had actually earned for their father about the sum of $12,000; he says that in the spring of 1878 he gave up the farms to them; the one with the mortgage upon to the defendant; and that they remained in the possession of them until the next year, when their father died, without his ever having executed to either of them any deed of conveyance.

It appears that after the father's death a bill was filed for the partition of said lands among his children and heirs at law. The defendant and his brother answered said bill and claimed that in equity they were entitled to the said lands, and that the other heirs at law had no interest in them. In his defense to that suit no part of his resistance was based upon this mortgage by implication or otherwise. In speaking of the farm in his testimony in that case he said "There was a $8,500 mortgage on it; that was on it until we paid it off; Wm. Norton had this mortgage. * * * I think the mortgage was paid off, but we owed a little something at the time, for we were talking about it."

It will be observed that he says "We paid it off," not, "I paid it off;" nor the slightest inference that he had paid it with his own money. If his statement then made be true, the most favorable construction would be that he joined with some one else in paying it; most probably referring by the term "we" to his brother George; and if that be true, then George has some interest—if not an equal or greater interest than the defendant—in said mortgage. But in his answer in this case he makes no such admission, but claims the benefit of said lien for himself; which shows that his present claim is inconsistent with his former statement under oath; and that therefore one or the other must be false. From a legal standpoint this greatly impairs the value of the defendant's testimony, and strengthens the conviction that this claim is but an afterthought.

Very naturally, in considering this question, the inquiry comes to the mind: Why did not the defendant avail himself of this claim in the proceedings for partition? He says he made the fact of having the mortgage known to his counsel, and that his counsel said to him that was not worthy of consideration, since, under the agreement with his father, he was really the owner of the farm. Who was that counsel?

None other than the late James Wilson, distinguished for his ability in presenting and maintaining all the rights and interests of his clients.

Indeed, the proceedings in the partition case illustrate what I say. In that case, when the discussion and the application of legal principles seem to weigh heavily against John, this defendant, and George, his brother, who claimed the farms, then Mr. Wilson insisted that by virtue of their prayer for general relief in their cross bill they were entitled to be heard upon a claim for compensation for services rendered their father during all the years that they worked and managed said farms for him. Larson v. Polhemus, 9 Stew. 508; S. C. on appeal, 12 Stew. 803.

He prevailed and had such claim considered, and they recovered such compensation as they proved their services to be worth within the period limited by law.

But in all that controversy, lasting a long period, no claim was made of any rights of this defendant as against his father or his estate, arising from the payment by this defendant of said bond and mortgage. To my mind it seems incredible that he should have made the statement and claim of right to Mr. Wilson that he now says he made. There was then due upon the bond and mortgage, if anything, over $5,000; and if the defendant himself had regarded the lien of the mortgage as bona fide, and had made the fact known, Mr. Wilson never would have disregarded a matter of such high importance. This consideration alone shatters to atoms the claim of the defendant.

This, however, is not all. The claim is stale, both with respect to the ancestor and his estate, and also the complainant. It needs no argument to show that courts should hesitate a long time before they support a claim which had been kept from the light for over twenty years, and until all the parties interested therein adversely are dead. And this principle can justly be claimed by all those who claim title to the land in question, under such ancestor, although it be but five years from the death of such ancestor until the time when the claim is made known.

The case in hand strikingly illustrates the danger which may flow from giving credit to such demands. For years there was a contest in open court respecting the title to this land. The defendant in this suit was also defendant in that; and every possible opportunity as well as every conceivable incentive was offered for him to present and if possible establish the lien of this mortgage. By every path he would have been enabled to support if not maintain whatever other claim he had to make by virtue of this supposed lien.

I shall advise a decree in accordance with the prayer of the bill. The complainant is entitled to costs.

Mr. J. F. Hageman, for petitioner.

Mr. W. J. Gibby, for W. V. Scudder.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions:

Two hundred and eighteen dollars and one cent are the moneys claimed by the petitioner, Mary Francis Gulick, who was the complainant in the above cause. These moneys came into court under foreclosure proceedings in another suit in which the above named parties were defendants upon a mortgage given by them.

After they had executed and delivered the mortgage, a dispute arose between them as to their respective rights and interest in the property; and among other things it was decided by the chancellor that the premises in dispute were held in trust for the children and grandchildren of the parents. During the pendency of these proceedings the premises were sold, as above stated, to satisfy a mortgage given for money loaned. After the payment of the mortgage, the $218.01 remained.

Mrs. Gulick insists that she is entitled to have her costs, incurred in the above stated suit, paid out of this surplus. She rests her claim upon the ground that the suit was instituted to ascertain the rights of the parties; and that among other things, as above stated, the court declared that the property was held in trust; which being so, she claims that she is entitled to her costs out of the estate. The law seems to be well settled that in such case the estate or fund sought to be protected or administered, or the true character of which is sought to be established, shall pay the cost of the litigation. 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 4th ed. 1877, 1411; 2 Perry, Tr. §§ 894, 899.

The principles upon which these authorities stand give the costs in this case to Mrs. Gulick out of the fund.

But Mr. Scudder comes in with his judgment, and claims, by virtue thereof, title to these same moneys. His judgment was obtained against one of the parties prior to the suit to foreclose the mortgage, by virtue of which he was made a party to that suit and obtained a decree in his favor for the amount of the judgment. But it appearing, before his judgment was satisfied, that these lands were only held in trust by the judgment debtor, and that Mr. Scudder had no claim whatever against the cestuis que trust, who were not parties to the foreclosure proceedings, the moneys arising from the sale, after satisfying the mortgage, were ordered paid into court.

Mr. Scudder thinks he has as good a title to this money as Mrs. Gulick. Indeed, he claims that his lien or right is as substantial as that of the mortgagee, who had a lien upon the lands by virtue of his mortgage as he has had by virtue of his judgment. It is not for me to determine the rights of Mr. Scudder by a comparison with the mortgagee, who is out of court and has his money; nor with Mrs. Gulick as a creditor simply. The only question for me to determine is whether these moneys are first subject to the payment of the costs incurred in the litigation in establishing their character. My understanding is that in every such case, creditors, whether they be by simple contract or by judgment, or have special liens, are always postponed to the payment of the costs. This is a familiar rule and adopted in every court.

The costs incurred in the litigation being greatly in excess of the fund in court I will advise an order directing the payment of the $218.01 to the petitioner, Mrs. Gulick, to be applied to the payment of her costs in the above stated case.

1. A bill to recover money due upon a policy of insurance, which states no ground of equitable relief except an apprehension that defendant might set up, as a bar to a recovery at law, a by-law, which the company has waived, cannot be sustained.
2. Waiver of such by-law could be shown in an action at law.

(Decided June 15, 1886.)

ON general demurrer to bill to recover money due upon policy of insurance. Allowed.
The case is stated by the court.
Mr. J. J. Bergen, for demurrant.
Mr. J. Schomp, for complainant.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The demurrer must be allowed. The bill states no ground of equitable relief. The complainant has an adequate remedy at law. The only grounds on which it may be conjectured that the suit is brought in this court are that the complainant apprehends that the defendant will set up as a bar to his recovery at law the existence of the by-law which he says it pretended existed when the policy was issued, and that it has waived the enforcement of the by-law if it existed.

But he avers that such by-law did not exist; and he states no ground of relief as against it, in case it should be shown to exist, except waiver; and that would be available to him at law.

council of the city of Hoboken the power to alter and fix the grade of streets in the city, delineated on the grade map mentioned in and confirmed by the second section of the Act of 1866.

(Decided June 15, 1886.)

CERTIORARI to review an ordinance passed September 15, 1885, for the improvement of Adams Street in the city of Hoboken. Dismissed.

Statement of facts by Depue, J.:

This writ brings up an ordinance for the improvement of Adams Street from the northerly line of Third Street to the northerly line of Seventh Street, passed September 15, 1885. This ordinance provides for the grading of the street between the limits mentioned to the highest established grade, the resetting of the curbs and relaying of the flagging.

The lands adjacent to said street and in that locality were part of the estate of John G. Coster, deceased. In 1860 the heirs of Coster caused a map of said lands to be made, entitled "Map of Property Situate at Hoboken, Hudson County, New Jersey, Belonging to the Estate of John G. Coster, Deceased," laying out said tract into lots, blocks and streets, which map they filed in the Hudson county clerk's office, and since then have sold lots to several persons by reference to said map.

The whole of said tract was low marsh or meadow land, the natural surface of which was below mean high tide. Adams Street is one of the streets laid out and designated on said map. In 1866 an act entitled "An Act to Provide for the Drainage of Certain Low Lands Lying in the City of Hoboken and the Township of Weehawken" was passed, approved April 4, 1866. P. L. 1866, p. 941.

The grade map mentioned in the second section of said Act was filed by the owners thereof in the city clerk's office of the city of Hoboken May 24, 1866.

The grade designated on said map is two feet above mean high tide at street corners, and rises eight inches per hundred feet to the center of blocks.

The map is entitled "A Grade Map of Property Belonging to the Estate of John G. Coster, deceased, situate at Hoboken, Hudson County, 1866" made by Robert C. Bacot and L. W. Post, Civil Engineers and Surveyors." At the foot of this map a note was added in these words: "It is recommended (with a view to future raisings of grade) that all buildings of a permanent nature should be placed two feet six inches above the grades shown on this map."

The plans adopted by resolution of the mayor and council of the city for the improvement of Adams Street, pursuant to the ordinance set out in the return to the writ, fixes the grade of said street at four feet above mean high tide at street crossings, and at five feet six inches above mean high tide at the center of blocks, which is two feet higher than the grade shown on the said Coster grade map.

Several houses have been built on the streets above named to correspond with the grade shown on the Coster grade map.

Mr. S. C. Benson, for the prosecutors.
Mr. James Minturn, contra.

Depue, J., delivered the following opinion:

By the charter of the city the common council has power to pass ordinances to make, lay out and improve all public streets, to regulate and govern the leveling, pitching and construction of streets, and also the power to grade, pave and remove obstructions in all streets that were or might become public streets or highways by dedication or otherwise. P. L. 1885, pp. 464, 477; § 40, p. 6; § 56.

The ordinance to grade and improve the street in question, and the resolution fixing the grade, were in compliance with the powers granted by the city charter.

The single question is whether these powers were withdrawn from the city authority with respect to the lands in question by the Act of 1866. The second section of the Act is the only part of it that is material to this controversy. It created the commissioners a corporation under the name of "Commissioners to Drain Certain Low Lands Lying in the City of Hoboken and in the Township of Weehawken," and gave them power to reclaim and drain said lands in accordance, as nearly as practicable, with two certain maps made by Robert C. Bacot and Levi W. Post, dated February 1, 1866—the one for sewerage and the other for grades of the lands of the Coster estate, which said maps were therein established and confirmed, with the monuments shown thereon. It also empowered the commissioners to construct, maintain, manage, and use all dykes, dams, ditches, sluices, sluice gates, and all other works, structures and machinery necessary, useful or convenient to reclaim and drain said low lands or any part thereof; to employ a surveyor, engineer and other agents; to make maps of the said low lands; to contract for the execution of the said works; and to do any act and thing necessary to complete and maintain a proper drainage of said low lands or any part thereof. Subsequent sections gave the commissioners power to make assessments on the land so drained for the expenses thereof, and to collect the same by the sale of lands on which assessments were laid; to condemn lands required for the execution of the works necessary for the said improvement, and to borrow money and issue bonds therefor.

The authority conferred upon these commissioners was for the execution of a specified work,—the drainage of low lands in the localities mentioned; and all the powers granted to them were subsidiary to this single purpose. That the legislative scheme was limited within that scope is apparent from the title of the Act as well as from the enumeration of the powers and duties of the commissioners in the body of the Act. It is true that the maps referred to in the Act, and established and confirmed had delineated upon them streets which were proposed as such, among which was Adams Street, and that the confirmation of these maps was an adoption of those streets. But the recommendation annexed to the maps shows that it was not contemplated by the makers of them that they should be taken as an adoption of an established grade for the streets delineated, and the legislative adoption of the grade indicated on the maps was expressly of the grades of the lands according to which, as nearly as practicable, the commissioners were to execute the work of drainage.

Furthermore, the Legislature withheld from the commissioners those governmental powers which were already vested in the municipality, of opening and improving streets, incident to which is the power to fix and establish grades, and limited their duties to the execution of such works as were needful to effect and maintain suitable means to accomplish the draining of the lands within the scope of the legislative plan.

But if it be conceded that the Act of 1866 was the establishment of the grades indicated on these maps, this Act has not superseded the powers granted to the municipality to regulate and establish the grades of streets within the city. It has not done so expressly, and the provisions of the city charter on that subject are not so irreconcilable with the powers of the commissioners as that a repeal of the power by implication would be effected.

In this view of the Act of 1866 the utmost that could be said is that in case the city should exercise the powers granted by the charter in establishing a new grade of the streets, abutting owners would be entitled to recover the damages arising from the alteration of such grade pursuant to the Act of 1858. Rev. 1009, § 70.

The ordinance under review was a legitimate exercise of the powers of the common council under the city charter, and in pursuance of the stipulation of counsel this writ should be dismissed without costs.

CERTIORARI to the Common Pleas of Monmouth County, to review a judgment affirming a justice's judgment for plaintiff, in an action upon a promissory note. Affirmed.

*Head note by DEPUÉ, J.

The facts are stated in the opinion. Argued before Depue, Dixon and Reed, JJ. Mr. R. T. Stow, for plaintiff in certiorari. Messrs. E. H. Arrowsmith and B. B. Ogden, contra.

Depue, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought before a justice of the peace in the court for the trial of small causes. The action was in debt on a promissory note made by the defendant for the sum of $200, dated June 7, 1884, payable three months after date. The note was given for the price of a team of horses sold by the plaintiff to the defendant. The suit was commenced by a warrant to arrest the defendant. The justice made an order for the issuing of a warrant, pursuant to the fourteenth section of the Justice's Court Act (Rev. 541), on the ground that the defendant had fraudulently contracted the said debt.

The affidavits on which the order for a warrant was made set out that the defendant, at the time of the purchase of the horses, represented that he was the owner of the premises then occupied by him and built and owned the buildings thereon, and that the sale of the horses on a credit without security was induced by that representation, and also contained some proof that these representations were false.

The defendant on the appearance day filed a plea setting out a denial that he made such representations, and averring that he was perfectly responsible for all debts he might incur. The defendant then "requested a preliminary hearing to decide upon the matters set forth in the affidavits upon which the order of the justice that a warrant issue was founded." The justice refused the application, and, after hearing evidence on the merits, gave judgment for the plaintiff for $200 debts and costs. On appeal and a trial before the court of common pleas, judgment was also given in favor of the plaintiff for $200 and the costs below and upon the appeal. This writ of certiorari removes the latter judgment.

The defendant's plea is without warrant of law. It is a traverse of facts set out in the affidavits on which the order for arrest was made, on which the justice adjudicated that the defendant fraudulently contracted the debt for which he was sued. In that respect the plea is totally unlike a plea to the jurisdiction in the nature of a plea in abatement on the ground of a personal privilege, such as was sustained in Cole v. Oliver, 14 Vroom, 182; S. C. on error, 15 Vroom, 212.

In that case the plea filed was that the defendant was a freeholder, and resided in the county in which the process issued, and the statute which empowers a justice of the peace to issue a warrant expressly exempts freeholders and residents of the county from such process. In such cases the justice has no jurisdiction to proceed by warrant. The defendant's plea was not of this character. It did not propose to show exemption from arrest as a personal privilege on the ground that the defendant was a freeholder and resided in the county. It simply denied the facts set out in the affidavits with respect to the representations made.

In the higher courts, in virtue of the sixty-fourth section of the Practice Act, a judge may order the taking of testimony concerning the truth of the affidavits and proofs upon which an order for arrest was made, and upon the testimony so taken may set aside the order for arrest. Rev. 859. This statute does not extend to justices' courts, and in that court the common-law rule prevails that the affidavits on which the order is made are taken to be true.

The defendant might have moved the justice to set aside the order for a warrant for the insufficiency of the affidavits, and for a wrongful denial of such a motion might have had remedy upon the appeal. Rev. p. 556, § 95.

The entry in the justice's docket will bear the construction that such a motion was made before him, but it does not appear that it was made in the court of common pleas. All that appears to have been done in that court is that the defendant "moved that the judgment of the justice be reversed because the justice declined to recognize, and to hear testimony in support of, the plea interposed and filed with said justice." This motion being denied, the defendant applied to the court to hear evidence in support of the plea. Both these motions were properly denied.

Another ground of reversal is that the court refused to hear evidence offered by the defendant to show that the note, although payable by its terms in three months, was given upon an agreement that it should be renewed. The offer was not to show an agreement to that effect in writing. It must be taken, therefore, to be an offer to establish such an agreement by parol, and oral testimony was incompetent to vary the terms of the written contract. 2 Pars. Bills, 508; 1 Danl. Neg. Inst. § 80; Wright v. Remington, 12 Vroom, 49; S. C. 14 Vroom, 451.

The judgment should be affirmed.

v.

STATE of New Jersey.

1. In a criminal case the record need not show that a copy of the indictment and a list of jurors was served on the defendant as required by the statute. If the defendant proceeded to trial without objection on this account, the presumption against him is conclusive that copies were duly served.
2. It is not a ground of exception that some of the general panel of jurors failed to answer to their names when the case was moved for trial. The statute requires now that the forty-eight jurors shall be summoned for service, and that a list of them shall be served on the defendant. It does not require that all the jurors shall be present when the case is moved.
3. The court has power to excuse jurors for good cause.
4. It is within the discretion of the court to determine the order in which the right to challenge shall be exercised by the State or by the defendant; and

- no exception lies to the exercise of that discretion.
5. It was not error in the trial court to order the sheriff to have present in court on a future day the requisite number of qualified jurors to serve as talesmen.
 6. It is not necessary to select talesmen from those actually present in or about the court room. The officer may go out into the county and summon them.
 7. There was no error in ordering the tales, when three of the original panel of jurors had not appeared and answered to the call of their names.
 8. A defendant is entitled to two days' service of the tales. The proper practice is, unless service is waived in open court, to adjourn the cause for the purpose of making service.
 9. The tales having been duly served in this case, it was not a legal ground of exception that three of the talesmen did not answer to their names when the trial proceeded.
 10. It is not a ground of exception that one of the talesmen is exempt from jury duty. That which exempts but does not disqualify is no cause for challenge.
 11. The general panel of jurors for the term must be drawn in the presence of the court of common pleas. In Monmouth County the presence of three judges is necessary to constitute the court of common pleas.
 12. The judge of the court having under our statute the duty to try challenges, his finding upon questions of fact involved in a challenge is conclusive. His decision is reviewable only when he makes a mistake in principle in determining whether a challenge shall prevail.
 13. The facts that a juror had served in another case of the State against the same defendant at the same term, and that he had formed an opinion in that case, is not sufficient to sustain a challenge by the State.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant below was convicted in Monmouth Quarter Sessions of forgery. During the progress of the trial many exceptions were taken, for alleged errors in the proceedings, which constitute the grounds upon which a reversal of judgment is asked for.

In the early days of English criminal jurisprudence, when even a trifling larceny was punishable with death, there was reason why the judicial mind should exhaust its ingenuity in aid of the defense, and seize upon every technicality to avert from the prisoner a punishment so disproportionate to his crime. In our time a more humane system of criminal law has been adopted, which graduates the punishment according to the magnitude of the offense; and in which there is nothing to shock our sense of justice. The reason for resorting to mere technicality to enable the criminal to evade the sanctions of the law no longer exists; and the practice to which that reason led should therefore cease. Men who make their lives a scourge to society must answer its violated laws, and can justly demand in a judicial tribunal nothing except a fair trial according to the laws of the land, in which no substantial right is denied them. The legislation of our State has given expression to this view in the 87th section of the Criminal Procedure Act, in the following language:

"No judgment given upon any indictment shall be reversed for any imperfection, omission, defect in or lack of form, or for any error, except such as shall or may have prejudiced the defendant in maintaining his defense upon the merits."

It is of the utmost importance to society that its criminal classes shall understand that the penalty surely follows the crime.

With these convictions I enter upon the consideration of the questions involved in this controversy.

The Criminal Procedure Act provides that the defendant shall have a copy of the indictment and a list of the jury two entire days at least before the trial, and that he shall not be put upon his trial without his consent deliberately expressed in open court, unless he had such jury list duly served.

The first error assigned is that the record does not show that a copy of the indictment and list of jurors was served as required by the statute.

The answer is that the record need not show compliance with the statute in this respect. The presumption is that all things were rightly done. The defendant knew his rights, and if he proceeded to trial without objection on this account, the presumption against him is conclusive that the copies were duly served. If by the record it appeared that he had objected on that ground in the trial court, and it had there appeared that the jury list had not been served, it would be essential to the validity of the judgment that it appear of record that the defendant's consent to be put upon trial was deliberately expressed in open court.

In this respect no error is apparent. Intendment will be made against the party excepting and in favor of the judgment. Powell, Appellate Jur. p. 129, § 21.

The second assignment of error is that the facts set forth in said cause do not constitute any crime committed against the laws of the State.

The point made is that the evidence did not justify conviction; that the jury should have resolved the doubt in the case in favor of the defendant and rendered a verdict of acquittal.

That question cannot be considered on a writ of error. If the premises are well founded it constituted good ground for an application for a new trial. There was sufficient evidence to go to the jury, and it was submitted with proper instructions by the court.

The third assignment of error is that the court allowed the call of the jury to proceed before all the jurors were present and without a full list thereof.

The record shows that after the challenge to the array was overruled, the court ordered the list of jurors to be called. Upon the call six jurors did not answer.

The counsel of defendant objected to proceeding until all the jury were present. The objection was overruled, and the names of the forty-eight jurors summoned were put in the box from which the jury for this cause was drawn.

If it is necessary that every juror of the forty-eight, summoned for service at the term, should be present in court when a case is called for trial, it would be quite impossible to conduct the prosecution of criminal trials successfully. Our statute requires only that the list of forty-eight jurors be served; it does not require that all the jurors shall be present when the case is moved.

The language of the section with respect to a tales clearly shows that the presence of all is not essential. It provides that if by reason of challenges, or the default of jurors or otherwise, a sufficient number cannot be had of the original panel to try the issue, a tales may be awarded.

The power of the court to excuse a juror from the general panel for cause is recognized in this as well as in other States. Smith v. Clayton, 5 Dutch. 358; Ware v. Ware, 8 Me. 42; State v. Ward, 39 Vt. 280.

As the ninth ground for reversal, the defendant assigns for error that the court below refused to direct that the State should challenge first.

On the trial of a capital case, Commonwealth v. Piper, reported in 120 Mass. 185, it was held that it is within the discretion of the court, in the absence of statutory regulation or a general rule of court, to determine the order in which the right to challenge shall be exercised by the State or by the defendant; and no exception lies to the exercise of that discretion.

The same rule has been adopted in other States, and I deem it to be well founded in reason. State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 406; Mfy. Co. v. Canney, 54 N. H. 295; Schnufflin v. State, 20 Ohio St. 238.

The next alleged error is that the court ordered the sheriff to summon forty-two qualified jurors to serve as talesmen in said cause on the following Monday.

It has long been settled, both in England and in this country, that it is not necessary to select talesman from persons accidentally present in court; they may be persons whose presence the sheriff has taken previous means to obtain. 5 Bacon, Abr. Juries, D, 387; King v. Dolby, 2 Barn. & C. 104.

State v. Allen, 47 Conn. 121, was a capital case. The court, before the trial commenced, ordered the sheriff to have in attendance men from whom talesmen could be chosen for the trial of that cause.

The court of review held that the sheriff might take talesmen from those in attendance, or he might go outside, according to his discretion; and that there was no error in the court suggesting to the sheriff to have proper men in attendance.

In U. S. v. Loughery, 18 Blatchf. 267, Judge Benedict ruled that the marshal may select talesmen from those not present in or about the court house, and that when they were returned by the officer, they became bystanders, within the meaning of the statute.

Bird v. State, 14 Ga. 48, was also a capital case, in which the trial court directed the sheriff to send out into the county, and have in attendance a large number of citizens to act as talesmen if necessary. The appellate court said it was not error, but on the contrary a commendable practice, calculated to secure a fair jury and prevent delay.

It is within the general power which every court has, to arrange the order of business and provide for the probable necessities which may arise in the conduct of a trial.

This construction gives full effect to the language of our statute, which directs the sheriff to summon the tales from "the bystanders or others."

There was no error in this direction to the sheriff.

Nor was there error in ordering the tales when three of the original panel had not appeared and answered to the call of their names.

N. J.

Nor can the defendant avail himself of the objection that of the forty-two talesmen summoned only thirty-nine appeared and answered to their names.

As has been before stated, the law requires only that the tales as well as the original panel shall be summoned and the list served. The presence of every juror when the list is called is not essential.

It is also assigned for error that the court below ordered the sheriff to serve the list of talesmen on the defendant not later than Saturday morning, July 11, at half past nine, and that the trial was proceeded with on Monday morning, July 13.

In State v. Aaron, 1 South. 232, the right of the prisoner to two entire days' service of the tales was recognized. The proper practice now is, unless service is waived in open court, to adjourn the cause for the purpose of making service.

In the case before us, although the order of the court was that service might be made as late as Saturday morning, it was in fact made on Friday evening, July 10, two entire days before the trial proceeded, and therefore the defendant had no legal ground of complaint in that respect.

A further error is assigned: that the sheriff did not return qualified jurors to serve, one of said jurors being exempt by law from jury duty.

The juror in question was duly qualified to serve, but had a right on his own motion to be excused from service. That which exempts but does not disqualify is no ground for challenge. 1 Archb. Cr. Pr. 549.

The next assignment of error is the refusal of the trial court to sustain the defendant's challenge to the array. The challenge interposed was made on the ground that the court of common pleas, before which the general panel of jurors was drawn for the term, was not legally constituted. In this respect the statute (Rev. 583, pl. 44) is mandatory; in other respects it is directory, except as to the certificate. Poulson v. Union Nat. Bank, 11 Vroom. 563.

The challenge interposed in writing was that Judge Hendrickson was not present at the drawing of the jury, and that but two judges were present, and also that but two judges signed the certificate. This the defendant offered to prove. The record before us shows that this offer of the defendant was overruled. We must therefore assume the fact to be that but two judges were present.

Did a duly constituted court certify to the return of the general panel of jurors?

In this case only two judges of the court of common pleas were present when the panel of jurors was drawn and certified.

The Laws of 1869, p. 681, § 1, provides that the Court of Common Pleas for the County of Monmouth shall consist of four judges in addition to the justice of the supreme court holding the circuit in said county.

The Laws of 1873, p. 428, in order to explain the true construction of the above Act in respect to the number of judges necessary to constitute the courts of common pleas, general quarter sessions and orphans' court of said county, provides that any two of said judges shall be sufficient to make and constitute the court of quarter sessions; and any three of said judges shall constitute the court of common pleas.

These are special laws, but they were passed before the constitutional amendments prohibiting special and local legislation, and therefore, to constitute a court of Common Pleas in Monmouth County, the presence of three judges is indispensable, unless this special legislation has been repealed.

The State claims that the Act of March 11, 1880 (p. 240), must be held to have that effect.

The former Act provides "that hereafter the number of lay judges of the inferior court of common pleas shall consist of two in those counties having a law judge and of three in all other counties, provided this Act shall not apply to counties having a population of more than 50,000 inhabitants according to the last census."

The latter Act provides: "1. That no further appointments of lay judges of the inferior courts of common pleas in the respective counties of this State shall be made until the number of such judges shall be reduced to two in counties having a law judge, and three in all other counties; and thereafter there shall be but two lay judges of such court in counties having a law judge, and not more than three lay judges in all other counties.

"2. That any action of said court, requiring the concurrence of three judges, shall be valid and effectual when concurred in by a majority of the judges of said court."

It is not necessary to decide whether this general legislation applies to Monmouth County.

Conceding that it does, it in no wise affects the requirement of the special law that three judges must be present to constitute a Court of Common Pleas in Monmouth County.

The utmost effect that can be given to the 2d section of the Act of 1880 is that when the court is legally constituted,—that is when in Monmouth County three judges are present,—any Act theretofore requiring the concurrence of three judges will be valid if concurred in by a majority of the judges.

The certification of the general panel of jurors was not the act of the court of common pleas, the panel not having been drawn in presence of a lawful court, and therefore the trial court erred in overruling the challenge of the defendant to the array.

The remaining questions to be considered relate to challenges to the jurors. At common law, upon the trial of such challenges, the finding of the triers as to facts was not reviewable. The functions of the triers being, by our statute, vested in the trial court, the finding of the judge upon questions of fact involved in a challenge are conclusive. The decision of the judge is the subject of exception only when he makes a mistake of principle in determining whether the challenge shall prevail. Under a system of criminal jurisprudence which shields a defendant by the presumption of innocence, by a liberal right of peremptory challenge and by the necessity of a unanimous verdict to convict, courts of review should not be astute to seize upon ground for reversal, where the challenge by the State to the favor has been successfully made. There should be very clear error to constitute a mistrial.

The State challenged Sidney H. Sproul to the favor.

It appeared that at the same time he had served as a juror in another case of the State against the same defendant, Patterson, in which he had formed an opinion; but he stated that he knew nothing about the present case and supposed he could try it according to the evidence.

Two other jurors were challenged by the State for like cause, and the challenges were sustained by the court.

"It is no legal objection to a juror that he had been one of the jury in another case against the same defendant for a different offense." U. S. v. Watkins, 3 Cranch, C. C. 443.

The fact that jurors have tried and convicted a defendant of a crime does not disqualify them from sitting as jurors in the trial of another indictment against him for a similar offense at the same term. Commonwealth v. Hill, 4 Allen, 591; Thompson & M. Juries, 194, 195.

In sustaining these challenges the trial court erred.

The State also challenged William J. Johnson to the favor, because it appeared that the defendant is a brother to one Austin Patterson, and that the said Austin Patterson and the father of said Johnson married sisters. This was no legal ground of challenge, and it was erroneously sustained.

The defendant challenged John S. Hubbard to the favor, because he was tenant in common of certain real estate with two of the indorsers on the promissory notes alleged to have been forged by the defendant. This challenge was properly overruled.

For the reasons given, the judgment must be reversed and a new trial ordered.

Where the testimony of several witnesses, giving positive testimony to the same fact, stands in irreconcilable conflict, the question of numbers, if the witnesses are of equal credit, becomes one of the highest importance; for, as a general rule, the evidence of the greater number is more likely to be true than that of the smaller number.

BILL to ascertain and settle the title to certain trees. Dismissed.

Final hearing on bill and answer and proofs taken in open court.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the Vice Chancellor.

Messrs. Chester Van Syckel and John A. Bullock, for complainant.

*Head note by VAN FLEET, V. C.

Messrs. William A. Cotter and John N. Voorhees, for defendant.

Van Fleet, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

The object of the bill in this case is to have the title to 126 hickory trees, standing on lands of the defendant, ascertained and settled. The complainant claims to have purchased that number of trees of the defendant for $320; and to have paid him, at the time of the purchase, $310, and to have subsequently tendered him the other $10.

The defendant admits the purchase, but says that the price the complainant agreed to pay was $420, and not $320. In consequence of the defendant's refusal to allow the complainant to enter upon his lands to cut and remove the trees, the complainant has brought this suit. He asks that the title to the trees may be adjudged to be in him, and that the defendant may be enjoined from interfering with him while he is cutting, working up and removing the trees.

The dispute between the parties is confined to a single question: Was the complainant to pay $320 or $420 for the trees? If the proofs show that the price of the trees was $320, the complainant is entitled to the relief he asks; if, on the contrary, they show that it was $420, his bill must be dismissed. The burden of proof is on the complainant. To be entitled to prevail, his proofs, on the point of dispute, must outweigh those of the defendant. But for a piece of written evidence produced by the complainant, the case, on the question as to which way the proofs preponderate, would be free from the least difficulty.

Four persons were present when the parties commenced their negotiations, namely: the complainant and the defendant and two of the defendant's grandsons. All four give substantially the same account of what occurred, except as to the price. They agree that the complainant opened the negotiation by asking the defendant what he would take for all his hickory trees, and that the defendant replied that he would not sell all, but would sell 100 trees; and that the complainant then asked the defendant what he wanted for 100 trees. The defendant and his two grandsons say that the reply to this question was, "$400; $4 a tree, as I told you before," and that the complainant then said, after a short pause, "I will give you $420 for 126 trees."

The complainant, on the contrary, says that the defendant's answer to his question, asking what he wanted for 100 trees, was $300, and that after a short pause he offered the defendant $320 for 126 trees.

Each of these witnesses seem entitled to equal credit. In testifying they all spoke with apparent candor and truthfulness, and seemed to utter what their consciences told them was the truth. Awarding equal credit to each, it is obvious that the weight of the evidence inclines strongly against the complainant. The knowledge, recollection and veracity of three credible witnesses, two of whom are without the least pecuniary interest in the result of the suit, stand opposed to him. He is not only alone, but he stands contradicted by three witnesses, each of whom is his peer in credit and respectability.

R. J.

Where the evidence of several witnesses, giving positive testimony to the same fact, stands in irreconcilable conflict, the question of numbers, if the witnesses are of equal credit, becomes one of the highest importance, for, as a general rule, the evidence of the greater number is more likely to be true than that of the smaller number. And the reason this is so is, that it is much easier for one person to get a wrong impression about a fact, or to fall into a mistake concerning it, than it is for three or even two; and if two or more persons do become mistaken about a fact, it is highly improbable that they will all fall into the same mistake. And it is also much more improbable that two or more persons will commit perjury than that one will. All that one person need do, who resolves to commit perjury, is to invent and arrange a story so as to give it the appearance of truth; and if, while he is under the trial of cross examination, he discovers that his story is improbable or incomplete, he may at once, without serious danger of detection, make such changes in it as he may think will cure its defects; but where several persons conspire to commit perjury, there must be concert; they must first be persons so depraved that they are willing to join in the commission of a high crime, and so lost to all sense of shame as to be willing to confess their infamy to one another; they must likewise agree, not only upon the main body of their story, but upon its details, and upon the order in which they occurred; and if, while they are undergoing the ordeal of cross examination, defects in their story are exposed, they will not dare to change it, for if they do they will run the risk of being contradicted by their associates; and if they adhere to it they know that they will incur the hazard of detection, together with all of its dangerous consequences; so that in a case like the present, where the testimony of three witnesses stands in direct contradiction of a single witness, the probabilities are so overwhelmingly in favor of the truth of the evidence of the three that it must be believed.

The weight of the oral evidence on the point in dispute is very strongly against the complainant; and unless his case is supported by some other kind of evidence it is manifest that his bill must be dismissed.

There is other evidence. The complainant has a receipt, signed by the defendant, acknowledging the payment of $320 "for 126 choice hickory trees of his (the complainant's) selection." If the defendant had written this receipt himself it would furnish very strong if not conclusive evidence that the price agreed upon was $320. Neither of the parties, however, wrote it. The contract was made during the afternoon of the first day of March, 1886. As soon as it was concluded, the complainant handed the defendant $10 to bind the bargain, and then went to his house, about four miles distant, to get the money he had there to make an additional payment. While at his house, his wife, at his request, wrote the receipt; he then returned to the defendant's house and paid him $300, making $310 in all, and procured the defendant's signature to the receipt.

If the defendant signed the receipt clearly understanding that it stated the price of the trees to be $320, he should be held to be corcluded by it. He swears that he did not so understand it. He is about seventy years of age and cannot read without the aid of glasses. He says that his glasses at this time were broken, so that they were useless, and that he tried to read the receipt without them, but could not. He also says that even with the aid of glasses he cannot read written matter understandingly until he has first had an opportunity to study it.

It is admitted that the complainant read the receipt to the defendant or pretended to do so; but the defendant and his daughter both say that he did not mention any sum, but read the paper as though it merely stated that the complainant had purchased of the defendant 126 trees. The receipt is confessedly inaccurate. It admits a payment of $10 that was not made. It is a receipt for $320, but the complainant confesses he only paid $310.

If the amount stated in the receipt had been read so that the defendant clearly understood that, if he signed it, he would admit the payment of $10 which had not been paid, it is almost absolutely certain that he would have called attention to the fact that the amount was erroneous and asked to have it corrected.

But nothing of that kind seems to have occurred. No allusion was made by either party, so far as the evidence shows, to the fact that the sum stated in the receipt was in excess of the sum actually paid. And this circumstance serves, in my judgment, to show, either that the sum was not mentioned, or, if it was, that the defendant did not fully comprehend its meaning, for I regard it as entirely certain that no man having sufficient capacity to understand such a transaction would sign a paper of this kind, which he knew to be erroneous, and which he also knew contained an admission against his interest, without at least calling attention to its error. He would do that, if for no other purpose, to show that he knew what he was doing.

But there is other evidence tending very strongly to show, as I think, that the defendant did not understand, at the time he signed the receipt, that it fixed the price of the trees at $320. The receipt was signed on Monday. The next day the defendant heard that the complainant claimed that he had purchased the trees for $320. On Wednesday the defendant sent his son-in-law to complainant, to tell him that he heard that the complainant had claimed that he had purchased the trees for a price less than that which he understood the complainant had agreed to pay, and also to tell the complainant that he wanted to see him. The complainant did not call until the following Saturday. The defendant then told the complainant that the price he was to receive for the trees was $420; that that was the price the complainant had offered and that he had agreed to accept. The complainant denied this, declaring that all he had offered was $320, and that that was the sum for which the defendant had agreed to sell; but he made no allusion to the receipt. He did not say: "Why there should be no dispute between us about this matter, you know we had not only a distinct understanding about the price, but you afterwards gave me a receipt which I read to you, and which you know states the price to be $320."

If the defendant's signature to the receipt had been procured in the manner in which the complainant states it was; if he had read it to the defendant so that he understood it, the receipt was the complainant's strongest and best witness, and the one to whom he would almost involuntarily have made his first and most confident appeal. But he did not mention it nor did he take it with him. Although he knew that the defendant disputed the correctness of the price stated in the receipt, and that the defendant wanted to see him, to see whether the misunderstanding on that subject could not be cleared up, yet when he went to see the defendant he left his receipt at home. He went without the instrument, which, if it had been procured in the way he says he procured it, would at once have disproved and utterly overthrown the defendant's claim of mistake.

It should also be remarked in this connection that the evidence of the complainant is not entitled to receive the consideration which would be given to the testimony of an unimpeached witness. His testimony on the most vital point of the case has been contradicted by such a volume of opposing evidence as to make it the duty of the court to discard his evidence; and this fact necessarily weakens the force of his evidence upon every disputed point.

On a full view of the whole case, my conclusion is that the weight of the proofs, by a decided preponderance, is against the truth of the allegation on which the complainant's right to relief rests.

His bill must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

v.

The HUNTERDON COUNTY MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

The defendant reinsured all its risks, and had a large sum of money in the treasury, being the proceeds of cash payments by the then present and also past policy holders, and the interest upon the investments thereof, which sum has been of about the same amount for several years. Held, that all the policy holders who contributed to such sum are entitled to a proportion thereof according to the amount of their payments, whether they continued to be policy holders at the period of distribution or not.

(Filed June 12, 1890.)

BILL to compel the distribution of the surplus funds in the treasury of an insurance company, among the policy holders who contributed to such funds. On bill and answer. Decree in accordance with prayer of bill advised.

The facts are stated by the Vice Chancellor.

Messrs. W. A. Hayhurst and A. G. Richey, for complainant.

Messrs. C. A. Skillman and John H. Stewart, for defendant,

Bird, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

The Hunterdon County Mutual Fire Insurance Co. was organized in the year 1845, by virtue of an Act of the Legislature of that year, as a mutual company. Twenty years later its powers and privileges were extended. In 1865 its directors conceived that it would be better to reinsure all risks and make distribution of the money then in the treasury. A meeting of the policy holders was called for March 5, 1865. At that meeting a resolution was adopted authorizing the directors to reinsure and to make distribution of any surplus. Reinsurance was effected. A large sum of money was then in the treasury and had been for several years. This sum arose from premiums paid in excess of the demands upon the Company for losses and expenses, and from interest on such excess.

June 29, 1865, the board directed a committee to make distribution of these funds among the policy holders in proportion to the amount of their respective policies held at the time of reinsurance. A majority of the committee was about to make distribution, when one member filed his bill to restrain them from making distribution among those only who were policy holders at the time of reinsurance; because to limit such distribution to those only would be inequitable and unjust; since many others, perchance, who were not then policy holders, had contributed as much as, and in many cases more than, many who were. An injunction was allowed, and the sole question is: Are policy holders who contributed to the fund now in the treasury entitled to share in the distribution thereof, although their policies expired a day, or a month, or a year, or five years before the time of reinsurance? Are the present holders to reap the only benefit of the management or mismanagement which rendered it advisable, if not necessary, to reinsure?

What principle shall guide the court? Will it be just to declare that those who come in the last moment and were members but a day, shall take all the profits made by those who had been members for five or ten years, but were not at the time of reinsurance? Did they earn this fund either by their labor or by their investments? Clearly, if the court allows the present policy holders to take all the surplus, it will be permitting the contributions of many to benefit the few.

What was the contract? It was a mutual obligation to share losses by fire. And to make the contract as absolutely certain as possible, the amount supposed to be necessary for that purpose was required to be paid in advance. But a mutual obligation to share losses was not all; this mutuality extended to an equal distribution of any surplus. The cash paid or advanced was not paid to protect some future policy holder against loss, or to enable him to draw out of the treasury more than all his premiums, but simply to insure the existing policy holders against loss. That is the venture; that is the contract. The members for the time being bind themselves each to the other only; not to any third persons; not to those who may become members afterwards, and when their policy shall have expired. The money paid by the members for the time being, is a trust fund held for themselves only, and to divert it to the profit of others is a plain breach of trust.

But it is said that this obligation to make mutual distribution must necessarily be limited to those who are members at the period of distribution. It is insisted that no one can be recognized except members, and that by the provisions of the charter, no one can be considered a member for any purpose except those who have a living, running policy. Why should this be so in reason? The policy holders whose terms expired a day, a month, or a year before the reinsurance had, at the time of such expiration, an interest in the surplus then in the treasury. Part of such surplus was their money actually paid in by them. And I cannot doubt but that they could have compelled the recognition of their right to it. That interest they did not assign or transfer. The directors had no right to assign it, or make any disposition of it except to pay it out for losses arising during the period of time covered by the policy. Clearly the right to such fund was in the policy holders for the time being, and it remained in them. I cannot see that change of time or circumstance has worked a devolution of the fund. Are not the members of such mutual insurance company, in this respect, if in no other, like the members of a copartnership? When a partner retires, without more, he does not forfeit to those who remain, or to new members, the profits of the trade or the capital invested; such profits and capital remain his as certainly as before. The fact that he does not withdraw them when he himself withdraws, or before, cannot change the legal liability of those who remain. The continuing firm is indebted to him, at that instant, for his share of profits and capital, and remain so until some legal bar—such as payment, release, or statutory limitation—be interposed. This reasoning is not in conflict with the doctrine established in Mut. Benefit Life Ins. Co. v. Hillyard, 8 Vroom, 444.

Again, as intimated, it is urged that, by the charter, all persons cease to be members when their policy expires; and that, this being so, all rights or claims cease also. As all men well know, this is not exactly the law. The holder of a policy does not lose his right to recover for loss sustained at any time before the expiration thereof simply because it has so expired. His right to present his claim, to maintain his suit, and to enforce his judgment is every day verified. And such right is not abridged because he ceases to be liable for subsequent losses.

It is to be remembered this Company is a mutual, not a stock company. And I also remember that it has been declared that policy holders in a mutual company stand in the same relation to each other that stockholders do in a stock company. Certainly stockholders for the time being take all dividends. And it is as certain that, if there be funds in the treasury to make dividends, the court will compel them to be declared. And this would seem to be a fair representation of the rights of the policy holder in a mutual company. When the time for settlement comes, when the period for which a member engaged to share in the risk has ended, then he is entitled, as such policy holder or such joint-stock holder, to a share of what remains of the whole fund contributed by the several members to make the venture good. But it is still urged that at the dissolution of a stock company the then existing stockholders take all the assets. This is true; but it does not militate against what seems to me to be the wise and equitable rule in the other case. The stockholder takes his share of the assets in the end, in accordance with the contract. That was the agreement whenever made, whether ten or fifty or a hundred years before.

In a stock company the stock is issued for the whole period of the company's existence. In a mutual, the policy (the stock) is issued for a limited period—a certain number of years only. Either may be assigned, but one for the existence of the company, and the other for the life of the policy. In the one a certain number of shares represent the worth of the company and its business; in the other a certain number of policies; the former generally remain the same in number, though they may increase or diminish in value; while the latter fluctuates, the number of policies being liable to be much greater at sometimes than at others.

And it is claimed that because the owners of the stock in a joint-stock company take all the assets at the dissolution, the owners of policies take all at the period of final dissolution of a mutual company. The inference is not exactly correct reasoning. I admit that the time of dissolution is the time of distribution; but think that while there can be but one time of dissolution for a stock company, there are as many times for dissolution of a mutual as the recurrence of times for the expiration of policies. In other words, whenever a policy expires, a dissolution is effected as between the rest and the holder of that policy. And at such time he is entitled to his share of the assets, if, under the management during the period he was such policy holder (such stockholder), there be any. If I take any other view of the case, I find myself going against reason and fair dealing, and taking the money which was given and held in trust for one and giving it to others.

In my judgment, every policy which has been issued by the Company since the year 1876, on which a premium has been paid and which has not been forfeited, should be represented in making distribution of the surplus now on hand, and the respective owners and holders thereof receive their fair proportion. I think this proportion should be ascertained upon the basis of premiums paid rather than the amount of reinsurance covered by the policy. For premiums increase by time and amount and are regulated accordingly. A policy for $5,000 for five years would be worth less than for ten years. And besides the premium is the amount actually paid, and this seems to render it the proper basis of calculation. See Carrollton v. Southern Mutual Ins. Co. 72 Ga. 371; S. C. 18 Rep. 75; and 13 Ins. Law Jour. 565.

In my judgment the court would not be justified in lending its countenance to a principle which would enable stockholders and directors, at a favorable opportunity, to divide among themselves the surplus in the treasury, the cash accumulations of years. In my judgment the court would not be justified in taking the cash payments made by former policy holders and giving them to present policy holders.

I will advise a reference to a master to ascertain and report the amount of money now in the treasury of the defendant Company, and who the policy holders have been since the year 1876, and the amounts due on each policy according to the principles above stated.

ENGLAND'S EXRS., Petitioners,

v.

The Daniel F. BEATTY ORGAN & PIANO COMPANY.

- *1. The president of a manufacturing corporation is not entitled to the lien given by the Act for what he earns while serving the company as president.
2. He is a member of the corporation as well as an officer, and therefore is part of the head or force which employs, and cannot be both employer and employee, as the Act now stands.
3. To give a preference to the members of a corporation for sums claimed by them for services would be against the true spirit of the Act and against public policy.

(Filed May 28, 1886.)

PETITION to establish a lien for wages.
Dismissed.

The facts are stated by the Vice Chancellor. Messrs. Barkalow, Pennington & Beam, for petitioners.

Mr. G. A. Hobart, for receiver.

Bird, V. C., delivered the following opinion: The petitioners say that their testator was the president of the Daniel F. Beatty Organ & Piano Company for several months before his death, and that during that time he rendered it very valuable services for which he got no compensation, although he expected to receive about $1,000 per month; and that a receiver was appointed under the statute in such case provided; and they insist that, under such statute, they are entitled to such compensation as said testator earned as one of the employees of said Company.

Reference was made to a master, who reported that the said testator was entitled at the time of his death, and that his executors are now entitled, to $3,750 for services rendered to said Company by said testator while president of it. The question is upon the confirmation of this report.

The statute (Rev. 188, § 63) provides "that in case of the insolvency of any corporation the laborers in the employ thereof shall have a lien upon the assets thereof for the amount of wages due to them respectively, which shall be paid prior to any other debt or debts of said company; and the word 'laborers' shall be construed to include all persons doing labor or service of whatever character for, or as workmen or employees in the regular employ of, such corporation."

Is the president of a corporation, when engaged in and about the business of his company, whatever its character may be, a laborer within the contemplation of the Act? Does the Act fairly mean to embrace one or all of the members of the company as well as all or any others who may be employed by it? Can the members of a corporation employ themselves respectively, and, in case of failure, stand upon the statute for any compensation that may be due?

The president of a corporation, under the Act, is and must be a director. He is part and parcel of the organization. There must be employer as well as employed; and the question arises: Does the Act authorize the organization, which is the employer, to employ itself? Does the statute mean to go so far as to empower the directors of a corporation to employ themselves, as the workmen and laborers, to do all the work and labor necessary to be done, and then, in case of insolvency, to give them the statutory lien, and to prefer them to all the general creditors? I cannot so understand the Act. I think, under our statute, every court would do nothing more than place every such creditor upon the same footing as the general creditor. I cannot perceive any reason for giving the slightest advantage to those under whose management such a concern is wrecked.

I am well satisfied that to make favorites of this class would be against the true spirit of the Act as well as against a wise public policy. The spirit of the Act is manifestly to pay "laborers," "doing labor or service of whatever character for, or as workmen or employees in the regular employ of, such corporation," and not to give a preference to the individual members of the corporation; and not that they may employ themselves and maintain both attitudes, employer or employee, as their individual gain and the loss of creditors may dictate. And as to the public policy of so extending the construction as is urged, let it be considered how strong the inducement, as well as how convenient, for every director to be employed, "doing labor or service as a workman or employee" for his company; and let it also be considered what a prolific source of injustice and fraud such construction would prove to be. There are numerous considerations in this direction which will arise to the mind of the thoughtful.

It has been pressed upon my attention that in this very case the secretary of the Company has been preferred to the extent of his claim. What was the relation of the secretary to the Company besides being secretary (that is whether he was a director or not) does not appear. The secretary and treasurer need not be directors, but the Act provides that the directors shall elect one of their own number president.

As the Act under consideration is worded I cannot see my way clear to advise that the president is entitled to a preference over general creditors for what may be due to him for services rendered while acting in that capacity.

I think the petition should be dismissed with costs.

after filing his bill to bring the defendant into court, his laches may be regarded as an abandonment of his suit; and his bill may, for that reason, be dismissed.

MOTION to dismiss bill for want of prosecution. Overruled.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas B. Harned, for motion.

Mr. Joseph Coult, contra.

Van Fleet, V. C., delivered the following opinion:

The defendants move to dismiss the complainant's bill for want of prosecution. The bill was filed April 28, 1885.

On filing his bill, the complainant obtained an order to show cause why an injunction should not issue, and on the return of this order, the defendants answered such parts of the bill as they deemed necessary to show that an injunction should not be granted. The questions thus raised were then discussed; and on the 21st day of May, 1885, they were decided, an injunction being refused.

So far as the record now shows, no order denying the injunction has as yet been entered. On the 5th of May, 1886, the defendants gave notice that they would move the court, on the 10th of the same month, to dismiss the complainant's bill. Their motion is made under § 30 of the Rules, which ordains that if a suit be suffered to lie without prosecution for one year it shall be considered abandoned, and the bill may be dismissed.

The motion is premature. When the notice of the motion to dismiss was given, the suit had not lain without prosecution for one year. As already stated, the complainant's application for an injunction was not decided until May 21, 1885. It was argued a few days before that date, but up to the time the decision was made, the complainant was ceaselessly prosecuting his application. While his application remained in the hands of the court for consideration, his prosecution did not cease, but was constantly going on. In no case should a suitor be held responsible for the delay which may ensue while his case is under consideration by the court. The complainant here prosecuted his suit regularly and vigorously up to the 21st of May, 1885; and this motion, having been made in less than a year after that date, is not entitled to prevail.

On the argument it was stated that the defendants were not yet in court so as to be answerable to a decree, the claim being that they have not been served with process; nor has the court acquired jurisdiction over them in any other way, so that it may lawfully make a decree against them. If this is true, the complainant's bill should be dismissed. If he has for over a year after filing his bill neglected to notify the defendants of the institution of his suit, and to call upon them, in the manner prescribed by law, to make defense, his laches for so long a period should be regarded as plenary evidence that he had abandoned his suit. Except in certain cases it is irregular for a complainant to issue subpoena for the defendants to answer before the bill is filed; but it is as soon as his bill is filed subpoena should issue. Crowell v. Botsford, 1 C. E. Green, 458.

Chancellor Williamson, in Lee v. Cargill, 2 Stock. 331, held that it should be exacted of every complainant that he use due diligence in expediting his cause. A suitor in a court of equity is required to exercise reasonable diligence in matters of practice, as well as in other matters. Laches are always discountenanced by courts of conscience. It has been said that nothing will call forth the activity of a court of equity, but conscience, good faith and reasonable diligence.

An inspection of the record in this case shows however that the defendants, on whose behalf this motion is made, are already in court. An appearance was entered for them on the 28d of May, 1885, in the name of the solicitor who makes this motion. But he says it was entered without his authority and also without his knowledge. Take that to be so; still, I think the complainant was justified in treating the defendants as in court. In the absence of notice to the contrary, he had a right to believe that the record was true, and that the defendants had procured their appearance to be entered to dispense with the necessity of bringing them into court by the service of process or otherwise. The entry of an appearance for a defendant carries with it a presumption that it was entered by his authority. If the contrary be alleged, affirmative proof must be produced; and until it is the defendant will be treated as properly in court. Gifford v. Thorn, 1 Stock. 723.

As the record now stands, the defendants must be considered in court. There is nothing before the court, which can be regarded as evidence, tending to show that their appearance was entered without authority. Their solicitor says it was, but his unsworn statement is not evidence. The question whether or not the defendants are in court, so that the court may make a valid decree against them, in case it shall appear that the complainant is entitled to a decree, should be settled at once. The record shows that they are in court. If they mean to dispute the record they should do so without delay. They may do so by applying to have the appearance, entered for them, expunged from the record. Twenty days will be allowed for that purpose. If they do not apply within that time, their right to make such application will be considered waived, and they will be considered and treated as properly in court.

The complainant has been guilty of negligence, but while his laches have not been so great as to entitle the defendants to the dismissal of his bill, they have been sufficient to make it the duty of the court to direct his future movements in the prosecution of his suit. But no such direction can be given until after the time allowed the defendants to show that they are not in court has expired.

The direction to be given must, in a large degree, depend upon how that question shall be decided, and should therefore be deferred for the present.

DOMESTIC TELEGRAPH & TELEPHONE COMPANY, Complainant,

METROPOLITAN TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH COMPANY et al.

* The complainant entered into a written contract with the Bell Telephone Co. of New York, by which the former was licensed to use the Bell Telephone in the district composed of the city of Newark and the townships of Harrison and Kearney for the term of five years, with an express stipulation that if, at the end of the term, the Bell Company did not desire to run the district itself or to merge it with any other, "but should desire to have such business conducted for it, then the party of the second part (the complainant) shall have the first right of acquiring the license or agency to conduct such business, at such rate or rental and upon such terms as may then be fixed and determined by the party of the first part;" the bill of complaint was amended showing a subsequent parol agreement containing a promise to the complainant that if it would pay the cost price of the Western Union plant in its district, its license should be renewed for five years, with other conditions or provisions. Held:

(a) That when in a contract there is a clause which provides that one of the parties shall have the first right to a new contract (not a renewal of the existing one), upon such terms as shall be fixed upon by the other party, and during the continuance of such contract, new terms are added upon the assurance that such clause gives the right to review or will fully protect the right to review, a court of equity ought to enforce such contract, and secure its renewal to the party to whom such promise is made, if the terms contemplated in the clause giving such first right have been fixed, or any principle acknowledged by the parties to be bound by which they can be ascertained.

(b) That in this case there was a distinct verbal promise to renew upon the conditions named.

(Filed May 6, 1886.)

BILL for injunction and specific performance. Decree advised accordingly.

The facts are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Messrs. Thomas N. McCarter and Henry Young, for complainant.

Messrs. James McMorro and J. D. Bedle, for defendants:

This case as now prosecuted is an entire departure from that as originally made.

* Head notes by BIRD, V. C.

the only party that was to assume any responsibility under it was that Company, the Bedford & Bridgeport Railroad Company being utterly insolvent and its bonds, without the guaranty, being worthless.

"The proposition was accepted by Mr. Morgan, and assented to by a sufficient number of those for whom he agreed to act, to make it binding; the securities were delivered to him, but had not come into the hands of the stockholders when the injunction was issued.

"Counsel for defendants earnestly contend that these facts show that the Pennsylvania Company is the party agreeing to purchase the stock and securities and stipulating for the control of the South Pennsylvania Railroad Company. We have carefully considered all the arguments so ably advanced in support of this theory, but we cannot avoid coming to the conclusion that, as argued for the Commonwealth, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company is the real party in the transaction. This is clearly shown by the testimony of Mr. Morgan and Mr. Roberts. Morgan testifies that, on his suggesting to Mr. Roberts that 'the thing could be carried through' if the Pennsylvania Railroad Company was prepared to give bonds bearing 3 per cent interest for the amount paid in on the South Pennsylvania stock subscriptions, Mr. Roberts 'doubted the policy or the ability of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, as such, to buy off or in any way to interfere with what might be rival roads;' whereupon, Morgan 'suggested that there were plenty of corporations that would do it and that would work in harmony with the Pennsylvania.'

"And again he says: 'The only thing that was stipulated was that the security that should be given to the subscribers should bear the absolute guaranty of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. As to what company it came from or anything of the kind, that was of course immaterial.' And again: 'I addressed Mr. Roberts because I was acting in harmony in trying to get this road out of the way of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. It was the Pennsylvania Railroad that was complaining of the construction of the road;' and he assented to the statement that the negotiations were based on this idea.

"And Mr. Roberts states frankly that they came to 'talk about' the Pennsylvania Company, in this negotiation, 'simply because the character of the securities and the condition of the South Pennsylvania Road were such that it would in all probability be beyond the chartered powers of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to build it or to purchase the securities. * * * And he answered in the affirmative, without comment or explanation, the following question of the Attorney-General: 'Therefore, as I understand you, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company was the party to this negotiation; but so far as the details of carrying it out were concerned, and to be within the law, you were to use the name of the Pennsylvania Company, or any other company that you were connected with that you might be able to do?' And he further says that 'for all purposes of the transactions that were then going on, or discussion there had, it would be fair and proper to assume that I was president of, and being conversed with as president of, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company.'

"And, as we have already seen in the letter of August 5, signed by him as president of the Pennsylvania Company, he contracts on behalf of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company that the bonds to be delivered shall bear its guaranty, and that, if the principal of the bonds shall mature, it will replace them or at its option pay them in cash; these being the only two clauses in the contract which involved the giving of anything in value.

"In view of this plain and candid statement of the real facts of the case by the parties themselves, it is impossible, as we have already said, to draw any other inference than that the real party contracting and stipulating for the control of the South Pennsylvania Railroad Company was the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and that any title to any stock or securities intended to be held in the name of the Pennsylvania Company was to be a mere naked legal title, to be held in trust. In other words, that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company intended to do in fact what it feared it was forbidden by law to do, and therefore attempted to give the transaction the appearance, in the eye of the law, of being other than it really was. This, of course, cannot avail in a court of equity, which looks at substance without being controlled by form.

"It is further strenuously urged, on behalf of defendants, that even if the Pennsylvania Railroad Company be the real party to the contract, it has not done or stipulated for anything prohibited by the Constitution, for the reason that the purchase of the stock of a 'parallel or competing line' is not among the things prohibited; and the case of Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Mo. Pacific R. Co., recently decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and not yet reported, is cited to sustain the proposition that the ownership of the stock of a corporation does not give control of the corporation.

"We have carefully considered the opinion delivered in that case, which, although not of binding authority upon the state courts, because not deciding a federal question, is yet, in view of its source, entitled to the highest respect. But we do not think it sustains the position contended for. The decision of the question of control was not called for in the case, which was already decided on another and a fundamental point. But, waiving this, the point decided is, merely, that the ownership of the stock does not necessarily give control of the road. The Chief Justice says, speaking of the stockholding company: 'Practically, it may control the company, but the company alone controls its road.' [Bk. 29, L. ed. 502.] This distinction seems very narrow, but it is certainly involved in the conclusion reached, which cannot stand unless it is recognized, for it is too plain to bear argument that the ownership of the stock of a corporation carries with it the control of the corporation. Indeed, this is merely a different way of stating the truism that a corporation is controlled by its stockholders. That they do it through the agency of a board of directors and other officers does not alter the fact.

"All this was well understood by Mr. Roberts, as is shown by the stipulation that the capital stock to be assigned 'shall be adequate to insure the control of the Corporation of the South Pennsylvania Railroad Company;' and the intention to control is shown by the condition in the contract that the things to be assigned were 'the securities and contracts and control of the South Pennsylvania Railroad enterprise;' and the further condition that the assignment of the securities and stock should be accompanied by 'the resignation of all the directors and officers of the said South Pennsylvania Railroad and American Construction Companies, and of a majority of the committee of said syndicate, and the substitution in their stead of persons to be indicated by Mr. Roberts or his nominee.' Not only was the South Pennsylvania to be controlled, but also the company having the contract for the construction of its road; and as to this, its entire capital stock was to be obtained, 'free from all debts and contracts of any kind whatever.' This would insure not only control of the Railroad Corporation as it then stood, but also the power to abrogate the contract then held by the construction company for the building of the road.

"We have found as a fact that the line of the South Pennsylvania Railroad Company connects at Port Perry with the line of the Pittsburgh, McKeesport and Youghiogheny Railroad Company, and that it has a traffic contract with that company giving it access to Pittsburgh. A line running from Harrisburg to Port Perry could hardly be said to be a 'parallel or competing line' to and with the Pennsylvania Railroad; although if extended from Port Perry to Pittsburgh it certainly would be such. But defendants contend that the fact of the traffic contracts ought not to be taken into consideration, and that as the line of the South Pennsylvania does not itself extend to Pittsburgh, we must conclude that this corporation does not own or control a parallel or competing line.

"We are unable to adopt this view. The traffic contract gives it the right to use the Youghiogheny Road between Port Perry and Pittsburgh. Section 1 of article XVII of the Constitution secures it the right to have its cars received and transferred over all railroads in the State with which it may connect; we cannot doubt that it would in fact compete; and it is competition in fact which the Constitution designs to encourage, as it was competition in fact which the defendants were endeavoring in this case to prevent, and which they knew would occur over this line if it were not "'taken out" of the railroad situation,' to use Mr. Morgan's expressive phrase.

"But the argument was earnestly pressed upon us that the prohibition of the Constitution applies only to a corporation owning or having under its control a railroad completed and in operation; that in the nature of things there can be no competition in transportation when there is no road over which to transport. The Constitution forbids a railroad corporation to 'in any way control any other railroad * * * corporation having under its control a parallel or competing line,' not parallel or competing railroad; and we cannot doubt that the word 'line' was employed advisedly, in this place, instead of 'road' or 'railroad.' It is the term constantly used to denote the route of an intended railroad. Thus, in section 2, Act of February 19, 1849, relating to the assessment of damages for lands taken, it is provided that viewers may be appointed, 'neither of whom shall be residents or owners of property upon or adjoining the "line" of such railroad,' where manifestly the term 'line' is used to designate the surveyed route, and not the completed road, as the view may be had before the road is constructed. So in section 2, Act of Congress of July 29, 1866, incorporating the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, the company is authorized 'to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of road, material of earth, stone, timber and so forth, for the construction thereof.'

"These are random instances of a use of the term which is so common as to leave no doubt as to its meaning in the clause of the Constitution under consideration. And, understanding this meaning, we are bound to give it due force and effect. If we do not, the purpose of the Constitutional Convention in enacting the clause, and of the people in ratifying it, might always be and in this case would be entirely defeated. The purpose undoubtedly was to promote competition in railroad traffic. But if a corporation engaged in constructing a competitive road may be controlled by its rival until the road is completed, it would be entirely within the power of the rival to determine whether that event should ever happen; as of course it never would, when it was the interest of the rival to prevent it, for no company would complete a road to hand it over to a competitor.

"For these reasons we think the proper construction of the phrase, a 'parallel or competing line,' is that it includes a projected road, surveyed, laid out and in process of construction, as we have found to be the fact in this case; if such road when completed and in operation would actually compete with the road seeking control. Before completion it is 'parallel;' when completed it becomes 'competing.'

"During the argument counsel invoked the aid of the undoubted general principle that the ownership of shares of stock, as of other property, carries with it the legal right to sell, and contended that the owners of the shares of the South Pennsylvania Railroad Company could not legally be restrained from so doing, and that an injunction against the purchaser would have this effect.

"We do not think the principle applies to this case. We are not called upon to express any opinion as to the right of the individual shareholders to sell their several shares bona fide in the open market. This, so far as they are concerned, is an intended sale in combination for the express purpose of enabling them to abandon the rights and duties conferred and imposed upon them by the Act incorporating the company, and of putting the control of their corporation into the hands of its rival. This is an act contrary to the public policy of the State, which they have no right to do.

"Indeed, all the parties to this transaction seemed to have failed to appreciate the relations they sustain to the public. A charter is a contract, and a contract must always have two contracting parties, upon each of whom it imposes duties as well as confers rights. The charter of a railroad company especially, while it confers and because it confers rights of the highest kind, imposes corresponding duties. It invests the corporation with part of the sovereignty of the State, the right to take private property for (let it be clearly understood) public use. But if the taking of private property for the purpose of constructing a railroad upon it is taking it for public use, then the public must have an interest in such use. And such is the case. 'A railroad is a public highway for the public benefit. * * * The public has an interest in such a road when it belongs to a corporation, as clearly as they would have if it were free. * * * The companies may be private but the work they do is a public duty; and along with the public duty there is delegated a sufficient share of sovereign power to perform it. The right of eminent domain is always given to such corporations, but the right of eminent domain cannot be used for private purposes. * * *' Sharpless v. Mayor, 21 Pa. 169.

"The right of eminent domain nowhere justifies taking property for a private use. Yet it is a doctrine universally accepted that a State Legislature may authorize a private corporation to take land for the construction of such a road, making compensation to the owner. What else does this doctrine mean if not that building a railroad, though it be built by a private corporation, is an act done for a public use? And the reason why the use has always been held a public one is that such a road is a highway, whether made by the government itself or by the agency of corporate bodies.' Olcott v. Superintendents, 16 Wall. 694 [83 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 382], per Mr. Justice Strong.

"And the same eminent jurist, when a Justice of the Supreme Court of this State, said of an unfinished railroad that 'the Commonwealth had a right to demand that all the resources, rights and credits of the company should be devoted to its completion;' and that the directors of a railroad corporation are 'trustees, in a very just sense, for the Commonwealth.' Bedford R. R. Co. v. Bousier, 48 Pa. 29.

"But, as our purpose here is to show, merely, that the parties to the transaction were not dealing with a purely private matter, we will not pursue this subject further. Nor are we now concerned with the question whether there be power in the courts to compel the construction of a railroad by a corporation which has undertaken it. What we here decide is, simply, that the corporators have no such right to sell their stock as can in any way interfere with the granting of an injunction to prevent a competing corporation from obtaining control of the corporation charged with the duty of its construction.

We have not overlooked any of the questions argued by counsel; but in our view the case does not call for the decision of any other than those considered above. The result of the discussion is that the injunction must be continued as to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the Pennsylvania Company, and the Bedford & Bridgeport Railroad Company, and dissolved as to the other defendants; and a decree may be drawn accordingly."

A decree was entered January 27, 1866, continuing the injunction until final hearing, enjoining the Pennsylvania Railroad Company from purchasing, directly or indirectly, or obtaining in any manner control of the stock, franchises and property of the said South Pennsylvania Railroad Company, or in any manner from controlling said stock, property and franchises; and further that you and they do absolutely refrain from guarantying or in any manner becoming responsible for either principal or interest of any bonds or other obligations of the South Pennsylvania Railroad Company or of any other corporation, etc.; restraining the Bedford & Bridgeport Railroad Company from issuing or, if issued, from delivering, either directly or through any other corporation or person, any of the above named mortgage or debenture bonds, or other obligations; and restraining the Pennsylvania Company from delivering, either directly or through any other corporation or person, any of the above named mortgage or debenture bonds, or other obligations.

The assignment of errors specified the action of the court: 1, in entering the decree of January 27, 1866, against the appellants; 2, in not defining in said decree the meaning of the word "control" used therein; and 3, in seeking by a preliminary injunction to undo what had been completely done before the filing of said bill.

The amendment of the Constitution of 1838 was a grant to the "Legislature" of all the power "to alter, revoke or amend any charter of incorporation hereafter conferred * * * whenever, in their opinion, it may be injurious to the citizens of the Commonwealth."

It being legitimate for the Legislature to grant such a right to the Pennsylvania Company, it does not fall within the class of cases where the courts have held that as to public morals in regulating the sale of whisky, or gambling, or lotteries, and the like, no Legislature can bargain away the power to regulate and even to wholly abolish.

Stone v. Miss. 101 U. S. 814 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 1079).

That any relation lawfully assumed in nowise changes corporate powers and duties is illustrated further in the case of Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Sly, 65 Pa. 207.

If the right of property, incident to the lawful ownership of stock, is taken from the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the Declaration of Rights is violated.

Art. I, § 10, Const. 1874.

The reasoning in Commonwealth v. Pittsburg & C. R. Co. 53 Pa. 47, shows how this clause has been maintained.

There is an express intention in the present Constitution to preserve all laws existing prior thereto, and to save all contract rights previously accrued, although it would be now in conflict.

Sec. 2, schedule to Constitution; Parkins v. Slack, 86 Pa. 270.

Article XVII, § 4 of the Constitution of 1874 does not include any influence arising from the ownership of stock. This is made apparent from the use of appropriate words in section 12 of article XVI, where it was sought to include stock in the consolidation of telegraph companies.

It is to be read as limiting the application of prior lawful methods of securing lines of railroad.

If the Pennsylvania Company was the lawful owner of stock, its motives are not the subject of inquiry; it is a question of the exercise of a legal power. If that exists, it fulfills the law; if that fails, the motive is of no avail.

The repeal or withdrawal of such powers could be effected, either by legislative action, or in the form of a constitutional provision subsequently adopted.

Pa. R. R. Co. v. Duncan, 2 Cent. Rep. 551.

The Constitution has modified the Act so as to prohibit the acquisition of stock and securities, with a view to control competing lines.

Art. XVII, § 4, Const. 1874.

The opinion of the learned judge presents a clear interpretation of what is a parallel or competing line.

The Street Passenger Railway Cases cited do not touch the question, Judge Mitchell expressly holding, in Guyger's Appeal, 15 W. N. C. 513, that "Article XVII of the Constitution, prohibiting the leasing of parallel and competing railroads and canals, did not apply to or include what are known as passenger railways."

The debentures are void because they are not authorized by the Bedford & Bridgeport charter.

Act of March 31, 1868; P. L. 1870, p. 1860.

They are also void because they are fictitious increase of stock.

Art. XVI, § 7, Const. 1874.

The consolidation of competing lines of railroad is against the public policy of the State and will be restrained and set aside by a court of equity.

Central R. R. Co. v. Collins, 40 Ga. 532; Hartford, etc. R. R. Co. v. New York & N. H. R. R. Co. 3 Robt. 411; Thomas v. West Jersey R. R. Co. 101 U. S. (Bk. 25, L. ed. 950). See also, Currier v. Co. 50 Ind. 85; Steinart v. Erie etc. Transportation Co. 17 Minn. 372.

The constitutional provision under consideration in this controversy is within the police power of the State, which cannot be bargained away and to which all charter contracts are subject.

"Irrevocable grants of property and franchises may be made, if they do not impair the supreme authority to make laws for the right government of the State; but no Legislature can curtail the power of its successors to make such laws as they may deem proper in matters of police."

A railroad company negotiated through another railroad company for the purchase of a controlling interest in the stock of a parallel or competing line, the legal title of the stock to be held by the other railroad, but the consideration coming from the competing company. A preliminary injunction to restrain the execution of the contract was granted, and a decree entered continuing the injunction until final hearing was affirmed on appeal.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Common Pleas of Dauphin County, continuing a preliminary injunction. Affirmed.

Reported below, 1 Pa. C. C. R. 223.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court below, by McPHERSON, J.:

"The motion before us is to continue the preliminary injunction heretofore granted. The opposing views of the parties have been argued with such candor and ability as befit their great importance, and it only remains to state the conclusions of the court. They are these:

"First. That the injunction must be continued until final hearing, so far as the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Northern Central Railway Company are concerned; and "Second. That the evidence before us does not require its continuance against the other defendants.

"The jurisdiction of the court to interfere by injunction was earnestly denied, and it was insisted that a writ of quo warranto was the proper remedy. This position, however, does not seem to be sound in view of the express language of section 13 of the Act of 1836, P. L. 789.

"That section, together with the Act of 1857, P. L. 89, gives to the courts of common pleas the power and jurisdiction of courts of chancery so far as relates, inter alia, 'to the prevention or restraint of the commission or continuance of acts contrary to law and prejudicial to the interests of the community or the rights of individuals.' From this provision it seems plain, and not to need discussion, that if the acts being done or proposed to be done are or would be in violation of the Constitution and prejudicial to the interests of the community, we have express authority to restrain their commission or continuance. Whether or not the remedy by quo warranto is also proper, we need not now consider.

"A considerable amount of testimony was taken, but there is substantial agreement as to all points now material. We find the important facts to be as follows:

*See preceding case, by Google

"1. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company is a railroad corporation of this Commonwealth, and leases, operates and controls the Tyrone & Clearfield Railroad and the Bald Eagle Valley Railroad, with their branches and connections. These leased roads reach portions of the Clearfield coal region in the Counties of Clearfield and Centre.

"2. The Beech Creek, Clearfield & Southwestern Railroad Company is a railroad corporation of this Commonwealth, owning and operating a practically completed line of railroad, which also reaches portions of the Clearfield coal region.

"3. The leased roads alone above mentioned are direct and substantial competitors with the Beech Creek Road for certain freight and passenger traffic in the said region.

"4. The Northern Central Railway Company is a railroad corporation, chartered in part by this Commonwealth, owning or leasing and operating a line of railroad which, so far as we are now informed, does not of itself compete with the railroad of the Beech Creek Company. It is not leased by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, but the latter company owns six thirteenths of its capital stock, and the business relations between the two companies are close and harmonious.

"5. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company, through certain of its executive officers acting in its behalf, has offered to buy 60 per cent of the capital stock of the Beech Creek Company upon the following terms, viz.: the legal title to said stock to be transferred to and held by the Northern Central Railway Company; and in consideration of such transfer, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to indorse upon $5,000,000 of the bonds of the Beech Creek Company now issued, a contract to buy at 4 per cent upon said $5,000,000 the semi-annual 6 per cent interest coupons thereof, with subrogation to the rights of the bondholders upon said coupons against the Beech Creek Company. This offer has been practically, although perhaps not formally, accepted by the owners of said 60 per cent of stock, but nothing further has yet been done, and no formal corporate action upon the proposition has yet been had. The evidence, however, warrants us in finding that the proposition will be carried into effect, if this court does not continue to prevent.

6. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company, through its said executive officers, was a principal actor in negotiating for the purchase of this stock; and the chief object of the transaction upon its part was to destroy or materially disable the direct and substantial competition between its said leased lines and the Beech Creek Road, so far as the traffic to and from certain portions of the said coal region is concerned.

"These are the important facts; and the question is whether a violation of section 4, article XVII of the Constitution, is threatened by the defendants, or by any of them? If it is, we may enjoin it, for it need not be argued that to destroy such competition as is here disclosed is prejudicial to the interests of the community.

"The section referred to, so far as now material, is as follows: 'No railroad, canal or other corporation, or the lessees, purchasers or managers of any railroad or canal corporation, shall consolidate the stock, property or franchises of such corporation with, or lease or purchase the works or franchises of, or in any way control, any other railroad or canal corporation owning or having under its control a parallel or competing line.'

"It is clear that a violation of this section would be threatened if the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, which leases certain roads directly and substantially competing with the Beech Creek Road, were about to buy and hold in its own name a majority of the stock of the latter company; for in that case the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, as such lessee, would certainly 'control another railroad corporation owning or having under its control a parallel or competing line.' It will be seen that this language differs, in an important respect, from the language lately construed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Mo. Pacific R. Co.*

"There the contract spoke of 'roads' under the control of the defendant; and it was declared that to own a majority of the stock of a railroad corporation did not give the control of the road, although it might give control of the company. Here, however, the clause of our Constitution just quoted speaks of the control of the company, not of the control of the road; and it seems evident, therefore, that the case referred to is not now in point and need not be further considered. Indeed, it was expressly conceded upon the argument that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, as the lessee of lines competing with the Beech Creek Road, could not buy this stock and hold it in its own name; but it was strongly urged upon us that the Northern Central Railway Company is to be treated as the purchaser because it is to hold the legal title, and that the question of legality must be determined as if it concerned only this latter Company and the Beech Creek Corporation.

"This is a vital point in the defense of the Pennsylvania Railroad and Northern Central Railway Companies, and we have therefore given it the fullest consideration in our power, but without being able to conclude that we must look at this bargain in any other light than that now cast upon it by the truth. The evidence does not support the position we are asked to take. The offer before us does not in fact come from the Northern Central Railway Company, but from the Pennsylvania Railroad Company through its executive officers; and we are therefore able to deal, even in form, directly with the latter company. Its officers helped to carry on the negotiations, acting in its behalf, and they agreed in its name to the final terms; it is to furnish the only consideration by guaranteeing in part the coupons of the Beech Creek bonds; and its interest, chiefly and avowedly, is to be advanced by the transaction.

"Is the further fact, that, because it cannot lawfully hold the stock it has contracted to buy, it proposes to have the legal title thereto held by the Northern Central Railway Company, enough to make of no importance the other facts detailed? The case does not even present us with a finished transaction and a legal title already passed. Up to this time, it is the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, acting by its proper executive officers, which has been directly dealing with the owners of the Beech Creek stock, and the transaction can and should be looked at as in truth it is.

"If we consider, also, the reason which led the real parties to propose that the Northern Central Railway Company should hold the legal title to this stock, it will become more clear that justice does not require us even to treat this bargain as already carried out. That reason was, avowedly, to evade the constitutional provision already quoted; and it was believed that if the legal title was held by the Northern Central Railway Company, such evasion could be brought about. We are now asked to deal with the transaction as if it was complete and thus, in effect, to aid the parties in their effort to avoid the law. They are not yet clear of legal difficulties, and we are asked to help them out by assuming the facts to be other than they are, in order that a plain provision of law may be evaded. Legal fictions are not intended for such purposes; they should only be used to bring about a just result, and not to aid in covering up the truth.

"Further, we do not think the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Northern Central Railway Companies are in a position to urge, before a court of equity, that the bargain, if fully carried out, would not violate the Constitution. The facts, again, are these: the Pennsylvania Railroad Company made the contract in question, and agreed to furnish the sole consideration, for the purpose chiefly of destroying or disabling a serious competition between its leased lines and the Beech Creek Road; that is, for the purpose of violating the Constitution; but when it appears that the illegal nature of the transaction was too plain, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company proposes, and the Northern Central Railway Company agrees, that the legal title to the stock shall be held by the latter; not because the true nature of the bargain has been changed, and not because of a change in purpose, but simply in order that such nature and such purpose may be, as it is thought, effectively disguised. Being prevented, however, by injunction, they now urge that no such purpose as that intended will in fact be brought about, and ask us to look at the matter as if the Northern Central Railway Company was the independent bona fide purchaser of the stock in question.

"When such a case is in truth presented, we will then determine the questions so earnestly and ably argued, viz.: whether such a holding by the Northern Central Railway Company would in itself violate the Constitution; and if not, whether it would nevertheless be a violation because of the relation between that Corporation and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. But we repeat, the evidence does not now permit these questions to be raised, for, with the facts as stated, the situation is quite different, and we must take it as the parties have made it for themselves. We shall not be doing injustice to the corporations named if we assume that they could do what they were willing to attempt; and they cannot successfully ask us to say that their motive and purpose were different from those which they distinctly avowed.

"If the view above expressed is correct, it fully disposes of the case, for no contract right to do the thing forbidden is set up, and it follows that the injunction against the Pennsylvania Railroad and Northern Central Railway Companies must be continued until final hearing. As to the other defendants, it is enough to say that nothing now before us requires us to consider whether in any case they are properly subject to the constitutional provision in question. As the evidence now is, at least, nothing has been proved which calls upon us to continue the injunction against them, and so far as they are concerned it is therefore dissolved.

"A decree may be prepared in accordance with this opinion."

A decree was entered, January 27, 1886, continuing the preliminary injunction until final hearing.

The assignments of error specified, inter alia, the action of the court, 1, in entering the decree of January 27, 1886; and 3, in refusing to qualify its decree against the Northern Central Railway Company so as to enjoin it only from acting in the premises as the instrument or agent of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

Mr. Wayne MacVeagh, for appellants:

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company is fully authorized to become the guarantor of the obligations above mentioned.

Act of March 17, 1869.

The public policy of the Commonwealth is to encourage the consolidation of management and interests of railroad companies.

Acts March 29, 1859; April 23, 1861; May 16, 1861; April 27, 1864; March 24, 1865; April 2, 1868; April 14, 1868; March 17, 1869; April 10, 1869, of February 17, 1870, of April 26, 1870, and of May 8, 1871.

The constitutional prohibition operates to prevent any consolidation of the stock, property or franchises; the lease of the works or franchises; the purchase of the works or franchises; or the control of a competing line. This does not include an influence arising from the ownership of stock. If it had been so intended, appropriate language would have been used, as in the case of telegraph companies.

Art. XVI, § 12, Const.

The constitutional provision, read in the light of the prior legislation, leads to the same conclusion.

Unless there be restrictions in the charter on the purchase and sale of stock the courts will not add them.

Ins. Bank v. Bank of U. S. 4 Pa. L. J. Clark's ed. 128 (125).

In State v. Hartford etc. R. R. Co. 29 Conn. 538, and the New York Case in 3 Robertson, 415, and the later cases in Georgia, Ohio, New Hampshire and New York, there was no privilege granted by law to the companies to do the thing they claimed to do.

The case in New York (reported in 12 Abb. N. C.) is a case also of an attempted consolidation of corporations which were held to be competitive in their nature, and therefore incapable, in the absence of legislative authority, to consolidate with each other; but no such question arose there as arises here.

The leading case in Pennsylvania is that of the Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co.

68 Pa. 173. The case deals with the general subject of public policy as affected by an agreement to prevent competition, but does not touch the question here raised.

The Northern Central Railway Company is not a competing line, and the injunction cannot be sustained against it, in any event. Its motives are not a subject of legal inquiry. The only question is as to the exercise of a legal power possessed by it. If such power exists, it fulfills the law; if that fails, the motive is of no avail.

Pender v. Lushington, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 70; Pa. R. R. Co's App. 80 Pa. 290.

The Supreme Court of the United States has declared the law to be that the legal meaning of "control" does not include the mere ownership of stock even when it amounts to a majority ownership, because such stock may be bought and sold at the will of one party only, and therefore has no character of permanency about it, but contemplates only control by a contractual relation of a stable and permanent character.

Pullman Car Co. v. Mo. Pacific R. Co. 115 U. S. 588 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 499).

"In the light of ordinary language, of the circumstances attending its formation, and the construction placed upon it by the people, whose bond it is" (Agnew, J., 54 Pa. 260), it is idle in construing this provision of the Constitution to say that a control resulting from an ownership of stock is not within the prohibition.

The whole scope of prior legislation relating to the consolidation and control of railroad companies in any form, whether by lease, merger, purchase of stock and bonds or otherwise, was intended to be affected by it; and whatever may have been the prior policy in that regard, it thenceforth became the policy to prohibit, in a modified degree, what it had previously encouraged.

When the people voted upon and adopted this portion of the Constitution, they intended what the language naturally and necessarily imports: a control by any means whatever, whether legal or actual.

Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Mo. Pacific R. Co. 115 U. S. 588 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 499), under its facts, has no application here. The meaning there given to the word "control" is not its true meaning as used in our Constitution.

In the first place, the court was there construing a private contract, in regard to which the rules of construction are essentially different from those applicable to constitutional interpretation.

In the second place, the "control" there considered was of the railroad and not of the company. The Chief Justice said: "It [the stock holding company] may control the company, but the company alone controls the road."

The Corporation in this case was to issue or at least use its bonds, to enable its stockholders to sell their stock. Article XVI, § 7 of the Constitution, forbids any corporation from issuing "stocks or bonds except for money, labor done, or money or property actually received."

v.

CITY OF LANCASTER.

1. To entitle one to a reward offered for the arrest and conviction of a criminal, it is necessary that the claimant should be principally instrumental in securing the arrest and conviction. It is not sufficient that he was only an instrument in the hands of others.
2. A party who, at the request of another, joins in the pursuit of a criminal and identifies him and afterwards testifies in court is not, without more, entitled to a reward.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Lancaster County, to review a judgment on a verdict for defendant in an action of assumpsit to recover a reward for the detection of incendiarism. Affirmed.

The incendiary was first pursued by one Graeff, but made his escape. A lad, about eleven years old, saw them running on the street and, after Dungan's arrest, identified him as the party who had been pursued, and testified to these facts in court.

Further facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. B. F. Davis, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. W. Johnson, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Gordon delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 17th of April, 1879, the City of Lancaster, through its mayor, John T. Macgonigle, Esq., offered a reward of $500 for the arrest and conviction of "any party or parties setting fire to buildings of any description within the limits of the City."

The plaintiff in the present suit claims this reward, alleging that he was principally instrumental in securing the arrest and conviction of one Jerry Dungan for an attempt to fire a stable or barn in the said City, belonging to George Hastings.

We agree with the learned counsel for the plaintiff, that the question was not properly whether the guilty party was convicted on the plaintiff's testimony, or upon that of others, for it was not necessary in order to entitle himself to the reward that he should have testified to any matter concerning the case.

Had he, as the detectives say, "worked up the case," that is, had he discovered and arranged the evidence which warranted Dungan's arrest, and on which he was convicted, he would have entitled himself to the reward, although he might not have appeared on the stand as a witness, and had in fact, no personal knowledge of anything tending to a proof of Dungan's guilt. The City was not offering a bonus for witnesses, but neither did it intend to reward those who might be called upon to assist in the apprehension of incendiaries. Hence, unless Rhinehart was indeed principally instrumental in the arrest and conviction of the offender he had no claim against the City, and the judgment as it now stands must be regarded as well rendered.

It requires, however, but a cursory examination of the evidence to demonstrate the utter futility of the plaintiff's suit. He neither discovered the evidence nor was he the cause of the guilty party's arrest. According to his own showing, he knew nothing about the attempt to fire the barn until Hastings informed him; and he joined the constable and others in the pursuit, at the instance of Hastings and that only because of his ability to identify Dungan as the person who was at the building about the time when Graeff discovered the roll of paper and the matches. If, then, Hastings, the owner of the property, was the person who not only gave the plaintiff the information on which he acted in assisting to make the arrest, but who also originated the pursuit, on what ground does he now found his claim against the City?

He was not the cause of the arrest; he discovered no evidence; neither did he conduct the prosecution. Had the matter rested with him, Dungan never would have been put on trial, much less convicted. What did he discover, and what did he do? He saw Dungan lounging about the premises but did not know, until he was so informed by Hastings, that Dungan had done or intended any harm, and upon being asked so to do, he joined the constable in effecting the capture of the supposed criminal. So far, then, from being the discoverer of the offender, or the moving cause of his arrest and conviction, he was himself but an instrument in the hands of others, and an unimportant one at that, for it does not appear that he materially contributed to the result.

The judgment is affirmed.

LOGAN IRON & STEEL CO.

A lessor who has, by request of the tenant, made a deep excavation on the premises for a privy well, and left it uncovered and full of water, is not liable in damages for the death of the tenant's grand child, between two and three years of age, who, visiting the tenant with his mother, and by her left in charge of an aunt acquainted with the premises, strays away and is drowned in the well.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Mifflin County, to review a judgment on a reserved point, non obstante veredicto, for the defendant, in an action of trespass on the case for negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated by BUCHER, P. J., in the following opinion delivered upon the entry of the judgment in the court below:

"The admitted facts are that the defendant was the owner of a dwelling house and lot of ground, which it leased to the mother and brother of James Moore's wife, one of the plaintiffs. The defendant, after the lease, at the request of the lessees, dug a hole at the end of the lot, fifty-eight feet from the steps at the rear of the dwelling, for a water closet or privy. This excavation was dug in the last of June, 1883, and was six feet in depth. It filled with water as soon as it was dug, and remained uncovered until the 26th of July of the same year, a period of about four weeks. On the last mentioned day, Mrs. Moore, one of the plaintiffs, and a daughter of Mrs. Caldwell, one of the lessees, visited the latter, in company with her two children, the one being a boy, aged two years, four months and about fifteen days. The mother of the child on the day aforesaid left it in the custody of its aunt, a daughter of one of the lessees and an inmate of the family, while she visited a neighbor.

"The existence of the excavation was well known to all the members of the family, including the aunt in whose care the child was left by the mother, and the lot was inclosed from the public by a fence. There was a path through the lot leading over the fence about four or five feet from the excavation. The child, whilst in the custody of the aunt (the latter being engaged in sweeping the room and her back being turned four or five minutes), wandered into the lot, fell into the excavation and was drowned. The contention on the part of the defendant, at the trial, was that it owed no duty to the plaintiffs and was not liable to them for leaving the excavation uncovered.

"We reserved the question whether the defendant owed a duty to the plaintiffs, as guests of the tenants, to have guarded this excavation so as to avoid danger.

"The case was sent to the jury to find from the evidence whether the defendant was guilty of negligence in leaving the excavation unguarded, and whether the mother of the child, or its custodian the aunt, was guilty of contributory negligence. The jury found against the defendant and assessed the damages. The defendant then moved for judgment non obstante veredicto; and this brings us to consider the sole question for investigation:

"Is the defendant lessor liable in damages under these facts to the guests of the lessees and parents of the drowned child? The question is novel. No case precisely like it has been brought to our attention, and we must solve it on principle.

"First, then, it seems to us very clear that had this child been of the lessees' family there could be no recovery, because the family knew of the pit and were put upon their guard.

"Second. The presence of the drowned child on the premises must fall under one of two classifications, to wit: either as a trespasser, or as a member of the lessees' family. In either case the parents cannot recover.

"As between the lessor and the child, and its parents, the lessor owed no duty. A duty to them could only arise out of some contract obligation, either express or implied. None exists, as out of some confidence or trust reposed, as where an express or implied license or invitation has been held out, or out of some duty to the public at large which would include them. This excavation was dug at the express solicitation of the lessees; and as between them and the lessor they could not complain if they fell into it, because they knew of its existence and could, with ordinary care, avoid it.

"Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. 332, as qualified by Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, 149, means 'that a person who maintains such a dangerous trap (it was a platform in a private alley which leaned a little over plumb against a wall, requiring but little force to carry it over the perpendicular and then it would fall) close to a public highway in the heart of a large city might be liable to a person injured thereby, although such person was a child of six years of age trespassing on the premises; and the familiar principle was invoked that one may not justifiably, or even excusably, place a dangerous pitfall or wolf trap, or a spring gun purposely to catch even willful trespassers poaching on his own grounds. Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr is authority only for its own facts. It was not intended to assert the doctrine that a child cannot be treated as a trespasser or wrong doer.' Its authority was materially shaken in Gillespie v. McGowan, supra.

The latter case holds that a deep well eighty feet from the nearest highway on a private lot need not be guarded. So, too, Gramlich v. Wurst, 86 Pa. 74, holds that the owner of land, in the exercise of lawful dominion over it, may leave an excavation thereon, which is so distant from the highway that no one can reach it without becoming a trespasser, unprotected. Thus it is clear that if this mother and child had gone into this lot without the sanction of the lessees and the accident had happened as it did, no one would be liable. Then their presence on the lot was by the license of the lessees; and as their guests they became incorporated into their family, and thus they were lawfully on the premises, but upon the same conditions as to the lessor's accountability as the lessees; and thus the lessor was under no duty to the guests whatever.

"It would be far more reasonable to hold the hosts liable, for they were bound to reasonable diligence in warning and guarding their guests against known dangers while in their house. Where would such doctrine of the lessor's liability lead to? * * *

"The law does not demand that the owner of a tenement should be more careful of the children of a visitor than he should be for his own. There are certain risks in life which we must all take and these are some of them. We say again: to hold that the owner of the premises was liable under such circumstances is tantamount to holding that he is an insurer of the lives of his own family as well as the lives of all strangers who come within his gates. If such be the law the owner dare not admit the children of another as guests where there are descending steps, open doors and windows, without having them so securely guarded that it is impossible for them to blunder and fall. 'If the dangers are patent and visible, the visitor who comes to and is received within the home must share these dangers in common with the other members of the family.'

"Southcote v. Stanley, 1 Hurlstone & N. 246.

"In Flower v. Pa. R. R. Co. 69 Pa. 210, where a boy, at the request of the fireman, climbed upon the locomotive and was thrown off by a jar and killed, it was held that the company owed him no duty.

"In Knight v. Abert, 6 Pa. 472, C. J. Gibson says: 'A man must use his property so as not to incommode his neighbor; but the maxim only extends to neighbors who do not interfere with it or enter upon it. If it were not so, a proprietor could not sink a well, or a saw pit, dig a ditch, or a mill race, etc.'

"While it is true where there is negligence and the injured party is a child, its negligence cannot be set up, still it must be remembered in this case there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, because the pit was dug on its own land with the consent of and at the request of the lessees, so that the case stands as if there was no tenant, and the excavation was on defendant's own land, away from any public highway, and the child had wandered there. The defendant was only called upon to guard against the lessees' injury, and the lessees, knowing all, were bound to protect their guests by warning or otherwise.

"It is true the jury found that the aunt was not guilty of negligence in taking care of the child; but we incline to the opinion that it was error under the evidence to submit this to them. The admitted fact is that the aunt and custodian of the child had knowledge of the existence of this 'man trap,' as the zealous counsel for the plaintiffs call it, and having assumed the duty of guarding it during the absence of the mother, it was her bounden duty to see to it, that it did not escape her vigilance, and having permitted it to be exposed and alone for any time was negligence.

"For these reasons we must enter judgment for the defendant on the reserved point. And now, January 12, 1884, the rule is made absolute and judgment is entered in favor of the defendant, to which plaintiffs except and bill sealed at their instance."

The assignment of error specified the action of the court in entering judgment for the defendant on the reserved point, non obstante veredicto.

Messrs. A. Reed and T. M. Uttley, for plaintiffs in error:

The rule of duty in cases of negligence varies with circumstances.

Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. 332.

Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, does not qualify Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, so as to affect its application to the case on hand.

In Gillespie v. McGowan the child lacked but a few months of being eight years of age, and the court held that the jury must be allowed to pass upon the question of contributory negligence, which was done in this case.

A landlord who, being solicited by his tenant to have an outhouse repaired, gratuitously undertakes to make the repairs and negligently and unlawfully performs the work, whereby the tenant's wife is subsequently injured, is liable for the injury.

Gill v. Middleton, 105 Mass. 477.

If a person, being on the premises of another on lawful business, without any fault or negligence of his own, falls through a hole on such premises, the occupier will be responsible, although the hole be necessary for carrying on the business of the occupier and there is no duty upon such occupier as between himself and his servants to keep the hole fenced.

Indermaur v. Dames (L. R. 1 C. P. 274; 2 Id. §11), cited and approved in 1 Add. Torts, §228.

While the defendant as landlord might not be liable to the tenant or his guests for any defects on the premises when rented, he certainly is liable for such gross negligence as this case exhibits, committed by him while the property was leased.

v.

B. R. BUCKIUS.

1. Where an affidavit of defense is made by a stranger, it must show upon its face sufficient reason why it was not made by the defendant himself; that a real disability on the part of the defendant existed, which prevented him from making the affidavit himself, and the circumstances giving rise to it.
2. An affidavit of defense filed by one styling himself "attorney for the defendant," and alleging that he transacted all the business in the case and has full knowledge, etc., will not be received.
3. The allegations of defense, on the merits of the case, held insufficient, as being too general, vague and indefinite.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to Common Pleas of Lancaster County, to review a judgment for plaintiff for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense. Affirmed.

Scire facias sur mechanics' lien for plumbing, material, labor, etc., with a bill of items containing amounts and dates.

The following affidavit of defense was filed:

"John F. Griel, attorney for Jacob Griel, Sr., being duly affirmed, deposes and says that the claim of B. R. Buckius v. Jacob Griel, Sr., for $771.55 with interest, is unjust and exorbitant; and said amount is not due plaintiff by defendant, and is largely in excess of what is due for said work and materials claimed to be furnished; that defendant has a just defense to a large portion of said bill, and he firmly believes that charges are made for work and material never furnished, and the charges are largely in excess of what was agreed upon by plaintiff as the prices of work and material; and the defendant expects on trial to prove that the claim of plaintiff is not due by the defendant, and he has a just and proper defense to said suit."

The plaintiff took a rule to show cause why judgment should not be entered for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense.

A supplementary affidavit was then filed as follows:

"John F. Griel, being duly affirmed, deposes and says that by power of attorney of Jacob Griel recorded Letter Attorney Book No. 7, page 491, he has full power to sign the affidavit of defense in this case, as he transacted all the business in the case, and has full knowledge of the whole work alleged to have been done.

"Plaintiff agreed to do the work and furnish the material for the same price as paid for similar work on a house occupied by John F. Griel, viz.: $680.08; and not more than that sum would be due plaintiff, if work were well done, and labor and material furnished at regular rates.

"Deponent specifies the following items as charged for more than agreed upon and as excessive, viz.: globes to chandeliers, charged $16, should be $10.50, chandeliers $1 to $1.50 in excess of price, $30 for fixing bath tub, bath bibb $10 instead of $5; and on trial it is proposed to show that the whole bill is in excess of price agreed upon, and is extortionate, and labor and material charged for which was not furnished."

The power of attorney referred to in the supplemental affidavit of defense was as follows:

"Know all men by these presents that I, Jacob Griel, Senior, of the City of Lancaster in the County of Lancaster, and State of Pennsylvania, have made, constituted and appointed, and by these presents do make, constitute and appoint, and in my place and stead put and depute my son John F. Griel of the City of Lancaster, aforesaid, my true and lawful attorney for me, and in my name, and for my use to ask, demand, sue for, recover and receive all such sum or sums of money, debts, goods, wares and other demands whatsoever, which is or shall be due, owing, payable and belonging to me by any manner or means whatsoever, and sufficient receipts and acquittances for the same to make, execute and deliver. Also to make, draw, sign and indorse notes and checks for me and in my name, and to enter into articles of agreement for the sale and conveyance of real estate; giving and granting unto my said attorney my whole power and authority in and about the premises; holding for firm and effectual whatsoever my said attorney shall lawfully do in pursuance hereof. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal the 18th day of November, A. D., 1875.

The court directed judgment for the plaintiff, which was accordingly entered by the prothonotary.

The assignments of error specified, inter alia, the action of the court in directing the entry of judgment for the plaintiff.

Mr. A. C. Reinochl, for plaintiff in error:

An affidavit of defense need not set forth the very fact which will be produced in a trial, but is sufficient if it contains enough to satisfy a reasonable court that a just defense can be made.

Under the decision of the supreme court in Sleeper v. Dougherty, 2 Whart. 177, it was held that an affidavit made by a third person interested in the event of the suit is sufficient to prevent a judgment by default.

Mr. W. H. Roland, for defendant in error:

An affidavit by one not appearing to be a party in interest will not be regarded.

Weil v. Michael, 10 W. N. C. 337; Peck v. Jones, 70 Pa. 83.

A general affidavit that the plaintiff's charges are excessive is insufficient.

Wolcott v. Schwartz, 89 Legal Int. 131.

Mr Justice Paxson delivered the opinion of the court:

The affidavit of defense in this case is clearly insufficient. It is not only evasive but it was made by a stranger to the record. It is true he styles himself "Attorney for Jacob Griel," but whether he was attorney at law or attorney in fact does not appear. No reason is given why the defendant did not make the affidavit himself, nor does the affidavit show that it was made for and on behalf of the defendant, nor even with his knowledge.

Nor are these defects cured by the supplemental affidavit; nor by the fact that the affiant refers to a power of attorney from the defendant as giving him "full power to sign the affidavit of defense in this case." But an inspection of that instrument discloses no such authority; it refers to other matters in no way connected with this suit.

It has never been held that no one but the defendant can make the affidavit of defense. Cases may arise where it would be physically impossible for the defendant to make such an affidavit. Under such and similar circumstances we have no doubt that an affidavit of defense may be made on behalf of the defendant by an attorney at law or other person duly authorized; but the reason why it is not made by the defendant should be set forth in the affidavit. The court can then judge of the sufficiency of such reason. It would never do to allow a stranger to the record to intermeddle in this manner.

The correct rule would seem to be that when a defendant puts in a stranger's affidavit, it must show upon its face sufficient reason why it was not made by the defendant himself; that a real disability existed which prevented him from making it, and the circumstances giving rise to the disability.

This rule is generally observed in practice throughout the State so far as I have had an opportunity of ascertaining. It is certainly the rule in force in Philadelphia, where the practice under the affidavit of defense law is older than in most of the other counties of the State. See Bancroft v. Sterr, Gross v. Painter, Stollaker v. Lardner, Philadelphia v. Devine and Russell v. Foran, 1 W. N. C. 132, 154, 169, 358, 470; Phila. v. Gross, 2 W. N. C. 429; Couperthwait v. Roney, 10 W. N. C. 482.

The allegation in the supplemental affidavit that the affiant "transacted all the business in the case, and has full knowledge of the whole work alleged to have been done" does not meet the difficulty. It furnishes no reason why the defendant did not make the affidavit. For that purpose he is entitled to avail himself of the knowledge of others and may aver his facts upon information and belief.

Nor is the supplemental affidavit specific. The original is wholly evasive, as before observed. Neither sets up more than a defense to a portion of the claim, and there is no admission anywhere of how much the defendant admits to be due. Such language as that "The whole bill is in excess of the price agreed upon, and is extortionate, and labor and material charged for which was not furnished," is too vague. How much labor and material were charged for and not furnished? Surely if the defendant knows the fact to be so he can tell the amount. And as to the few items which are more specific, there is no distinct averment made of any agreement with the defendant in regard to their price. It does not appear whether the contract referred to was oral or written, nor with whom made.

Judgment affirmed.

BOROUGH OF CARLISLE, Plff. in Err.,

John F. BRISBANE.

1. The general rule of law is, where one suffers an injury through the concurrent negligence of two or more persons they are jointly liable, and may be proceeded against for the damages sustained, either jointly or severally.

2. Where a passenger rides, without pay, with another who is driver of a team, exercising entire control over it and who is in no sense the passenger's agent or servant, the negligence of the driver cannot be imputed to the passenger so as to bar an action by him against a negligent third party. The passenger is answerable for his own negligence only.
3. It is not important that the driver was familiar with the condition of the road. The driver's knowledge would not affect the passenger with notice. The latter having no knowledge of it, the jury is to consider the case as if both were passing over the road for the first time.
4. Where a municipality improving a public highway causes an obstruction to be put upon the road, it is its duty to give some appropriate warning of the fact; and if there is nothing to indicate to a stranger that the traveled route is at the side of a road, it is presumed to be in the center.
5. In an action by a stranger against a municipality for an injury caused by an obstruction in the center of the highway, evidence to show that the plaintiff took the center of the road and that the traveled route had previously been there is admissible.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Cumberland County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff in an action on the case. Affirmed.

Brisbane, the defendant in error, resided in Philadelphia. While on a visit to Carlisle on December 28, 1884, he was invited by Cornman, a friend, to take a drive with him into the country in a sleigh. Returning they drove up the poor house road a quarter of a mile to North Street, one of the principal thoroughfares of the Borough. The Borough was then engaged in piking North Street, which is sixty feet wide, and had filled the north half of it with broken stones to the depth of from ten to twenty-five inches, leaving the south half in its previous condition. There were thus two distinct ways or tracks passing over North Street, each thirty feet wide, the one on the north side being piked and elevated from one to two feet above the one on the south side which was known as the summer road. These two ways or tracks both began on a level at the poor house road. The night was dark and cloudy and the ground was covered with snow. Mr. Cornman turned his horse into this street and drove for the center of the street. After driving about fifty feet he struck the middle of the street, and the left runner of his sleigh went suddenly over the edge of the piking, which was about sixteen inches deep at that point; and the sleigh was upset, throwing Brisbane out. He sustained injuries and this action was brought to recover damages.

Upon the trial, before SADLER, P. J., the defendant made the following offer: We offer to prove by the witness on the stand and by other witnesses, that Mr. Cornman, the driver of the sleigh in which the plaintiff was riding, was familiar with the road on which the accident happened and that he knew of the repairs going on and of the manner in which the employees of the Borough were making them; and further that there was another convenient and safe road leading from the poor house road to the town, which was well known to Mr. Cornman, and by taking which all possible danger could have been avoided. This for the purpose of showing contributory negligence.

Objected to; first, that the knowledge of Cornman of defects in the road would not be notice to the plaintiff; second, negligence of Cornman could not be imputed to the plaintiff; and third, that the offer is incompetent and irrelevant.

The court: It is not proposed to show that Mr. Cornman was a common carrier or that the plaintiff in this case was either the owner of the vehicle or horse, or that he knew of the defects alleged to have been known of by Mr. Cornman. We think the negligence of Cornman cannot be imputed to him, or the knowledge of Cornman of the condition of the street cannot be imputed to him. The offer is overruled and defendant excepts, and bill sealed. First assignment of error.

Plaintiff in rebuttal offered to prove by a witness "That the course traveled from the poor house road on to North Street was, before the piking, close to the northwest corner of the junction of the poor house road and North Street, and then by a regular course to the middle of North Street, and then along the middle of North Street to Garrison Lane; and that this is the course traveled now and has been since the completion of macadamizing North Street, and this for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff on the night of December 28 took the usual course of travel from the poor house road into and up North Street."

Objected to as immaterial and irrelevant.

The court: I will admit the testimony for the present and allow a bill of exceptions. I am a little in doubt about it. I will admit it for the present and if I think it is wrong, withdraw it. Bill of exceptions sealed for defendant. Second assignment of error.

The court charged the jury, inter alia, as follows: "But in order to excuse the defendant, if it has been shown that the accident was caused by its negligence, it must appear that the plaintiff, in the present case, was guilty of some negligence on his part. If he was acquainted with the condition of the road and did not endeavor to avoid the danger, negligence would be imputed to him; but the fact that Mr. Cornman, the driver, and whose guest he was, had this knowledge, cannot be imputed to him and would not bar his right of action. He must not be held liable for the negligence of Mr. Cornman unless he could have averted it. If there were any indications which would have arrested the attention of a careful person to the danger in the street, and they were discernable by a person exercising ordinary care, and they were observed or could have been observed by the plaintiff in the use of ordinary care at the time of day on which he passed over it, and snow on the ground, as you may find from the evidence, or if Brisbane saw the ridge in the center of the street and could have prevented the accident by his interposition, either stopping the horse or changing its direction, and made no such effort, and did not act as a reasonably prudent man would have done under the circumstances, he would be guilty of contributory negligence. You will conclude from the evidence what the plaintiff saw and what his opportunities were to have averted the accident if any. But a jury are not at liberty to imagine that such was the case. It must appear to them from mouths of witnesses, or other competent evidence, that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence and that it contributed to the accident in some degree, before negligence on his part is entitled to any consideration as a defense to this action."

The assignment of error specified, inter alia, the action of the court in the admission and rejection of the evidence above noted, and in charging the jury as above.

Messrs. Hepburn, Jr., & Stuart, and Martin C. Herman, for plaintiff in error:

A traveler on the highway who does not avoid a known danger when he might do so, but rushes recklessly and heedlessly upon it, is guilty of contributory negligence.

In *Lake Shore etc. R. R. Co. v. Cuddy v. Horn, 46 Mich. 596.

In Mann v. Wieand, 4 W. N. C. 6, the negligence of the owner and driver of the wagon, in driving with insufficient harness, was mere negligence in a general sense and in no sense contributed directly to the accident. The vicious conduct of the defendant's dogs was the direct cause.

Lockhart v. Lichtenthaler, 46 Pa. 151, and Phila. etc. R. R. Co. v. Boyer, 97 Pa. 91, are both cases of carrier companies in which the law is held to be that a passenger must look to his carrier in case of injury, upon the ground that it is more just that the owner should answer to his employer rather than one in whom the employer reposed no confidence.

"It is the general American rule that there is no privity in negligence between passenger and carrier; and that therefore when the passenger brings an action of negligence, the contributory negligence of his carrier is not to be imputed to him in any degree for the purpose of barring his remedy."

Humphreys v. Armstrong Co. 56 Pa. 210; Lower Macungie Township v. Merkhoffer, 71 Pa. 276; Scott Township v. Montgomery, 95 Pa. 444.

Mr. Justice Clark delivered the opinion of the court:

The general rule of the law undoubtedly is where one suffers an injury through the concurrent negligence of two or more persons, they are jointly liable and may be proceeded against for damages sustained, either jointly or severally, at the option of the party injured, unless the latter by his own negligence has contributed to the injury; in which case the law will not afford him any remedy whatever against any or all of the persons whose wrong in concurrence with his own caused the injury; the rule is, however, not without its exceptions.

Where goods in the hands of a common carrier are injured by the negligent act of a third party, to which the negligence of the carrier contributes, and an action is brought by the owner against the third party, the carrier's contributory negligence is a good defense. Vanderplank v. Miller, 1 Mood. & M. 169; Simpson v. Hand, 6 Whart. 311.

So, also, where a passenger is personally injured by the joint negligence of his carrier and another party, his remedy is against the common carrier alone. The latter question was first raised in this court, and was very fully discussed in the case of Lockhart v. Lichtenhaler, 46 Pa. 151.

The decision in that case was grounded upon the doctrine of the English cases: Bridge v. Grand Junc. R. Co. 3 Mees. & Welsb. 247 (1838) in the Court of Exchequer; Thorogood v. Bryan, and Cattlin v. Hills, 65 Eng. C. L. 114 and 123 in the Common Bench (1849). These cases have since been followed and approved in the Exchequer by Armstrong v. Lancashire & York. R. Co. 44 L. J. Exch. 89.

The principle upon which all these English cases appear to have been determined, is that the passenger is so far identified with the carriage in which he is travelling that want of care on part of the driver will be a defense of the owner of the other carriage that directly caused the injury.

Our own case of Lockhart v. Lichtenhaler, supra, was followed by Phila. etc. R. R. Co. v. Boyer, 97 Pa. 91, an action against the railroad company, to recover damages for the death of a person, caused by a collision of the defendant's train with a street car in which the deceased was a passenger. It was held that in order to recover, the plaintiffs must show, not only that the death resulted directly from the defendant's negligence, but that the negligence of the carrier company did not contribute to the result.

Therefore, although there is certainly a wide difference of opinion between the courts of this and other States on the subject, it seems to be well settled as the law of Pennsylvania that the remedy of a passenger, injured by the joint negligence of his carrier and another, is against the common carrier only. Cornman, however, was not a common carrier; he was the owner of the horse and sleigh and was the driver. Brisbane was a friend of Cornman's, visiting Carlisle, and occupied a seat in the sleigh by his invitation; the accident occurred while returning from a visit to the poor house. Nor was Cornman the servant of Brisbane; as the driver he was neither under Brisbane's direction or control, nor was Brisbane under his control. Brisbane had simply accepted the friendly offer of a seat in Cornman's sleigh; he had a right to expect from Cornman ordinary skill and care, in the management of the conveyance, and precisely the same degree of care from the municipality of the Borough of Carlisle, in the condition and repair of the streets over which they might pass.

There is no evidence whatever that Brisbane knew that Cornman was a reckless or unskillful driver, or that he saw or by the exercise of reasonable care at the time could see or ought to have seen the dangerous condition of the street. Indeed, the jury has found that he was not personally aware of either; and no question can arise involving this view of the case. It is said, however, that although there is no evidence of any actual negligence on the part of Brisbane, upon the principle of Lockhart v. Lichtenhaler, the negligence of Cornman is to be imputed to him.

The rationale of the rule in Thorogood v. Bryan, is said by Colton, J., to be the identity of the passenger with his own vehicle; but in Lockhart v. Lichtenhaler this reason is rejected, and we think the foundation of the principle is expressed by Mr. Justice Thompson, with much more care and accuracy, as follows:

"I would say the reason for it is that it better accords with the policy of the law to hold the carrier alone responsible in such circumstances, as an incentive to care and diligence. As the law fixes responsibility upon a different principle in the case of the carrier, as already noticed, from that of a party who does not stand in that relation to the party injured, the very philosophy of the requirement of greater care is that he shall be answerable for omitting any duty which the law has defined as his rule and guide, and will not permit him to escape by imputing negligence of a less culpable character to others, but sufficient to render them liable for the consequences of his own. It would be altogether more just to hold liable him who has engaged to observe the highest degree of diligence and care and has been compensated for so doing, rather than him upon whom no such obligation rests and who not being compensated for the observance of such a degree of care, acts only on the duty to observe ordinary care, and may not be aware even of the presence of a party who might be injured."

When the reason of a rule of law ceases, the rule itself ceases. The law fixes the responsibility of the persons or parties involved in this transaction upon precisely the same basis; there is certainly no policy of law which requires that the driver of a private carriage or sleigh who, actuated by the motive of kindness alone and without compensation, may undertake to convey a friend through the streets of a city or town, shall be held to a higher standard of care towards that friend than the city or town through whose streets they pass. Both Cornman and the municipality of Carlisle Borough were bound to Brisbane for the exercise of ordinary care and diligence only. If Cornman had been a common carrier, he would have been a carrier for compensation and would have been obliged to observe the highest degree of diligence and care; the policy of the law, in such a case, it is said, would not permit him to escape by interposing the negligence of others of a less culpable character.

The doctrine declared in Loelchart v. Lichten-thaler and Phila. etc. R. R. Co. v. Boyer is not applicable to this case; and there is no sound principle of law which will preclude the plaintiff from seeking redress from both or either of the persons through whose negligence he was injured. Brisbane was answerable for his own negligence alone; the negligence of Cornman under the circumstances cannot be imputed to him so as to bar his recovery in this case.

The case at bar is in every respect similar to the case of Robinson v. N. Y. Cent. etc. R. R. Co. 66 N. Y. 11, where a female accepted an invitation to ride in a buggy with a person who was entirely competent to manage a horse; and it was held that if the defendant company was negligent and the plaintiff free from negligence herself, she might recover from the company, although the driver of the buggy might have been guilty of negligence which contributed to the injury.

This case was followed by Dyer v. Erie R. Co. 71 N. Y. 228. Mr. Justice Miller delivering the opinion of the court says:

"It is insisted that the court erred in charging the jury that the negligence of Stimpson was no bar to the action, and that the negligence of the driver would not prevent a recovery. The solution of the question raised must depend upon the position which Stimpson occupied toward the plaintiff. The plaintiff rode with Stimpson at his invitation, gratuitously, in Stimpson's wagon. The latter, driving the team, exercised entire control over it and was traveling entirely on business of his own. Stimpson was not hired by the plaintiff or in his employ, or in any sense his agent; nor had the plaintiff any control or direction of the team, or its management or over Stimpson himself. There is no pretense but that Stimpson was entirely competent to take charge of the team himself, nor that he did not possess the requisite skill to manage and control the same. It is difficult to see upon what principle the negligence of Stimpson can affect the plaintiff or be imputed to him."

These cases in New York were afterwards followed by Masterson v. N. Y. Cent. etc. R. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 247, which is to the same effect.

It is true that the authority of these cases may be supposed to be somewhat impaired in Pennsylvania, by the fact that in New York the rule of Thorogood v. Bryan has been repudiated; Chapman v. New Haven R. R. Co. 10 N. Y. 34; but as we hold the rule of policy only to apply to the case of a common carrier, there is no reason to discredit the authority of that court in cases where this rule of policy does not apply.

In this view, it is not important what Cornman may have previously known as to the condition of the road; and as it is shown that Brisbane never had any knowledge of it, the case was to be considered by the jury, so far as Brisbane is concerned, just as if both were passing over the road for the first time. A stranger, in the twilight or when snow was on the ground, as matter of fact might certainly assume that the center of a public road or street within the corporate limits of a populous town, over which hundreds of wagons passed every day, especially if no other route is plainly designated, was in a passable condition. In the consideration of a question of negligence on part of a stranger, certainly under such circumstances, it was proper to show that he took the center and not the side of the opened street.

There may be cases where the conformation of the ground itself would clearly indicate that the center of a public road is not the traveled route; and in such case this circumstance may be sufficient to give notice; but in all ordinary cases the center of a public street passing between the open lots of a populous town, in the usual course of travel, and in the night time, or when the route is obscured by snow, may be taken as the traveled route; if the municipal officers caused an obstruction to be placed on that part of the highway, it was their duty to give some appropriate warning of the fact.

Nor can we see any valid objection to the evidence showing where the actual traveled route was before the street was macadamized. If there was nothing to indicate to a stranger that the route for travel was at the side of the road, we have said he might assume the route to be in the center. How, then, could it harm the defendant to show that the route had previously been in the center, although the plaintiff did not know the fact? The evidence was clearly competent, however. Its tendency was to show that the only obstruction of the street was that which the officers of the Municipality had themselves negligently placed there, and that there was nothing in the natural conformation of the ground to prevent the use of the central part of the road at this point, or to warn the plaintiff that the traveled route was not in the center, but along the side of the street.

It is an undoubted and indeed an undisputed fact that the center of the street had been the usual course of travel; and we think it was certainly competent to show it. The learned court very plainly instructed the jury that "if the way provided was safe, convenient and so well marked that no man of ordinary prudence could mistake it, it was not necessary that it should have been along the middle of the street, and that in providing such a way at the side of the street they did their whole duty to the public, unless on the central part, where it had previously been used as the highway, they placed a dangerous obstruction without giving any warning of the fact."

The principle upon which this evidence was admitted is perhaps inaccurately stated; but as the proof was properly received, we cannot reverse upon the ground that proper reasons were not assigned for its admission.

The judgment is affirmed.

NEW YORK.

COURT OF APPEALS.

John S. SCHULTZE et al., Exrs. of James Brown, Deceased, Respts.,
v.

MAYOR, Aldermen and Commonalty of the City of NEW YORK, Appts.

1. Under Laws 1858, chap. 338 (N. Y. City Consolidation Act, Laws 1882, chap. 410, § 898), conferring the right to maintain a proceeding to reduce an assessment upon any person "aggrieved thereby," legal ownership of the assessed property is not essential.
2. The right to restitution of overpayment on an assessment subsequently reduced extends to everyone in whose behalf the proceeding to reduce the assessment was brought.
3. It is presumed that one who held the title to assessed property for the convenience of another acted in such other person's behalf in maintaining a proceeding to vacate an illegal assessment; and that one who pays money under the coercion of an assessment had an interest in the land assessed.
4. The action of the court in reducing an assessment is conclusive that money overpaid thereon was obtained by the municipality without right and is therefore held by it for the payer's use.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York Special Term in favor of plaintiffs in an action to recover the amount of a reduction made by the court in an assessment for the construction of a sewer. Affirmed.

Memorandum of decision below, 39 Hun, 654.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. Henry Lacombe, D. J. Dean and Arthur H. Masten, for appellants:

The fact that the purchase price of this property was paid by James Brown, while the legal title was conveyed to his two sons, does not constitute him the equitable owner of the property. The presumption is that the purchase is intended as an advancement, unless the contrary is established by proof.

Welton v. Divine, 20 Barb. 9. See also Prosser v. McIntyre, 5 Barb. 424, 432.

The person paying the consideration money must take the conveyance to himself, or he can have no legal or equitable interest in the land.

Garfield v. Hatmaker, 15 N. Y. 475, 478; Everett v. Everett, 48 N. Y. 218.

As the plaintiffs' testator was not the owner of the property, nor the party aggrieved by the assessment, he paid it as a volunteer and plaintiffs cannot now recover that part of it which has been vacated by the court.

Peyser v. Mayor, 70 N. Y. 499; Purcell v. Mayor, 85 N. Y. 330.

Mr. Cecil Campbell Higgins, for respondents:

Defendants' answer expressly admits that an assessment for Sixty-Sixth Street outlet sewer in the City of New York to the amount of $49,262.90, was laid upon lots of plaintiffs' testator.

This is an admission of ownership by which defendants are bound.

Till v. Beyer, 38 N. Y. 161; Paige v. Willet, 38 N. Y. 28; Thomas v. Austin, 4 Barb. 265; Schreyer v. Mayor of N. Y. and Bruce v. Kelly, 7 Jones & S. 1, 27; Quackenbos v. Edgar, 61 N. Y. 653; Donovan v. Bd. Education, 12 Jones & S. 53; Mott v. Consumers Ice Co. 73 N. Y. 550; Potter v. Smith, 70 N. Y. 299.

Upon the facts before the court the plaintiffs are the parties entitled to recover the assessment.

Peyser v. Mayor, 70 N. Y. 497; Purcell v. Mayor, 85 N. Y. 330.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The money in question was paid by the testator, to prevent the enforcement of illegal assessments imposed upon certain lots in the City of New York; and within well settled principles of law it may, under the circumstances of the case, be recovered back as so much money received by the defendants for the testator's use.

The assessments were confirmed in June, 1871, and with interest amounted to $67,151.97. Proceedings to vacate or reduce the assessments were soon thereafter instituted in the name, as may be inferred, of John Crosby Brown, the then owner of record of the lots assessed, under the "Acts in relation to frauds in assessments for local improvements in the City of New York." Laws 1858, chap. 338; Laws 1870, chap. 283, § 27.

But while they were pending and undetermined, the plaintiffs' testator was required to pay and did pay the whole amount above stated, to the defendants. Afterwards an order was made by the supreme court, in the proceedings referred to, reducing the above sum to $34,632.52, which was adjudged to be a proper assessment upon said lots. This left in the hands of the defendants the sum of $32,519.45; being the excess over the legal and just assessment, and for this amount the plaintiffs have had judgment.

It was affirmed by the general term, and we cannot, upon the matters alleged and established by the record, see any other way in which judgment could have been given.

At the close of the plaintiffs' evidence the defendants' counsel moved to dismiss the complaint, upon the sole ground that the plaintiffs had failed to show ownership by their testator of the property assessed; and the only reason for this appeal is the denial of that motion. As to that it appeared that the testator purchased and paid for the property, but the title was taken in the names of his sons "for convenience sake;" and one of them afterwards conveyed to the other, who after the testator's death conveyed to his executors, the plaintiffs here.

Legal ownership of the assessed property is not essential, even in proceedings to reduce the assessment. That right is conferred upon any person "aggrieved thereby" (Laws 1858, chap. 338; Purcell v. Mayor, 85 N. Y. 330); and the question was necessarily disposed of in those proceedings.

So the right of restitution extends not only to the person in whose name these proceedings were taken, but to everyone in whose behalf they were instituted; and here it may well be presumed that one who held the title for the convenience of another acted in his behalf in seeking to rid the land of an illegal assessment; and also that he who paid the money under the coercion of that assessment had an interest in its protection. It is enough that the payment was not voluntary; and the modification of the assessment shows that it was obtained from the plaintiffs' testator without right.

The learned counsel for the appellant relies upon the enactment that where a grant for a valuable consideration shall be made to one person, and the consideration paid by another, no trust shall result in favor of the person paying the money, if the conveyance shall be so made by consent of the owner of the fund, and the title shall vest in the alienee. 1 R. S. §§ 50, 54.

We do not see that this statute has any application to the case in hand. It does not appear that the testator consented to an unconditional and absolute conveyance to his son; nor but that he supposed the purpose or "convenience" to be served would be expressed in it; Lounsbury v. Purdy 18 N. Y. 515; and no presumption can be indulged in to support a defense which in any view is without merit, for the defendants' apprehension that it may hereafter be vexed for the same money by John Crosby Brown, the party moving in the reduction proceedings, is not well founded. He paid no money; he is one of the parties plaintiff here, suing in the right of his testator, and rests his case upon allegations wholly inconsistent with any personal claim. The action of the court in reducing the assessment must be held to be conclusive that the money now at stake was obtained by the defendant without right, and is therefore held by it for the testator's use. Peyser v. Mayor, etc. of N. Y. 70 N. Y. 497; Pursell v. Mayor, supra.

The judgment only requires restitution to his representatives and should be affirmed.

Re Application of STATEN ISLAND RAPID TRANSIT R. R. CO., to Acquire Lands.

1. Under the statutory provisions railroad corporations have power to acquire lands, under the right of eminent domain, not only from individuals but also from the State, for prospective as well as present uses; provided the necessity for such use in the immediate future is established beyond reasonable doubt, and the proposed use is clearly embraced within the legitimate objects of the power.

2. Held, on the facts of the case,

(a) That the application of the petitioning corporation to acquire title to certain lands for terminal facilities in excess of its own local requirements, to enable it to fulfill a contract with the Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. to give the latter company access to the Port of New York, was properly granted;

(b) That the benefit to arise from such a connection, both to the public and to the petitioner's road, rendered the object for which the appropriation of land is sought a public use;

(c) That the fact that the construction of certain structures necessary to connect the two roads was not yet begun did not affect the good faith of the application, such construction being assumed by contract obligations, and the necessity of the appropriation of all the property sought for the proposed use being clearly shown.

8. The fact that the condemnation of land by a domestic railroad corporation is also desired by a foreign corporation and will inure to its benefit furnishes no reason for denying the application, provided the petitioning corporation has brought itself within the statute authorizing the proceeding.

(Decided October 5, 1886.)

APPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming an order of Special Term, adjudging that certain water-front lands of which the People of the State of New York are owners, sought to be condemned in this proceeding, were necessary for the uses claimed by the petitioner, and appointing commissioners of appraisal. Affirmed.

Memorandum of decision below, 33 Hun. 664.

The question presented and the facts relating thereto are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Denis O'Brien, Atty-Gen., Augustus Schoonmaker and Thomas W. Fitzgerald, for the People, appellants:

We ask a reversal of this order, upon the ground that no evidence, either written or verbal, was offered in this proceeding, either upon its trial or in the preliminary proceedings therein, that it was authorized by the Railroad Company at any meeting of its board of directors, or that the secretary was ever authorized to sign the petition for same; nor does his affidavit state that such authority was given; and for this reason we claim that this order should not have been granted. The court will find that no witness attempted to show authority, either express or implied; and we claim that there must be some record evidence of the fact before a court can go on and condemn under this statute.

Rensselaer & Saratoga R. R. Co. v. Davis, 43 N. Y. 139; Re N. Y. Cent. etc. R. R. Co. 77 N. Y. 249.

It is submitted that a careful examination of the testimony herein can lead to but one conclusion, and that is that there is no reasonable or other necessity for this land now, or within a reasonable time, nor from the evidence does it appear with any degree of certainty that there ever will be; and we submit that there is no power in any court in this State to take private property for a public use until those facts are conclusively and affirmatively proven by evidence which admits of no reasonable doubt.

Rensselaer & Saratoga R. R. Co. v. Davis, supra; N. Y. & Harlem R. R. Co. v. Kip, 46 N. Y. 553; Flower v. London, Brighton & S. C. R. Co. 2 DREWRY & S. 830.

The Act of the Legislature upon which the petition herein is predicated provides for two contingencies before the force of that statute can be put in operation: 1, the company must be incorporated; 2, it must have constructed its railroad and it must be in full operation.

We admit the incorporation, but the evidence of the Railroad Company shows that the second contingency has not been reached; therefore we claim and insist that this proceeding was premature, and for this reason this order should be reversed.

Sharp v. Johnson, 4 Hill, 92-99; Sprague v. Birdall, 2 Cow. 419; Rensselaer etc. R. R. Co. v. Davis, 43 N. Y. 137; Webb v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 1 R. R. & Canal Cas. 576.

There must be a clear case of public necessity, before a railroad company can invoke the right of eminent domain in connection with the claim set up in the petition here.

State v. Comrs. of Mansfield, 23 N. J. L. 510; Mayor of Alleghany v. Ohio & Pa. R. R. Co. 26 Pa. 360; South Wales R. R. Co. v. Board of Health, 4 Ellis & B. 189; Bennett v. Boyle, 40 Barb. 551; Varick v. Smith, 5 Paige, 137; Bloodgood v. Mohawk & H. R. R. Co. 18 Wend. 9; Re Albany St. 11 Wend. 149; Re John & Cherry Streets, 19 Wend. 659; Embury v. Conner, 3 N. Y. 511; Nesbitt v. Trumbo, 89 Ill. 111-117; Hoye v. Swan, 5 Md. 237; 43 N. Y. 144.

As against the "People of the State of New York" this Railroad Company cannot, nor can other railroads, condemn the land, for the reason that it is land under water, dedicated by statute to the purposes of commerce.

Edgerton v. Huff, 26 Ind. 35; Geisy v. Cincinnati etc. R. R. Co. 4 Ohio, 303.

It is settled law that a railroad company having the right to condemn property for the purposes set forth in this petition must have a present necessity for the use of the property sought to be condemned. Property for these purposes cannot be condemned in anticipation of a necessity that may arise in the future, nor for conjectural or speculative purposes; but the statute only authorizes condemnations to be made in cases where a road has been constructed and a necessity for additional property for terminal or storage purposes has been ascertained to exist, and that necessity is made clearly to appear to the court.

Rensselaer etc. R. R. Co. v. Davis, 43 N. Y. 139; Re N. Y. Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 77 N. Y. 248.

Section 25* of the Railroad Act of 1850 under which the right to condemn is claimed, applies only to companies formed under the Act, and to lands required for the construction of the road.

It does not apply to foreign corporations, nor to the "real estate in addition to what has already been acquired for the purposes of such railroad," for the "purposes of its incorporation" particularly specified in section 21 of the Act. The difference in phraseology is significant.

The lands in question are desired for the purposes specified in section 21, and not to make the road.

The objection, then, is that the right to take lands under water, and especially the right to take such lands for the "additional purposes" specified in section 21, has not been given by the fair construction of section 25.

Re N. Y. West Shore & B. R. R. Co. 29 Hun, 269, holds that lands under water may be condemned for rights of way.

That decision we claim to be erroneous; but it does not cover the question presented here and does not conclude this court.

The question remains whether the State has affirmatively consented to the taking, by condemnation against the State alone, of lands under water for terminal and storage purposes authorized by section 21, and thus divesting riparian owners of their water fronts.

In the case of St. Louis etc. R. R. Co. v. Trustees, Inst. for Blind, 43 Ill. 303, there was a legislative grant to the railroad company in these words: "All such land, materials and privileges belonging to the State are hereby granted to

And if, after the construction of any railroad operated by steam by any company now existing, or that may hereafter be created, such company, or any company owning, operating or leasing such railroad, shall require for the purposes of its incorporation, or for the purpose of running or operating any railroad so owned or leased by such company, any real estate in addition to what it has already acquired, or shall require any further right to lands or the use of lands for switches, turnouts, or for the flow of water occasioned by railroad embankments or structures now in use or hereafter rendered necessary, or for any other purpose necessary to the operation of such railroad; or any right to take and convey water from any spring, pond, creek or river, to such railroad, for the uses and purposes thereof, together with the right to build or lay aqueducts or pipes for the purpose of conveying such water, and to take up, relay and repair the same; or any right of way required for carrying away or diverting any waters, streams or floods from such railroad, for the purpose of protecting the same, or for the purpose of preventing any embankment, excavation or structure of such railroad from injuring or damaging the property of any person or parties who may be rendered liable to injury by reason of such embankment, excavation or structure, as the same may have been constructed previous to such time, or may then exist; such company may acquire such additional real estate, or any property or real estate which they now use or occupy, or right of way, or other rights hereinbefore specified, by purchasing the same of the person or parties owning the same, or interested therein, or to be affected thereby, and by paying to such parties such damages as they may sustain by reason thereof, if the amount of such compensation or damages can be agreed upon between such company and such person or parties; and if such company shall, for any cause, be unable to agree for the purchase of such real estate or right of way, or other rights, or shall be unable to agree upon the sum which shall be paid to such persons or parties in satisfaction of the damages they may sustain, or if the title to any such real estate or right of way, or other rights already acquired or attempted to be acquired, shall, for any cause prove defective or imperfect, then, and in every such case, such company may proceed to acquire or perfect title to such real estate or right of way, or other rights, and to ascertain and appraise such damages in the manner and by the proceedings hereinbefore in this Act prescribed. Nothing in this Act contained shall authorize the taking of any waters that shall at the time of such taking be commonly used for domestic, agricultural or manufacturing purposes, to such an extent as to injuriously interfere with such use in the future.

* § 25. The commissioners of the land-offices shall have power to grant to any railroad company, formed under this Act, any land belonging to the People of this State which may be required for the purposes of their road on such terms as may be agreed on by them; or such company may acquire title thereto by appraisal, as in the case of lands owned by individuals.

said corporation for said purposes;" and it was held that although the language of the statute was sufficiently comprehensive to embrace any property owned by the State, it will not be construed to embrace property used by the State for specific purposes. In such a case it cannot be inferred that it was the intention of the Legislature to grant such property.

See also Mayor of Atlanta v. Central R. R. Co. 53 Ga. 120; Boston Water Power Co. v. Boston & W. R. R. Co. 23 Pick. 368; Milwaukee & St. Paul R. R. Co. v. Furibault, 23 Minn. 167; Re Buffalo, 68 N. Y. 167; Re Boston & A. R. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 574.

The delegation of the right of eminent domain is to be construed in like manner as the delegation of the taxing power. And the rule is universally recognized that the grant in general terms to a subordinate jurisdiction of the right to tax will not authorize a tax on state or county property.

Baltimore Co. Comrs. v. Md. Insane Hospital, 62 Md. 127; Worcester Co. v. Worcester, 116 Mass. 193; Cooley, Tax. 59 and cases cited in note.

The real party in interest and the one sought to be benefited by the condemnation of the lands is a foreign Corporation. As that Corporation is not a citizen of the State of New York, and no legislative authority has been given to it to condemn or acquire lands for its use in this State, it has no standing in our courts for the purpose of this proceeding.

Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519 (38 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 274); Runyan v. Lessee of Coater, 14 Pet. 122 (39 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 382).

A foreign corporation cannot exercise the right of eminent domain in this State.

Mills, Em. Dom. § 352; Re Townsend, 89 N. Y. 171; Re N. Y. L. & W. R. R. Co. 99 N. Y. 21.

One railroad company cannot condemn property for the uses of another railroad company.

That it has been the settled policy of this State not to permit a foreign corporation, directly or indirectly, to condemn lands for railroad purposes within this State is evident from the fact that the Legislature has conferred express authority in some instances upon foreign corporations for such purposes.

Re Townsend, 89 N. Y. 171; Laws 1855, chap. 296.

It being admitted and found in this proceeding that the petitioner does not and never will need the lands in question for its own uses and purposes, but that they can only be required for the uses and purposes of the lessee when the conditions of the lease shall have been fulfilled, the proceeding can only be sustained upon the theory that the domestic corporation has entered into a valid agreement or lease of its own franchises and property to the foreign corporation.

The agreement or lease in this case is not a valid instrument. It is beyond the powers of the domestic corporation, and the object of its creation; and it is not shown to be within the powers of the foreign corporation. It is therefore void, and these proceedings, founded upon its provisions, cannot be maintained.

Except as against the State when acting as the Sovereign, the riparian owners have rights in the lands under water, entitling them to compensation, when such lands are taken. Very numerous authorities in state courts and in the courts of the United States sustain the principle that riparian owners have property rights to the lands under water adjoining their freeholds, and that such rights are valuable and entitled to protection.

The Act of Congress recently passed "to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur's Kill, and to establish the same as a post road," of course removes all obstacles to the making of the proposed connection within a few months.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Many of the questions discussed in the learned brief of the appellants' counsel do not seem to be open for consideration here, as they were neither raised in the court below nor authorized by the order under which they were permitted to defend. Aside from a request to dismiss the proceedings upon the ground of indefiniteness in the description of the land proposed to be taken, and which is not now raised by counsel, we find no objection in the record to the adjudication under consideration except that of the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to show that the property proposed to be taken was required for the purposes of the petitioning corporation. A motion was made to dismiss the petition for that reason, which was denied, and the appellants excepted to this decision. This exception presents the only material question exhibited by the record before us.

The appellants were restricted to this ground of objection by the terms of an order vacating pro tanto an adjudication already made in the proceedings, and were therefore precluded from raising any other ground of defense.

Questions as to the corporate organization of the petitioning Company, its action in authorizing these proceedings, the right of a railroad company to acquire lands under navigable water as against the State, and the rights and interests of littoral owners in such lands, are therefore all excluded from the controversy by the terms of the order opening the appellants' default.

The original order of condemnation appointing commissioners to appraise the value of the land proposed to be taken, constituted an adjudication in favor of the respondent, upon the questions involved, disposing of every question which might have been raised in opposition hereto except that allowed to be litigated by order referred to.

It was conceded by the petitioner upon the hearing that the lands in question were not required for its present uses; and it is strenuously contended therefrom by the appellants that the petitioner has not made a case for condemnation, or such a case as establishes a reasonable probability that such lands will be required for its uses in the future.

It is quite obvious that the beneficial exercise of the power of acquiring property for public uses cannot be enjoyed unless allowed in anticipation of the contemplated improvement; and it is therefore well settled in this State that the mere fact that the land proposed to be taken for a public use is not needed for the present and immediate purpose of the petitioning party is not necessarily a defense to a proceeding to condemn it.

The statute authorizing the formation of railroad corporations confers power upon such as are organized under its provisions to acquire lands by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, not only from individuals but also from the State, for its prospective as well as present uses, provided its necessities for such use in the immediate future are established beyond reasonable doubt. Lansing v. Smith, 8 Cow. 146; 8 C. 4 Wend. 9; § 21, Laws 1850, chap. 140;

Rensselaer etc. R. R. v. Davis, 43 N. Y. 187; Re N. Y. C. & H. R. R. Co. 77 N. Y. 249.

The exercise of this power is in derogation of individual rights and is always burdensome and often injurious to the owner, beyond the power of pecuniary compensation to wholly redress, and should be allowed only when the necessity for the land clearly appears and its proposed use is clearly embraced within the legitimate objects of the power.

The only question therefore in the case is whether the evidence shows such a case as renders it probable that these lands will be required within a reasonable period for the uses of the petitioning corporation.

No evidence was offered by the appellants upon the question at the trial; and they rely wholly for their defense upon the insufficiency of the proof given by the petitioner to establish a case for condemnation. The special term found as a fact that "The land was required by the petitioner for the purposes of its incorporation, to wit: for tracks, switches, sidings and depot grounds, whereon cars may be moved, loaded and unloaded, stored, received and dispatched; for freight sheds wherein freight may be received and stored and then loaded into cars and delivered to consignees; and for necessary terminal grounds for the purpose of the incorporation of said Company and for the purpose of constructing and operating its railroad."

It was further found that such use was not required for the purpose of its local traffic, but for the purpose of enabling it to fulfill the obligations of a contract made between it and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, whereby it had bound itself to furnish to such company accommodations over its road for transporting freight, passengers, express and mail matter between the proposed termini of such Baltimore & Ohio Road at Elizabethport in New Jersey, to and from the City of New York. We think the evidence fully supported these findings.

The proof shows that the petitioner is a domestic railroad corporation, operating a line of road on Staten Island which has been mainly used heretofore for local purposes but which it is now proposed to utilize as a connecting link between the system of railroads known as that of the Baltimore & Ohio and the Port and City of New York. The vast increase of business which such a connection will occasion to the petitioner's railroad and the necessity of increased facilities for handling it is too obvious to be disputed. The benefit to be derived from such a connection, not only to the public but also to the petitioner, is clearly apparent from the evidence and renders the object for which the appropriation of the land in question is sought a public use, within the meaning ascribed to that term by the decisions of this court. N. Y. & Harlem R. R. Co. v. Kip, 46 N. Y. 547; Re N. Y. C. & H. R. R. Co. 77 N. Y. 268.

The fact that the condemnation of the land in question is also earnestly desired by a foreign railroad corporation and will inure largely to its benefit furnishes no reason for denying the relief asked for by the petitioner, provided it has brought itself within the language of the statute authorizing such a proceeding. Re N. Y. L. & W. R. R. Co. 99 N. Y. 21.

It is claimed that because certain structures which are required to be built in order to form the connection between the two systems of railroads are not yet begun or completed, and that their construction is conjectural and uncertain and does not afford a sufficient degree of probability of their ultimate construction as authorizes the court to condemn the property in question for its proposed uses.

The principal structures referred to are the extension of the petitioner's railroad over a bridge or viaduct to be erected across Arthur's Kill, which divides Staten Island and New Jersey, and the building of a railroad track by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company from Bound Brook to Elizabethport in New Jersey, a distance of about sixteen miles, connecting the roads of the contracting parties.

The evidence shows that the petitioner is bound by its contract with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company to construct such bridge and perfect its facilities for accommodating the increased traffic within one year from the date of the contract, viz.: October 28, 1885, unless obstructed and delayed by hostile legal proceedings or want of lawful authority to do so, and in case of delay from such causes, then with all reasonable diligence after such obstacles have been removed and authority obtained.

The same contract provides that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company shall within one year from the date thereof, or if delayed by hostile legal proceedings, with all reasonable diligence, perfect its connection at Elizabethport with the railroad of the petitioner. It thus appears that the contemplated connection between the petitioner's railroad and the vast system of railroads controlled by the Baltimore & Ohio Company is assured, by contract obligations between parties interested in making such connection and presumptively able to comply with their obligations if no legal obstacles prevent. It also appears that the contracting parties have already built and leased lines stretching over several hundred miles for the purpose of carrying out the purpose in view, and that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company has already in the performance of its contract assumed liabilities for the Staten Island Rapid Transit Railroad Company to the amount of $2,500,000, and has advanced and expended money in the purchase of property on Staten Island and elsewhere and in extending its tracks for the purpose of the traffic contemplated to be carried on over the petitioner's road to upwards of $1,000,000.

The pecuniary expenditures made and the liabilities assumed by both of the contracting parties, as well as the manifest interest which both of them have in carrying into effect the projected enterprise, afford the most conclusive assurance that this application is made in good faith and for the sole purpose of acquiring property for the use of the petitioning Railroad Company. All of the testimony taken on the hearing concurs as to the necessity of the appropriation of all the property described for the proposed use; and we have been referred to no circumstance appearing in the case which seems to cast any suspicion upon the motives of the petitioner in preferring the application.

While the limitations under which the appellants are permitted to defend this proceeding do not permit them to raise any questions as to the authority of the court to entertain the proceeding and grant the relief sought, it may be proper to say that it seems to be fully authorized by sections 21 and 25 of the General Railroad Act, and the cases of Lansing v. Smith, 8 Cow. 146, and on appeal 4 Wend. 9; Gould v. Hudson River R. R. Co. 6 N. Y. 524, and R. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. R. Co. 77 N. Y. 248.

It is also proper to say that the enactment of Congress during its last session of a bill authorizing the contracting parties hereinbefore referred to, to build a railroad bridge or viaduct across Arthur's Kill, has apparently removed any legal objections to such a structure and rendered it quite certain that the connections contracted for between such parties will be made and the property sought to be obtained by this proceeding devoted to the purposes alleged in the petition.

The order should be affirmed, with costs.
All concur except Miller, J., absent.

1. Where the only result of defects in a locomotive engine is to diminish its power, the responsibility of the railroad company for such defects is no greater than it would be in the case of a new engine of the same power as the defective engine at the time of an accident claimed to have been caused thereby.
2. A railroad company is not bound to have at a given point an engine of sufficient power to avert the consequences of an accident which it had no reason to anticipate.
3. Hence, where an employee of a railroad company was, in the course of his employment, caught by the brake beam of a moving car and injured, the company was not liable merely because the engine attached to such car (with the capacity of which the person injured was acquainted) was, by reason of a defect in its flues and main steam valve, not sufficiently powerful to stop the car in time to avert the injury.

In *Fort Wayne etc. R. R. Co. v. In Indianapolis etc. R. R. Co. v. Flanigan, 77 Ill. 365, it was held that if the coupling of a freight car suddenly became out of repair, the company using it would not be liable to an employee, for an injury received in consequence thereof, unless its attention had been called to the defect, or it could have discovered the defect and had an opportunity to make the needed repairs.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was, in 1877, the yard master of the defendant at Syracuse, and as such it was his duty to superintend and aid in the shifting of cars and to couple and uncouple cars. The shifting engine at that place, on the day alleged in the complaint, was attached to twelve cars, and, after drawing them a short distance up an ascending grade, it became stalled and then, under the direction of the plaintiff, the engine was backed so as to enable him to uncouple some of the cars. For that purpose he went between two cars, while they were moving slowly backward, and his foot caught under a brake beam and he was dragged along about forty-five feet when a car wheel ran over one of his legs and crushed it so as to make its amputation necessary. This action was brought to recover damages for the injury thus caused, and the claim of the plaintiff is that the injury was due solely to neglect chargeable to the defendant.

The plaintiff does not complain that the road bed or the cars or any of the appliances which he was required to use were insufficient or out of order. His sole complaint is that the engine was out of repair, and insufficient for the use to which it was devoted; and against it he makes these complaints which I will notice specially.

1. The flues of the engine were foul and somewhat stopped up. The only effect of this was that steam was generated less rapidly and the power of the engine was thus diminished.

2. The main valve in the steam chest leaked and that diminished the power of the engine by just so much as the steam escaped, and it had no other effect.

8. But the more serious defect was that the throttle valve leaked. One effect of a leakage of steam through the throttle valve is that the steam cannot be entirely shut off; and the consequence is that an engine with such a defect may move from its position when placed at rest, unless blocked. But when the throttle valve is open and the engine in motion, there can be no leakage as all the steam passes through the open valve; and hence this defect does not interfere with the power of the engine.

There is another effect caused by the leaking of the steam through the throttle valve, which is the only one so far as I can perceive which can be claimed to have any bearing here. In the case of such leaking it is frequently more difficult to throw over the lever and thus reverse the engine.

The claim of the plaintiff is that when his foot was caught, he immediately signaled the engineer to stop; and that if the throttle valve had been in order, the engineer could have more readily reversed the engine and thus have arrested its motion before his leg was crushed. But the difficulty with this claim is that the undisputed facts stand in its way. There is no proof that the engineer saw or heard plaintiff's signal when he first gave it. The only person who was upon the engine and saw what took place there was called as a witness by the plaintiff, and he testified that when the engineer heard the signal given by the plaintiff, he at once threw over the lever and reversed the engine, and that he did this quickly and without any difficulty and thus arrested the motion of the engine so that thereafter it passed backward only about five feet.

The defect in the throttle valve, therefore, had no relation whatever to this accident; and the plaintiff's sole reliance for the maintenance of his action must be upon the defective condition of the flues and of the main steam valve, the sole consequence of which was the diminished power of the engine. These defects may have diminished the power of the engine by several horse-power so that the engine, instead of being, for instance, eighty horse-power, was only seventy.

It matters not that this diminished power came from these defects, nor how the engine came to be of only seventy horse-power. The responsibility for the defects is no greater than it would have been if the defendant had furnished a new engine of precisely the same power.

The plaintiff was familiar with the capacity and power of the engine and in no way entrapped or deceived by its use. Suppose, then, the defendant had furnished a new engine of seventy horse-power, precisely the same power which we may assume this had at the time of the accident; upon what principle could it be said that it would be liable for such an accident?

Can it be laid down as a principle of law that it is bound to furnish to its employees engines suitable and adequate in power to every emergency? Who but the employer shall determine how powerful an engine shall be at any place and for any purpose? Suppose at this place the defendant had furnished an engine capable of moving but three cars at a time and running but ten miles an hour and the plaintiff had known it, could he justly complain of it?

Would such an engine, in any legal or proper sense, be dangerous?

If an employer should furnish to an employee a horse which from natural weakness or from disease should not have strength for the work in hand, and the employee should in consequence thereof receive some injury, could he hold the employer responsible for his damages?

These inquiries need not be pursued. The answers to them are obvious. This was not a dangerous engine and it did not cause the injury. That was caused by the break beam accidentally catching plaintiff's foot; and the engine simply failed to rescue him from the danger in which he was placed. It was an accident which the defendant had no reason to anticipate, and hence it was not bound to have an engine there adequate to avert its consequences. It cannot be charged with negligence in not foreseeing that such an accident might occur and that then the engine would lack power to stop suddenly enough to ward off injury. A more powerful engine could start a train more suddenly and, for the same reason, could stop one more suddenly.

It would impose upon every railroad company very embarrassing, onerous and unjust responsibilities if, in the case of accidents with moving trains, it was to be a subject of inquiry before a jury whether the particular accident might not have been avoided with an engine of greater or less power.

If this engine, drawing a train upon a railroad, had in consequence of its imperfect condition become stalled so that the passengers and freight failed to reach their destination in proper time; or if it had broken down and thereby injured some one; or if when placed at rest it had run away in consequence of the leakage through the throttle valve, different questions would have been presented for our consideration.

But without violating any rules that have been laid down for the protection of employees we are constrained to hold in this case that this was not, as to the plaintiff, a dangerous engine; that it was reasonably safe and proper; and that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant in putting it to the service in which it was employed; and that therefore, upon the facts, as they now appear, the plaintiff has no cause of action against the defendant; and this conclusion finds ample support in the cases of Burke v. Witherbee, 98 N. Y. 562; Marsh v. Chickering and Sweeney v. Berlin & Jones Envelope Co. 101 N. Y. 896, 520; [Same Cases, 2 Cent. Rep. 419, 457].

In the case of Marsh v. Chickering, Judge Miller, following prior authorities, said: "The rule is that the master does not owe to his servants the duty to furnish the best known or conceivable appliances; he is simply required to furnish such as are reasonably safe and suitable; such as a prudent man would furnish if his own life were exposed to the danger that would result from unsuitable or unsafe appliances."

Suppose in that case the ladder had, when new, been furnished with hooks and spikes, and they had by use been broken off; how could it have been claimed that the liability of the master would be different? Would the master have been bound to replace hooks and spikes which had come off, while he owed no duty to his servant originally to place them upon the ladder?

So here, Was the defendant bound to restore this engine, by repairs, to the power which it originally possessed, while it owed no duty to purchase a new engine of greater horse power than this then possessed? It is plain that the answer to these questions should be in the negative. Jones v. Granite Mills, 126 Mass. 84; Kelley v. Silver Spring Co. 12 R. I. 112; Smith v. St. Louis etc. R. Co. 69 Mo. 34; Fort Wayne etc. R. R. Co. v. Gildersleeve, 33 Mich. 133; Western, etc. R. R. Co. v. Bishop, 50 Ga. 465; Wonder v. Balt. & O. R. R. Co. 32 Md. 411; Philadelphia etc. R. R. Co. v. Keenan, 108 Pa. 124.

The judgment should, therefore, be reversed and a new trial ordered; costs to abide event.

Rapallo, Miller and Finch, J.J., concur; Danforth, J., reads for affirmance, with whom Andrews, J., concurs; Ruger, Ch. J., takes no part.

Danforth, J., dissenting:

Upon the trial it appeared that the plaintiff was in the service of the defendant as yard master, and in the performance of his duty was shifting cars in its freight yard. The train of twelve cars, part of them empty, was drawn a short distance up a slight grade, towards a switch, where part were to be cut off; but the resistance proved too much for the engine and it was stalled. The train was then slowly backed to enable the plaintiff to take off a portion of the cars. To do this he stepped between the third and fourth car, but found a square pin driven fast in a round hole and immovable. He then tried the other, all the time keeping up with the movement of the train; this pin also was tight, and before he could remove it, his right foot was caught between the brake beam of the car behind and the ground.

He at once signaled and the engineer attempted to stop; but before he succeeded, the plaintiff's other foot caught in a frog, and he was pulled partly down, the car wheel ran upon his leg, and when the train stopped the wheel stood on his knee which was, of course, fractured, and the leg afterwards amputated.

Between signaling to stop and the final stroke, the plaintiff, pushed also by the brake beam, had hobbled along on one foot the length of a car and a half, or forty-five feet. He recovered damages, upon the ground that the injuries complained of resulted from the defendant's failure in the exercise of ordinary care to provide a suitable engine for his use in the work required.

It is too well settled to permit discussion, that a master is under an obligation to use due care to supply its servant with suitable instruments and means to carry on the business intrusted to him. That a locomotive engine was necessary upon occasions like the one in question, that one was furnished, and that it in fact was defective, I do not understand to have been controverted. Indeed, at the end of the plaintiff's case, and again at the close of the evidence on both sides, the defendant in moving for a nonsuit claimed, not that no defect was proven, but "That the evidence failed to establish any defect in the locomotive which contributed to plaintiff's injury;" and again, "That it fails to show that any defect existed in the locomotive, of sufficient importance to charge the defendant with knowledge of its existence;" or that it was "of a sufficiently serious character to charge the defendant with negligence in permitting the locomotive to be used in its business." By implication certainly, the existence of defects was conceded, and their effect and consequence only called in question.

The motion being denied, the propositions involved in it were submitted to the jury in a charge to which no exception was taken. They were told to inquire: "first, whether the engine in question was actually unsafe or not; and second, whether defendant knew or ought to have known of its condition."

The trial judge also said to them: "It is not only necessary that the plaintiff should satisfy you that the defendant was guilty of negligence, but also that this negligence caused the injury of which he complains;" and calling attention to the particulars alleged against the defendant, added: "Did these defects, if they existed (the defect in the throttle valve, the defect in this main valve), either or both combined, cause the injury?"

He also said: "If you find that the defects existed, that the defendant had notice of them, and that those defects caused this injury, then you reach the third question of fact; and that is whether or not the plaintiff was guilty of any negligence on his part that contributed to this injury;" adding: "No matter how gross the negligence of the defendant may have been on the occasion in question, if the plaintiff by slight negligence on his part contributed to the injury which he received, he cannot recover;" and these questions having been answered by the jury in favor of the plaintiff, the propositions to which the attention of the trial judge was called, are restated upon the appellant's points, and upon them the defendant mainly relies to get rid of the finding of the jury.

As to the alleged want of care or vigilance on the plaintiff's part, it is enough to say that the evidence was quite sufficient to permit that tribunal to find that there was no departure by him from the line of duty, or the requirements of his service; no recklessness or carelessness on his part, contributory to the accident, or essential without knowledge; but on the contrary, a faithful application by him, to the want in hand, of the lessons of a long experience in similar operations.

The substantial question is whether there is evidence reasonably tending to show that the injury resulted from any defect in the engine. Its throttle valve leaked. So did its main valve, or as it is sometimes called, the valve in the steam chest. Its flues were badly stopped up. The various uses of these parts of the engine are explained by witnesses. The flues connect the fire box with the smoke box, and present the radiating surface through which heat is conducted to the water, and steam generated.

The throttle valve admits or shuts off steam from the cylinders, and regulates its supply. The valves in the steam chest are intended to govern the admission and exhaustion of steam to and from the cylinder; and when in fit order to perform its function, it will admit steam to one end only of the cylinders at one time, and allow its escape from that end as soon as it is admitted to the other, and must cover the steam ports so as not to permit steam to escape from the chest into the exhaust port.

The throttle valve is controlled by the engineer. He may direct the steam into either end of the steam chest and thus give a backward or forward motion to the engine, or exclude it altogether and make it motionless. It is obvious then that it is of the greatest importance that a throttle valve should remain closed and tight after steam is shut off. If it opens accidentally, by reason of defective gearing or other cause, or if it is so worn as to leak, that result follows which led to the action of Cone v. Delaware etc. R. R. Co. 81 N. Y. 206.

There, through a leaky valve, steam escaped into the cylinder; the engine was put in motion without the intervention of the engineer; the plaintiff was crushed between two cars, and the defendant, by reason of the unfit condition of the engine, was charged with negligence and held liable for the injury.

The evidence shows that the engine in the case at bar was in the same condition. It had more than once before this accident moved off when no person controlled it. It had been left standing, but the steam passed into the cylinder, in spite of the adjustment of the valve by the engineer with intent that it should remain stationary.

Speaking of the very time of the accident, one witness says: "Neither the engineer nor any other man could shut the throttle valve off so that she would stay still;" to effect that, besides placing the lever in the center, it was necessary to block the wheels, a stick placed each side of the driving wheel, so that she could go neither one way nor the other. Again: "The throttle valve leaked whenever the engine was used;" "The throttle would leak so the steam would accumulate in the cylinder, so when you went to throw over (the lever) you couldn't; and when you did throw over, she would jump, and you couldn't couple after with safety, as you ought to do;" and illustrating the effect of the unregulated passage of steam through the leaking valve into the chest, the witness says: "You could not depend upon her; if you threw her a little too far ahead she would take a jump; and if you threw her the other way she would jump backwards. At that rate you can't couple cars. If the engine was going backward and you wanted to stop her, the engineer would throw her; and the minute he got over so the steam got over the other side of the piston he would throw her up in the center; the engine would churn backwards and forwards till the steam got out of the cylinder."

Another witness, familiar with the engine and accustomed to its use, states that when wishing to keep it stationary, he not only "hailed her up in the center" but "put a block on each side of the driving wheel and set the brake on the tender."

Another witness, an engineer in defendant's employ on and before January 27, 1877, and then running this engine, says: "At that time the engine was in very bad condition; her main valve leaked: that is, the steam blew through; that is what I call leaking; the throttle valve leaked and she was a very hard engine to handle * * * a leaky throttle valve, to my notion, makes an engine harder to handle and a good deal worse to stop. I think that when the throttle leaks that of course throws the pressure on the valve all the while when the throttle leaks, and the more pressure on the valves the harder it is to handle the engine; that is my idea of it."

Another, an engineer of abundant experience in the yards of the Central Railroad Company, in shifting trains, and whose competency is not disputed, says, in answer to a question embodying the defects referred to, that such an engine is not in a safe condition to do shifting with, because "You wouldn't have control of it." "If you received a signal to stop, you can't stop any too quick. When you are stopping, if you have an engine with a leaky throttle, moving along slowly, as you would be, of course the steam would act against you; you would naturally have a little momentum, and shut your throttle off with your hand on the lever ready to reverse at the signal; and if that throttle leaked it would be just the same as if the throttle was partially opened and the steam flowing on into the dry pipes, and from the dry pipes into the steam chest, and of course if you reversed your engine you might get it over and you might not. If you are just slacking up to uncouple, and you give her a little steam, and then shut her off and move back by the momentum you have got, a leaky throttle would have the same tendency as though the throttle was open; upon your motion backward it increases your motion as long as you don't reverse your lever. If your lever is in the backward motion and you shut off the throttle, then if she leaks it gives you more momentum, to the extent of the leak."

Again the witness says: "A leak in the throttle has the effect upon a locomotive which would be had if the throttle were partly open; that is to say, there is always some steam passing down to the steam chest, and its effect is solely upon the power of the engineer to manage the lever; it takes the certainty of handling the engine away from him; its effect is to interfere with the management of the locomotive."

As to the existence of these defects, and their importance, therefore, the evidence is overwhelming. Did the defendant have notice of them? Possibly not, in words, that the valves leaked, that this or that particular part was affected; but of the general weakness and inutility of the engine, reiterated notice.

In the first place it was an old engine and repeatedly in the defendant's repair shops. Harvey, who for four years ran for the defendant, and this engine in January 1877, describes her defects and asked the master mechanic "to do some work upon her." He said he "was short of engines and just as quick as he got a chance, he would take the engine and do some work upon her."

Some weeks before the accident the plaintiff knew of the engine running away, and that it was not in good condition; what ailed it he did not know, but he reported the engine to Niver, the superintendent. "I told him," he says, that "I was not able to do my work with the engine. He asked me what was the matter with her, and I told him I didn't know; so he gave me an order on the master mechanic to give me another engine; but he had nothing to give me in place of it. He gave me an order; that (producing a paper) is the order; he wrote it and signed it." These are its words: "Buchanan, give the yard master some other engine to do the work. (signed) W. K. Niver."

Niver was a witness for the defendant. He denies nothing of this. Asked by defendant's counsel a single question: "Were you ever notified by anybody, prior to this accident to Mr. Bajus, that that engine as to its valves was out of condition," he answers: "I have no recollection of ever being notified of any such thing; I had no knowledge of its being out of repair with reference to its valves."

The master mechanic, however, was not unfamiliar with the seat of probable trouble. Testifying for the defendant, he says the engine was rebuilt in 1874; the valves were then fixed by facing and surfacing, and three weeks after that she came back for repairs, and her throttle was fixed again, and how often it was at the repair shop after that is not stated.

The evidence disclosed not merely a feeble and inefficient machine, but an impaired one. The trouble was not in its original design, but came from age and wear. It needed repairs. The necessity for them was known by the defendant, but they were not made. Did the defects cause the injury?

The circumstances of Cone's Case (supra) illustrate the effect of an untimely application of steam through machinery designed, but which through imperfection failed, to shut it off. Those of the case at bar are in one respect different. The engineer was at his post, seeking to obey the signal of the plaintiff. He wanted to stop the engine. He changed the lever to the forward motion, and this should have directed the full head of steam into the forward port, and would have done so if the valve had not leaked and so permitted part to go into the other.

The travel of the valve is placed under the control of the engineer, that he may employ the greatest power of the engine by admitting steam into the cylinders, or by excluding it, suspend motion, as in his judgment the exigency of the case requires.

Unless it responds to his will the machine is necessarily imperfect. If the steam without his action can pass into the port ways, to some extent he loses control over it and must overcome its resistance before his own will can be effective. In such a case there is not a mere loss of power, but a misapplication of power. The steam passing out is met by steam coming in, and the motion of the piston is necessarily hindered. So, as we have seen, it is testified to in this case, the engineer in an effort to control the engine, "would have," as the witness says, "to operate against all the steam in there," the chest. "If the throttle valve had been tight there would have been no steam in there." Again, the witness says: "It is harder to handle an engine when the throttle leaks than when it does not leak."

So although "you shut her off in the backward or forward motion, and the throttle leaks, she would go that motion." In other words the shut-off is not effectual. The steam still enters the chest.

Thus it is apparent that the ports of the engine were so worn and out of repair as to defeat the object for which they were constructed; that they caused the machinery to act independently of the control of the engineer and took from him the power to stop quickly, or make sudden starts, as the emergency of coupling or uncoupling, or making up a train, required. In other words, a machine whose motor was intended to be distinct from its operator and so controllable by him, was made by these defects to act automatically both as to power and movements. In its principal operations it was independent. Hence, when the plaintiff gave the signal to stop, the engineer sought to do so; but although the train was backing slowly, the engine failed to obey. If sound and in good order it should have become motionless after a few revolutions of its wheels, or, as the jury might have found, in the traverse of less than ten feet. Had it done so the plaintiff would not have suffered. It actually passed over forty-five feet, and the injury occurred.

It surely cannot be said as matter of law that it was not brought on by the incapacity of the engine, by reason of its defective condition, to be subject to the will of the engineer, nor that the steam on which he had a right to rely as a power to do his bidding was not in fact applied in resistance to his intent. Nor can we say that the resistance of the escaping steam, nor the prolonged motion made inevitable by the unexpected restraint upon the lever, was not the material and efficient cause of the accident, nor that by reason of the leaky throttle valve, motive power was supplied while the engineer sought and expected to exclude it.

To save the plaintiff it was necessary to shut off steam and at once stop the engine. The leaky throttle was as a throttle partly open, and made that impossible. It might even accelerate and prolong motion which except for that would have been suspended.

In any view the action of the engine was shown to have been unnatural, and its eccentricity due to its defective condition. It was in evidence that if it had been sound and of normal capacity, the engineer might have so checked and controlled the train as to insure the plaintiff's safety. It was therefore for the defendant to prove that the injury was caused without its fault, and was to be accounted for by other causes than one produced by its negligence. Seybolt v. N. Y. L. E. & W. R. R. Co. 95 N. Y. 570.

In Flike v. Boston & A. R. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 549, the train had one less than its usual number of men, and the evidence tended to show that if the absentee had been there, he with the others could have controlled the impetus of the cars and prevented the accident. The defendant was held liable, the court saying: "As well might the company be relieved if the train had started without an engineer, or without brakes, or with a defective engine." There the injury was occasioned by collision with cars accidentally broken from the train, and the principal protection in such cases was said to be the prompt and efficient application of the brakes, and the defendant held liable, because a sufficient number of men to perform that duty was not present.

Here we have the defective engine instead of the absent brakeman. In principle the cases are not unlike. In this a sound appliance was lacking; in that the full tale of operators. The contract implied between the parties is the same; the character of negligence is the same; the consequences of the default the same; and a difference in liability can stand upon neither reason nor authority.

But in any aspect the question presented turns in part at least upon these considerations and is one of fact; the jurors passing upon it have found that the injury not only came from the defects, but that the consequences were such as might naturally result from them under the circumstances in which the plaintiff was placed, and that the defective condition of the engine was imputable as negligence to the defendant through the nonperformance of a positive duty to make those repairs which it knew, or which from their character it might have known were needed for the efficient and safe operation of the machine. Clearly, the evidence was sufficient in some reasonable view to justify these conclusions.

It was therefore properly submitted to the jury, and the judgment should be sustained, upon the ground warranted by their verdict: that the defendant failed in its duty to furnish to its servant machinery reasonably fit for the use to which it was to be applied, and in a condition not to endanger his safety. To hold otherwise would relieve the defendant from just responsibility to its employees, and go far to abrogate a rule of action which up to this time we have declared to be unqualified, and by which a master is required to use all the reasonable care, diligence and caution in providing for the safety of those in his employ, and furnishing for their use in his work, safe, sound and suitable tools, implements, appliances and machinery in the prosecution thereof, and keeping the same in repair; Benzing v. Steinway, 101 N. Y. 547 [S. C. 2 Cent. Rep. 491]; to the end "that the servant shall be under no risks from imperfect and inadequate machinery or other material means and appliances." Laning v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 532.

So this is declared to be (Id.) "a duty to be affirmatively and positively fulfilled and performed," and in language governing the case before us is added: "There is not a performance of this duty until there has been placed for the servant's use perfect and adequate physical means, or due care used to that end." (Id.)

The cases cited by the appellant furnish no exception to these rules. In Marsh v. Chickering, 101 N. Y. 396 [S. C. 2 Cent. Rep. 419], the instrument was perfect of its kind, and so it was in Sweeney v. Berlin & Jones Enr. Co. 101 N. Y. 520 [2 Cent. Rep. 457], and we held that the master was not bound to procure either the best known or conceivable appliances, or discard an old but sound machine for a new invention.

The loss to the plaintiff here resulted neither from lack of a new invention, or a different contrivance, but from a known imperfection resulting from the omission to repair a machine which the defendant was bound to keep in order.

The judgment should be affirmed.

1. Where an executor has knowledge, or by the use of reasonable diligence could have knowledge, that funds of the estate in possession of his coexecutor are not being properly invested, but are being used in the business of a firm of which the coexecutor is a member, with allowance of interest thereon, and he fails to endeavor to have such funds properly invested or to remonstrate with his coexecutor, he is liable for loss arising from such use of the funds.
2. If the circumstances are such as to create a doubt in respect to the safety of uninvested funds of the estate, an executor is not exonerated from the duty of vigilance in protecting them and seeing that they are properly invested, by the fact that such funds were never in his possession or under his actual control, but were received by and were in the exclusive possession of his coexecutor.
3. An executor is not a guarantor for the safety of securities committed to his charge and does not warrant such safety under all circumstances, and hence is not liable for a breach of trust on the part of his coexecutor in wrongfully taking and converting securities belonging to the estate, lawfully in the sole possession and charge of such coexecutor, unless it appears that he had knowledge of or assented to the acts of his coexecutor, or had notice which should have put him on inquiry.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, modifying and affirming as modified a judgment of the New York Special Term, in favor of plaintiff in an action to charge defendants as executors and trustees with an alleged loss incurred to plaintiff's interest in the estate of her father. Reversed.

Memorandum of decision below, 32 Hun, 243.

The facts and questions raised are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Nash & Holt, for appellant:

Executors and trustees cannot allow one of their number to manage the estate by himself, without being responsible for his acts as their agent. If indeed a trustee simply joins in a receipt for mere conformity, he is not by that act made conclusively liable; but if he has further duties to perform in respect to the moneys so received in the way of security, investment or otherwise, and neglects these duties, delegating the whole trust to his cotrustees, he becomes liable for his defaults.

This action is not barred by the statute; as between cestui que trust and trustee in the case of a direct trust no length of time is a bar, for, from the privity existing between them, the possession of the one is the possession of the other, and there is no adverse title.

Messrs. John L. Logan and William Allen Butler, for respondent:

The rule is that where several persons are appointed by a testator as the executors of his will, they have respectively equal rights to the possession and custody of the securities of the estate; and where one of several executors has in the first instance the actual custody, he has the right to retain possession.

The surviving partners of the testator's firm of Wilmerding & Mount were at his death lawfully in possession of the entire copartnership property and entitled to retain the same in their control and to liquidate the affairs of the firm, accounting to the personal representatives of the deceased partner for his share as ascertained.

Coll. Partn. § 129; Case v. Abel, 1 Paige, 898.

The evidence clearly showed that the plaintiff sustained no injury from the circumstance that there was no actual separation of the securities. The want of a declared separation by sealed instruments did not in any manner occasion or induce the spoliation of the estate by the defaulting executor; nor would the existence of such instruments have prevented it.

Croft v. Williams, 88 N. Y. 884.

The general rule is that there must be a conjunction of wrong and loss to sustain an action. Conceding the wrong for the purpose of argument, no loss can be shown as the result of it.

The estate having been all once invested, and the loss occasioned solely by the wrongful act of George G. Wilmerding, the defendant McKesson cannot be charged with moneys which he never in fact received, nor with moneys which his cotrustee wasted or misapplied, unless he is shown to have knowingly permitted such waste and misapplication.

The rule is stated in Williams on Executors, 6th Am. ed. 1877, p. 1820: "A devastavit by one of two executors or administrators shall not charge his companion, provided he has not intentionally or otherwise contributed to it, for the testator's having misplaced his confidence in one shall not operate to the prejudice of the other."

The authorities relied upon by the appellant's counsel to visit the consequences of culpable negligence on defendant McKesson, and saddle him with the penalty of the breach of trust by his cotrustee, are all cases where the particular circumstances made the general rule inapplicable.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted by the plaintiff against the defendants, for the purpose of making them liable as executors and trustees of the estate of William E. Wilmerding, deceased, who was the father of plaintiff, and as guardians of his minor children, upon rendering an account of their proceedings for an alleged loss incurred to the plaintiff's interest in said estate.

Two other persons were named as executors and trustees in the will, in addition to the defendants, one of whom is dead and the other has taken no part in the administration of the estate.

At the time of the testator's death he was the senior member of the auction house of Wilmerding & Mount, an old established firm of high credit and repute; and a considerable portion of his estate was the interest which he had in this firm, which interest was valued upon the inventory of the executors at $140,909.14.

The survivors of the firm, after the testator's death, consisting of his three sons and William S. Mount, continued the business under the same firm name. The new firm failed in 1874 and there was a loss to the estate, by reason thereof, of about $150,000, which was entirely attributable to the fact that the trust moneys were allowed to be intermingled with the moneys of the firm and used in the business and thus exposed to its hazards, and also to the fact that the securities of the estate were left under the individual control of the defendant George G. Wilmerding, one of the executors and trustees, who was a half brother of the plaintiff, and were appropriated by him for the benefit of the firm of Wilmerding & Mount, of which he was a member.

The plaintiff, at the time of the death of the testator, was twelve years old.

The complaint alleged that the interest of the plaintiff in her father's estate was, first, one equal undivided third part of the separate estate of plaintiff's deceased mother in her father's possession; second, a legacy, under her father's will, of $10,000, to be invested by the trustees in the same manner as her share of the residuary estate; third, a life interest in the income of one thirteenth part of the residuary estate of her father, which, together with the legacy of $10,000, aforesaid, was to be kept invested by the trustees for her benefit, and the income paid to her for life.

Plaintiff's right to maintain this action is based upon the ground that her interest was not kept separately invested so as to be distinguishable, and that the funds of the estate were permitted to be used by the firm of Wilmerding & Mount.

The proof upon the trial established, and the judge found, that during the entire administration of the estate until the failure of Wilmerding & Mount, the executor, George G. Wilmerding, had the custody and control of the securities belonging to the estate; that he had two tin boxes, in one of which he kept the bonds, mortgages, stocks and other securities, and in the other the account books and vouchers for payments, which boxes were kept in the safe of the firm, and the defendant McKesson had no access to the boxes or the safe in which they were kept; that he never saw them except when they were occasionally produced by the defendant Wilmerding at the office of the accountant; that he never examined them, having full faith and confidence in the integrity and fidelity of his coexecutor, Wilmerding.

Moneys which were realized from the estate in the course of administration were paid to the firm of Wilmerding & Mount, under the authority of the executor George G. Wilmerding; and the evidence shows that these moneys were used from time to time, while they remained in the possession of the firm, in the transaction of its business, and that the firm paid interest on said moneys, which was credited from time to time on the account books of the estate. This continued down to and including the time of the failure of the firm.

The loss to the estate clearly arose from the unlawful act of George in intermingling its funds with those of the business in which he was engaged; and no question is raised as to his liability.

The trial court also found that the defendant McKesson had knowledge at the time he filed his accounts as executor, and afterwards down to the time of the failure of the firm of Wilmerding & Mount, that the moneys of the estate were from time to time received by said firm as depositaries or bankers; that cash balances accumulated in their hands and were left with them, on which they allowed interest; that he could at all times, by inspecting the books kept by the accountant of the estate, have ascertained the particulars in respect to such balances, and that he was negligent in not keeping himself informed of the contents of said books, and in allowing said balances so to remain with said firm; that he was also guilty of negligence as executor and guardian in allowing the moneys of the estate to accumulate in the hands of his coexecutor and coguardian, George G. Wilmerding, after the first of January, 1870, as securities were paid off, in the discharge of which he took part.

The court further found that after the failure of Wilmerding & Mount the total loss to the estate of the testator, as shown by the indebtedness of said firm to the guardians' and to the executors' accounts and to the special funds was, by the direction of the defendant McKesson, ascertained and apportioned ratably upon the interests of the several beneficiaries which were still in the hands of the defendants as executors and guardians; and the amount so charged against the plaintiff was, in respect to the property she is entitled to absolutely, $16,177.25, and in respect to the property in which she has an interest for life, $22,686.20, as of the 31st day of December, 1874.

It was also found that the account between the guardians and trustees and the plaintiff, brought down to October 15, 1880, stood as follows: amount of principal of life estate on hand December 31, 1879, $14,289.19; amount of loss admitted on said life estate $22,686.20; making a total of $36,975.39.

Also that the amount on hand of the account current was, on January 1, 1880, $6,308.56; amount of loss admitted under term "contingent," $16,177.25; interest on $38,863.45, on aggregate of losses from January 1, 1875, to January 1, 1880, $12,653.94; payments since January 1, 1880, deducted, $964.64; interest from January 1, 1880, to October 15, 1880, on $71,145.50, $2,816.67; making a total of $36,986.78; and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $36,986.78, with interest thereon from October 15, 1880, due to her absolutely, and for the sum of $36,975.39, with interest thereon from October 15, 1880, due from defendants in respect to the life estate, and that the last mentioned sum be paid over to a trustee to be appointed in the place of the defendants.

This judgment was modified by the general term by reducing the first named sum of $36,986.78 to $11,300.26, and the last named amount of $36,975.39 to $17,033.34.

The decision of the general term exempted the defendant McKesson from all the loss of $16,177.25, except $1,915.82, with which it charged him, and from all the loss of $22,686.20 except $2,744.65, with which it charged him.

N. Y.

The sum of $17,315.12 was the amount due to the estate from Wilmerding & Mount, December 31, 1871, as appears from the findings, which also show that there was due December 31, 1872, from the firm to the estate $102,176.95, and on December 31, 1878, $111,992.01.

The opinion of the general term holds that the evidence justifies the finding that the defendant McKesson was liable for the balance due the estate at the close of the year 1871, but that he was not chargeable with the increase of the balances due the estate as shown in 1872 and 1878, which was owing to the receipt by the firm of the proceeds of investments paid off which at once went into their business, as well as to the misappropriation made by George during that period.

The deposits with the firm, of moneys received, included moneys realized in the due course of administration of the estate. While the use and conversion of the securities was a dishonest and unlawful misappropriation of the funds which constituted a devastavit upon the estate committed by the defendant Wilmerding, the liability of the defendant McKesson, for the loss incurred by the estate rests upon the ground that he failed to perform his duty, as an executor and guardian, in not taking charge of and protecting the interests intrusted to his keeping, and that the loss was occasioned by reason of his negligence and want of care.

The trial court found that he was chargeable with negligence in allowing the money to accumulate after January 1, 1870, as securities were paid off, in the discharge of which he took part. The evidence shows that there was no bank account kept by the executors jointly which would require the signatures of both executors to draw upon it, but only a bank account in the name of George G. Wilmerding, as executor; and this was discontinued in 1864, as inconvenient.

If this precaution had been observed, no money could have been drawn belonging to the estate without McKesson's direct authority. He had knowledge or means of knowing that the moneys which were paid in to George and were awaiting investment were used in the business of the firm of Wilmerding & Mount. When he rendered his account as executor, the account showed that the firm was allowing the estate interest on moneys in its hands, paying about $3,000 a year, which indicated that large sums were there belonging to the estate. After December 31, 1868, it appears that no new investments were made, and for six years afterwards moneys paid on securities which became due accumulated in the hands of the firm.

As we have seen, in 1872 over $100,000 was due the estate, as the books of account showed, and in 1878 over $111,000. McKesson had access to the books and could easily have ascertained what the amounts were in the hands of George or the firm of Wilmerding & Mount. He could have learned from the books, if from no other source, that this firm was using the moneys of the estate and paying interest thereon. His own evidence shows that when speaking to George on the subject of the accumulation of money about the time when $64,000 was paid in on the asylum bonds and $12,000 on the bond and mortgage, and other large sums were on hand as appeared by the account for the year 1872, he was informed that it would be needed to pay off "the boys."

This hardly furnished sufficient excuse for failing to see that the moneys of the estate were properly and safely invested. At this time, it may be remarked, "the boys" had been settled with, and afterwards large sums were paid in, which constituted the basis of the heaviest defalcation by George. His duty was to see that these large sums which were paid in were drawing interest from investments safely made; and if he had been vigilant in making inquiry he could not but have learned, if he did not know before, that the firm was using and allowing interest on moneys belonging to the estate. His neglect to make inquiries is evidence that he was negligent in looking after the interests entrusted to him.

It is true that the moneys which remained uninvested did not come into his hands; and perhaps it may be said that he had not the control over the same he would have had if they had been paid directly to him; but that fact did not excuse him from the use of ordinary care in protecting the funds from loss; and he must have known or he could have known, if he did not, that the funds had been diverted from the usual course of investments by being used in the business of the firm of Wilmerding & Mount; and he should at least have sought to have the same invested or to remonstrate with his co-executor for the use to which they had been appropriated.

Except as already stated, the proof does not show that he insisted that investments should be made, or took any measures with the view of procuring the same. The question whether he should have resorted to legal measures for the purpose of taking the funds out of the hands of his associate under the circumstances, does not distinctly arise, as it is not apparent that he affirmatively insisted upon a different disposition of the same; and it appears by his conduct that he acquiesced in their remaining in the condition in which they had been.

Although McKesson testified that before the failure of Wilmerding & Mount he never knew of the use, by George G. Wilmerding or his firm, of any moneys or funds of the estate, yet there is strong evidence to establish the fact that he must have known it, as the court substantially found; and if he did not, upon inquiry he could have ascertained it; and in failing to do so he was chargeable with carelessness and a neglect of a plain duty.

Cases may arise where one executor is responsible for the acts of his co-executor in the management of funds which have come into his hands; but where the funds of the estate were lawfully received by one of the executors or were originally in his hands or properly paid to him in the due course of administration and there is nothing to excite suspicion as to the integrity or responsibility of such trustee, or to create a belief that the funds have been improperly used or invested in violation of the established rules applicable to such cases, or were unlawfully allowed to remain uninvested, there is no rule which charges the executor or trustee who has not control of the fund, with the wrongful acts or misconduct of his associate.

If, however, the circumstances are such as to create a doubt in respect to the safety of the funds, a coexecutor is not exonerated from the duty of vigilance in protecting them. If the executor is merely passive and simply does not obstruct the collection or receipt of assets by his associate, he is not liable for the latter's waste; but where he knows and assents to such misapplication, or negligently suffers his co-executor to receive and waste the estate, when he has the means of preventing it by proper care, he becomes liable for a resulting loss. Croft v. Williams, 88 N. Y. 384.

McKesson did not occupy the position of a passive trustee, merely joining in receipts, etc. for conformity. He was active to a considerable extent as to matters connected with the trust, advised as to investments, passed his accounts as executor, received his lawful commissions, consulted counsel, and united in employing an accountant; he did everything that was required by the position he occupied except that he neglected to protect the estate from the hazards of the business of Wilmerding & Mount. His duty demanded that he should see that the moneys of the estate did not lie idle and that they should be protected from loss.

For his neglect in not attending to this duty he was clearly liable, except for the deficiency caused by the wrongful taking and conversion of the securities of the estate by George G. Wilmerding without his knowledge or consent. This was a breach of trust committed, after the plaintiff became of age in 1872, by George by the abstraction of securities in his possession and the hypothecation of the same for moneys loaned to himself or his firm. His fraudulent acts in this respect constituted a spoliation and waste of the funds of the estate for which McKesson was not responsible. The estate had been lawfully invested and the loss was caused by the wrongful and fraudulent acts of George G. Wilmerding, without the knowledge of McKesson, and with nothing to excite his suspicion that his cotrustee would be guilty of thus misappropriating and wasting the funds of the estate.

In such a case a cotrustee is not responsible for the acts of his associate. An executor or trustee is not a guarantor for the safety of the securities which are committed to his charge, and does not warrant such safety under any and all circumstances and against all contingencies, accidents or misfortunes. McCabe v. Fowler, 84 N. Y. 314.

The general rule as to the liability of one executor or trustee for the acts of his coexecutor or trustee is laid down in Williams on Executors, 6th Am. ed. p. 1820, as follows: "A deustavit by one of two executors or administrators shall not charge his companion provided he has not intentionally or otherwise contributed to it, for the testator's having misplaced his confidence in one shall not operate to the prejudice of the other."

For the deustavit of a coexecutor or trustee, an executor or trustee is not liable, unless it appears that he had knowledge or assented to the acts done or had notice which should excite his suspicion and put him on inquiry. This rule is fully sustained by the authorities. Sutherland v. Brush, 7 Johns. Ch. 17; Sherman v. Parish, 53 N. Y. 483; Adair v. Brimmer, 74 N. Y. 539; Ormiston v. Olcott and McCabe v.

Fowler, 84 N. Y. 339, 314; McKim v. Aulbach, 180 Mass. 481; Croft v. Williams, 88 N. Y. 384; Peter v. Beverly, 10 Pet. 532 [35 U.S. bk. 9, L.ed. 522].

None of the cases cited by the plaintiff's counsel are in conflict with the views laid down; and we are unable to find any ground upon which McKesson can be held liable for the fraud and misconduct of his cotrustee, in reference to the securities which were unlawfully abstracted by the latter.

George G. Wilmerding being lawfully in possession of the securities, and having sole custody and charge of the same, and there being no ground for interference with his right to hold them, no reason exists why McKesson should be held liable for the wrongful acts of his cotrustee. McKesson was not chargeable with connivance or culpable negligence; and none of the decisions, as we have seen, sustain the rule that, under the facts presented, he should be held to the most strict and rigid accountability.

The amount appropriated by George G. Wilmerding, consisting of $36,000, in government bonds, $4,000 in Erie railroad bonds, and some other securities, with interest on the same, was improperly allowed against McKesson, by the judge at special term.

In this respect the judgment was erroneous and should be corrected by the deduction of the several items mentioned.

The failure of the defendants to make a separation of the securities, as contemplated by the will, did not induce or cause the spoliation of the estate by George G. Wilmerding; nor would it have been prevented if such separation had been made. There must be a conjunction of wrong and loss to sustain a liability upon any such ground; Croft v. Williams, 88 N. Y. 384; and as this does not appear, the appellant's claim cannot be upheld.

The Statute of Limitations was no defense to the plaintiff's claim.

The judge in his findings has allowed interest on losses computed from January 1, 1875, to January 1, 1880, with annual rests, at 6 per cent until January 1, 1879, and 5 per cent thereafter. We think that this is not a case where annual rests should be made, and, in view of the circumstances, there being no wrongful intention on the part of McKesson, we think that he should not be made liable for the full amount with legal interest. At most he should be charged only with interest at 5 per cent, and in this respect the judgment should be corrected.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the General Term should be reversed and the judgment of the Special Term modified in the particulars indicated.

Amendments may be drawn and served by the respective counsel in conformity with the suggestions in this opinion and the judgment settled, upon notice, by the judge. Neither party should have costs of appeal to the Supreme Court or to this court, as against the other.

insurance, the assured warrants the truth of the answers to questions in the application, compliance with such warranty is a condition of the validity of the contract; and any substantial deviation from the truth in such answers is material to the risk and constitutes a breach of the contract, rendering the policy void.

(Decided October 12, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of the Chango Circuit Court in favor of plaintiffs entered on a verdict in an action on a policy of life insurance. Reversed.

Memorandum of decision below, 35 Hun, 665. The action was brought to recover the amount of a policy on the life of the plaintiffs' testator, Walton Dwight.

In answer the defendant takes issue on the fact of death; avers that Dwight's answers to certain questions in the application were not true, to wit: that his occupation was "real estate and grain dealer;" that he had not had the disease of spitting of blood; that he was insured in two companies in which he was not in fact insured; that he had not applied for insurance which had not led to insurance; and that he falsely answered a question as to having been engaged in or connected with the sale of beer, wine or other intoxicating liquors.

The defendant further says in its answer that the insured committed suicide; that he was put to death by his own procurement; and that he entered into a conspiracy to get a large amount of insurance, to wit: $250,000 on his life and to be put to death, to defraud the defendant and other companies.

The cause was tried at Norwich, Chenango County, N. Y., in the months of November and December, 1883, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiffs.

At the close of the trial, which had occupied a month, the defendant moved for nonsuit on the grounds:

That Walton Dwight's answer that he was a real estate and grain dealer was untrue, constituting a breach of warranty.

That his answer that he was not and had not been engaged in or connected with the manufacture or sale of any beer, wine or other intoxicating liquor was untrue, and constituted a breach of warranty, avoiding the policy.

That his answers that he had not had the disease of spitting of blood, and that he was insured in two insurance companies, by him named, and that he had not applied for insurance to any company where the application had not led to an insurance were untrue and were a breach of warranty avoiding the policy.

The court denied the motion and in submitting the case to the jury, submitted special questions which, with the answers of the jury, were as follows:

Q. Was the occupation of Walton Dwight for the ten years preceding August 22, 1878, real estate and grain dealer, within the intent and meaning of the contract?

A. Yes.

Q. Was Walton Dwight engaged in the sale of any beer, wine or other intoxicating liquors at any time within five years prior to August 22, 1878, within the intent and meaning of the contract?

A. No.

Q. Was Walton Dwight connected with the sale of any beer, wine or other intoxicating liquors at any time within five years prior to August 22, 1878, within the intent and meaning of the contract?

A. No.

Q. Had Walton Dwight at any time prior to August 22, 1878 had spitting of blood, resulting from disease of the lungs or other respiratory organs?

A. No.

Q. Was the ailment of Walton Dwight, at Williamsport in March, 1887, a mere temporary ailment, from which he recovered?

A. Yes.

Q. Was the policy of insurance on the life of Walton Dwight, in suit in this action, obtained by him with the preconceived design and intent to defraud the defendant?

A. No.

Q. Did Walton Dwight die by suicide?

A. No.

The jury then rendered a general verdict for the plaintiffs for the full amount of the policy.

The terms of the policy relating to the effect to be given to the application are as follows: "This policy is issued, and the same is accepted by the said assured, upon the following express conditions and agreements: that the same shall cease and be null, void and of no effect; and that this Company shall not be liable for the payment of the sum assured, or any part thereof, but that all premiums previously paid shall be absolutely property of the Company, without any account whatever to be rendered therefore; * * * 1. If the representations made in the application for this policy, upon the faith of which this contract is made, shall be found in any respect untrue."

The application contained the following: "It is hereby declared that the above are fair and true answers to the forgoing questions, and it is acknowledged and agreed by the undersigned (the applicant, Walton Dwight), that the above statements shall form the basis of the contract for insurance, and also that any untrue or fraudulent answers, any suppression of facts in regard to the party's health, or neglect to pay the premium on, or before the day it becomes due, will render the policy null and void, and forfeit all payments made thereon."

The evidence bearing upon the questions discussed in the opinion is set out therein.

Messrs. Joseph Larocque and William M. Evarts, for appellant:

I. The policy with the application therefore together constituted the contract of insurance between Walton Dwight and the defendant.

May, Ins. § 158.

By the contract of insurance the validity of the policy is made to depend upon the truth of the statements and representations contained in the application and the materiality of each and every answer made by Dwight to the questions contained in the application was agreed to by the parties.

May, Ins. § 158.

The effect of a breach of warranty is to annul the policy, without regard to materiality of the warranty or whether the breach had anything to do in producing the loss.

II. The answer given by Dwight, to the question as to whether he had been engaged in or connected with the manufacture or sale of any beer, wine or other intoxicating liquors, was untrue and it avoided the policy, and it was error to submit the question to the jury.

It involved only the construction of a written contract. It is the peculiar province of a court to construe written instruments and to declare their legal effect; and the submission of such questions to the jury is error.

III. In the case of Schuyllkill etc. Improvement Co. v. Munson, 14 Wall. 442 (81 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 867), the court says: "Nor are judges any longer required to submit a question to the jury merely because some evidence has been introduced by the party having the burden of proof, unless the evidence be of such a character that it would warrant the jury in finding a verdict in favor of that party. * * * Formerly it was held that if there was what is called a scintilla of evidence in support of a case, the judge was bound to leave it to the jury; but recent decisions of high authority have established a more reasonable rule: that in every case before the evidence is left to the jury, there is a preliminary question for the judge, not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury can properly proceed to find a verdict for the party producing it upon whom the onus of proof is imposed." P. 449 (L. ed. 872).

Mr. Isaac S. Newton, with Mr. G. L. Sessions, for respondents:

It is not clear that the intent of the parties to the contract of insurance was to make the exact truth of Dwight's statements a condition precedent to its validity. Such intent is necessary before plaintiffs can be held to the rule of a rigid warranty.

Moulou v. Am. Life Ins. Co. 111 U. S. 335 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 447).

Many of the questions asked in the application show that the defendant did not expect an application to warrant Dwight's answers to be exactly true, but only substantially so. It is unreasonable to suppose that the Company could expect an applicant forty years old to strictly warrant that he had never had any disease of the heart or any other important organ. A warranty to that extent was not within the contemplation of the parties.

The question: "Can you communicate any material fact in regard to the health of the party whose life is to be assured, or to the insurance contract, which has been omitted in the above questions?" shows that the "above questions" are aimed at material facts only.

Peasley v. Ins. Co. 15 Hun, 227.

The answers are "declared" not "warranted," to be fair and true in the "declaration" signed by the applicant, and are also referred to as "statements" therein. The courts lean in favor of the construction which makes a declaration or statement a representation rather than a warranty.

Defendant has not proven that Dwight's answer to the question in the application, as to his occupation, was untrue. Defendant had the affirmative and was bound to show its falsity before plaintiffs were required to prove anything.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the close of the evidence on the trial the defendant moved for a dismissal of the complaint, upon the ground among others that the uncontradicted evidence showed that the answers made by the assured to certain questions in the application for insurance were false and untrue and constituted a breach of warranty which avoided the contract.

The trial court denied the motion and the defendant excepted. A further motion was thereupon made for the direction of a verdict in favor of the defendant, upon the same grounds, which were also denied by the court and an exception was taken thereto.

The main question in the case, which we shall discuss, arose over the validity of these exceptions.

It was assumed both by the trial court and by the general term that by the terms of the policy the assured warranted the truth of the several answers referred to, and that therefore compliance with such warranty was a condition of the validity of the contract of insurance. This determination of the courts below was properly acquiesced in by the counsel for the respondents upon the argument before us, as it could not have been successfully questioned.

It must therefore be assumed in the further consideration of this case that any substantial deviation from the truth in the answers so given was material to the risk and constituted a breach of the terms of the contract, rendering the policy based upon such answers void. Armour v. Transatlantic F. Ins. Co. 90 N. Y. 450.

Parties to an insurance contract have the right to insert such lawful stipulations and conditions therein as they may mutually agree upon or which they may consider necessary and proper to protect their interests, and which when made must be construed and enforced like all other contracts according to the expressed understanding and intent of the parties making them.

If an insurance policy in plain and unambiguous language makes the observance of an apparently immaterial requirement the condition of a valid contract, neither courts nor juries have the right to disregard it or to construct, by implication or otherwise, a new contract in the place of that deliberately made by the parties. Appleby v. Astor F. Ins. Co. 54 N. Y. 253; Footo v. Aitna Life Ins. Co. 61 N. Y. 591; Graham v. Firemans Ins. Co. 87 N. Y. 69; Armour v. Transatlantic F. Ins. Co. supra.

Such contracts are open to construction, like all other contracts needing interpretation, but are subject to it only when upon the face of the instrument it appears that its meaning is doubtful or its language ambiguous or uncertain. May, Ins. 172.

An elementary writer says: "Indeed, the very idea and purpose of construction imply a previous uncertainty as to the meaning of a contract, for where this is clear and unambiguous there is no room for construction and nothing for construction to do." 2 Pars. Cont. 500.

The same author says "That courts cannot adopt a construction of any legal instrument which shall do violence to the rules of language or the rules of law;" and quotes the language of Lord Chief Baron Eyre, in Gibson v. Minet, 1 H. Bl. 569, that "All latitude of construction must submit to this restriction, namely: that the words may have the sense which by construction is put upon them." Id. 494.

In Parkhurst v. Smith, Willes, 332, Willes, J., says: "I admit that though the intent of the parties be never so clear it cannot take place contrary to the rules of law, nor can we put words in a deed which are not there, nor put a construction on the words of a deed directly contrary to the plain sense of them."

Addison on Contracts, p. 165, lays down the rule that "The judgment of the court in expounding a deed must be simply declaratory of what is in the deed. It has to ascertain, not what the party intended, as contradistinguished from what the words express, but what is the meaning of the words he has used;" and "When the words of any written instrument are free from any ambiguity in themselves, and where external circumstances do not create any doubt or difficulty as to the proper application of those words to claimants under the instrument, or to the subject matter to which the instrument relates, such instrument is always to be construed according to the strict, plain and common meaning of the words themselves; and evidence dehors the instrument for the purpose of explaining it according to the surmised or alleged intention of the parties, is utterly inadmissible." Shore v. Wilson, 9 Clark & F. 565.

In considering the language of an insurance contract, the words of a promise are to be regarded as those of the promisor, while those of a representation upon which the promise is founded are the words of the promisee and are to be taken most strongly against the party using them. May, Ins. § 175.

In view of the fact that these principles have been plainly disregarded by the courts below, we have thought it proper to refer more extensively to elementary authors than would otherwise have been deemed necessary. Their application will be seen by an examination of the situation of the case at the time the objectionable rulings were made.

Among the facts which the defendant deemed it important to know before entering into a contract of insurance with the deceased was his previous business and occupation. The materiality of truthful information in relation thereto was impressed upon the applicant by specific inquiries, and the requirement that truthful answers thereto should be made the condition of a valid contract.

With the view of eliciting the information desired, a series of questions was proposed to the deceased, embracing not only an inquiry as to his general business and occupation, but special inquiries as to certain particular trades and employments. Among those which we deem it important to refer to in this case were the following:

"A. For the party whose life is proposed to be assured, state the business carefully specified." Ans. "Real estate and grain dealer."

"B. Is this business his own or does he work for other persons and in what capacity?" Ans. "His own."

"C. In what occupation has he been engaged during the last ten years?" Ans. "Real estate and grain dealer."

"D. Is he now, or has he been engaged in or connected with the manufacture or sale of any beer, wine or other intoxicating liquors?" Ans. "No."

An application dated August 28, 1878, containing the questions and answers stated was signed by Walton Dwight in his character of an applicant for insurance, and also in that of the assured, and was delivered by him to the defendant.

In pursuance of the request contained therein the defendant on August 28, 1878, delivered to the applicant the policy in suit containing, among others, these provisions: "This policy is issued and the same is accepted by the said assured upon the following express conditions and agreements: that the same shall cease and be null and void and of no effect * * * if the representations made in the application for this policy, upon the faith of which this contract is made, shall be found in any respect untrue."

Dwight died November 15, 1878, immediately before the payment of a second quarterly premium became due; and this action was commenced in April, 1879, about seven months after the delivery of the policy.

Upon the trial it appeared that Dwight was engaged in the business of keeping hotel at Binghamton, from May, 1874, until March, 1877, and that during that period he regularly and systematically sold wines and liquors, in bottles of various sizes, bearing the name of his hotel blown in the glass, to such of his guests as desired them. He kept a wine or liquor room in which was stored a large supply of wines and liquors; and each year while so engaged he applied, paid for and received, from the representatives of both the State and National Governments, licenses and permits authorizing him to carry on the business of selling beer, wine and liquors at retail, to be drank upon his premises. It also appeared that he kept no bar and did not sell to persons who were not his guests.

These facts were undisputed. Their absolute truth was assumed by the trial judge in charging the jury, and by the general term in passing upon the appeal to that court. That the answer given by Dwight to the questions (relating to the sale of liquor) was incorrect was admitted by both tribunals. That Dwight did not misconceive the meaning and intent of the question conclusively appeared from repeated answers made by him to other companies within three weeks prior to this time to similar questions in applications for other insurance in which he stated that he had kept a hotel for three years in which liquor was sold in packages.

Upon denying the motion for a nonsuit the trial court refused to pass upon the question as to whether the facts constituted a breach of warranty or not, but left it to the jury to say whether the sales of liquor proved to have been made were sales at all, within the intent and meaning of the contract. In this we think that the court erred, no question arising upon the evidence which authorized its reference to the jury. If there was any room for doubt in respect to the true meaning and intent of the inquiry answered by the deceased, it presented a question of law for the court to determine, and not one for the jury. Lomer v. Meeker, 25 N. Y. 361; Glacius v. Black, 67 N. Y. 563. But we are of the opinion that no such doubt existed in the case.

The contract was in writing subscribed by the parties; and they expressed their agreement in clear, unambiguous and intelligible language. Its import and meaning was not obscured by any reference to the situation and circumstances surrounding the transaction, or by the consideration of other parts of the same instrument. On the contrary an examination of the context and associated questions make more certain and definite its object and intent. The assured had been previously interrogated as to his general business and employment and, it is to be assumed, had given such answers in respect thereto as satisfied the object of the inquirer.

He was then specially requested to state whether he was then or had been engaged in or connected with the manufacture or sale of any beer, wine or other intoxicating liquors. The information called for was made material, not only by the express agreement of the parties, but also by the object for which it was required, plainly apparent from the nature of the transaction.

The question called for no opinion and was capable of a precise, definite and categorical answer. It was intentionally framed in broad and comprehensive terms, apparently to avoid any evasion of its object, but was nevertheless expressed in clear and unambiguous language. If an intention to inquire concerning the conduct of the regular or principal business of the assured could be implied from the use of the word "engaged," an idea that such was the only meaning of the question was negated by the further words "or connected with the manufacture or sale of any beer," etc., which pointed unmistakably to every transaction of the kind described, however limited its character or remote his connection with it might have been.

The motive prompting the question was reasonable, natural and proper, and apparent even to the most careless reader. The inquiry could not have referred to the general business employment of the insured, because inquiries on that subject had previously been exhausted and the question had no office to perform in that respect. It carried upon its face the object which the insurer had in making it, and required an answer as to whether the applicant was or had been engaged in or connected with the manufacture or sale of liquors, etc., not in a limited or restricted capacity or employment but in any and every way in which such acts could have been performed.

The question itself assumes that persons engaged in or connected with the manufacture or sale of liquors, in any manner, were more hazardous subjects for insurance than those occupied in more reputable employments, and that the insurer would regard such employment as an objection to the proposed contract.

The extent to which the employment affected the character of the applicant, or his value as a risk, was a question solely for the insurer. The defendant had a right to a full and frank disclosure of any and all facts bearing upon the subject, and this confessedly it did not obtain. It was misinformed as to the precise fact which had been agreed upon as a fact material for it to know in determining the propriety of entering into the proposed contract and by the party who had assented to the proposition that such information should invalidate any contract made.

If the fair import of the language used indicates that the interrogator intended to include within its scope and meaning single transactions or incidental occupations, neither courts nor juries have authority to say that such transactions may properly be disregarded in the answer made. The defendant must be deemed to have meant what it said; and its express language embraces all transactions, and its express contract has made every transaction of the kind referred to material to the risk.

The legal effect of this contract can be avoided only by making a new one for the parties, or denying any significance to language. We are unable to see any ground upon which the ruling of the trial court can be supported.

The case of Moulton v. Am. Life Ins. Co. 111 U. S. 335 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 447], has been cited as tending to support the ruling. The question there arose under an exception to so much of the charge of the trial judge as stated that if the answers to certain questions in the application then under consideration were untrue, the policy was void, whether the assured knew them to be so or not. The court held that a consideration of the language of the whole policy rendered it doubtful whether it was intended to warrant the absolute truth of the answers in question, without regard to the good faith of the assured in making them, and therefore held as a question of law that the instructions were erroneous and the exception well taken. This decision undoubtedly accords with the well settled doctrine on the subject, but is not an authority upon the question here presented. See Armour v. Transatlantic Fire Ins. Co. supra.

When the terms and language of a contract are ascertained, its meaning and intent present questions of law only; and it is the duty of the court and not of the jury to determine and declare what that is. Parsons, in his work on Contracts, Vol. 2, p. 492, says that the first rule in the construction of contracts is "That what a contract means is a question of law. It is the court, therefore, that determines the construction of a contract. If any one contract is properly construed justice is done to the parties directly interested therein. But the rectitude, consistency and uniformity of all construction enables all parties to do justice to themselves. For then all parties, before they enter into contracts or make or accept instruments, may know the force and effect of the words they employ, of the precautions they use and of the provisions which they make in their own behalf, or permit to be made by others. It is obvious that this consistency and uniformity of construction can exist only so far as construction is governed by fixed principles, or in other words is matter of law, and here arises the very first rule." This principle has been repeatedly approved and uniformly acted upon in the decisions of this court; Groat v. Gile, 51 N. Y. 431; St. Luke's Home v. Association et al. 52 N. Y. 191; Glacius v. Black, 67 N. Y. 563; Arctic F. Ins. Co. v. Austin, 69 N. Y. 470; and it is the uniform doctrine of the cases and text books. Levy v. Gadeby, 3 Cranch, 180 [7 U. S. bk. 2, L. ed. 404]; Short v. Woodward, 18 Gray, 86; Smalley v. Hendrickson, 29 N. J. L. 371; Dennison's Exrs. v. Wertz, 7 Serg. & R. 373; Welsh v. Duar, 8 Binn. 329; Add. Cont. 165, et seq.

It would seem, from the authorities hereinbefore referred to, that no questions affecting the interpretation of contracts can properly be submitted to a jury, except those arising upon conflicting evidence as to the terms of the agreement, or when extrinsic evidence raises some doubt over the identity of the subject matter, or of the claimants thereunder. Add. Cont. p. 165.

Instead of following the plain rule laid down in the authorities cited, the trial court assumed the existence of an ambiguity and referred the legal questions involved in the construction of the contract to the jury for their speculations. The logical effect of such a disposition was the holding that contracts expressed in the same language and executed under the same circumstances might legally be held valid in one locality and invalid in another according to the capricious and often conflicting opinions of juries.

The theory upon which the trial court submitted the case to the jury is implied from the circumstances pointed out in the charge for its consideration. Its attention was directed to the fact that Dwight kept no bar and did not sell liquor to people generally, but only to his guests and as an incident to the business of keeping a hotel; and from these facts it was impliedly advised that it was authorized to find upon this question for the plaintiffs. In other words, the jury was instructed that because the assured had not been engaged in or connected with the manufacture or sale of liquor, etc., in a particular way, he could truthfully represent that he had not been connected with it in any way; and if he did not sell to everybody, without limitation or exception, that he was justified in replying to the question that he did not sell to anyone. The fallacy of such a charge is too plain for argument.

The defendant was further prejudiced before the jury by the reference in the charge to the claim made by the plaintiffs: that the question was incapable of a truthful affirmative or negative answer, for it was said if Dwight had answered it affirmatively it would have been an admission of his connection with the manufacture of liquor, which concededly was not true; and it was implied therefrom that his only safe answer was a negative one.

This circumstance was pointed out to the jury as having a bearing upon the question, and it was impliedly authorized to find that the question was equivocal because not capable of a direct and positive answer. The reference was obviously misleading and erroneous, for the interrogatory being in the alternative could truthfully have been answered in the negative only in case the assured had been engaged in neither of the occupations referred to, and would have been answered truthfully in the affirmative if he had been connected with either.

This error was further aggravated by the refusal of the court, upon request, to charge that the question could be truthfully answered in the affirmative if he had been connected with the sale of liquor. This refusal was clearly erroneous, and the exception taken there-to was well taken.

We are, for the reasons stated, of the opinion that this branch of the case presented no question for the jury, and the court erred in denying the motion for a nonsuit. Lomer v. Meeker, 25 N. Y. 361; Appleby v. Astor Fire Ins. Co. supra; Glacius v. Black, supra.

We are also of the opinion that the answers of the assured, to the questions relating to his business and occupation, were evasive and untrue and upon the whole evidence required the dismissal of the complaint. There was not only an absence of satisfactory evidence in the case that he had ever been engaged in the business of a real estate or grain dealer for himself, in the ordinary acceptance of those terms, but such an acceptance was negated by his repeated sworn declarations to the contrary and the proof of circumstances of the most convincing character. The evidence upon these questions is substantially all to the same effect, and presents a case so preponderating in character that a verdict against it could not be allowed to stand.

The case, therefore, presented a question of law as to whether the business engaged in by the deceased constituted him a dealer in real estate and grain, within the ordinary meaning of those terms.

Undoubtedly the onus of showing the falsity of the representations made by Dwight, in respect to his business and occupation, rested affirmatively upon the defendant; but when it had produced his sworn declarations, made but a few months previous to the representations expressly negating their truth, and the story of his life had been testified to, showing his constant employment in other occupations, it had overcome the presumption of truth existing in favor of the representations, and made a case calling for affirmative evidence to overthrow it.

The plaintiffs, although surrounded during the trial with relatives and friends of Dwight, who were acquainted with his history and appeared as witnesses and detailed his former occupation and employment, gave no such evidence. There is not a scintilla of direct evidence that Dwight had ever been in business as a grain dealer; and the circumstances of his life as disclosed by the proof show that he could not have been so employed. He had never resided at Chicago, the alleged theater of his dealings in grain, and had never been there, except for a short period in the spring and summer of 1878, during which he was a bankrupt, hopelessly in debt and precluded much of the time, by sickness, from engaging in any business.

The plaintiffs did not produce the slightest proofs of any such occupation, and the only evidence referring to it was Dwight's statement, made in a gasconading manner, to one of the defendant's witnesses in June, 1878, and incidentally appearing in evidence in which he said "that he had been to Chicago and just returned; that he went there to make some money and went into partnership with a couple of brothers who had money but no experience, and he had experience but no money, and he wanted to operate in grain. In two transactions he cleared $30,000, and was taken sick and his partners thought he made money so easy they could do the same; and while he was sick they in their operations lost the $30,000 he had made, so that left him without a dollar."

This declaration was obviously not made to inform anyone as to his business but apparently with the object of exalting his own sagacity and shrewdness; and if it could be considered any evidence of his calling it was of the most inconclusive character, and showed that the business, whatever it was, had been abandoned in June, 1878, and never after resumed. It falls far short of being sufficient to authorize the finding of a jury that he was a grain dealer, or that he was on the 22d of August, 1878, and for ten years previous thereto had been such dealer.

There is no evidence that during the ten years previous to the application Dwight owned, bought, sold or dealt in real estate. It did appear that at some period of his life he had owned scattered parcels of wild land in three or four different States; but previous to the ten years referred to in the inquiry, he had caused this property, so far as it had any appreciable value, to be conveyed to his wife; and it was thereafter owned by her and generally employed as security for borrowing money upon, probably for the purposes of its improvement.

The evidence given to establish the falsity of the representations in question consisted largely of the sworn statements of Dwight, made between December, 1877, and March, 1878, in bankruptcy proceedings, in which he testified, among other things: "I think I opened the Dwight House in May, 1874. I furnished part of it then and ran it partly as a hotel, and rented part of it in the spring of 1875." "The only business I had was the Dwight House business and livery. The other business was my wife's business, although I had always kept it as my own account." "I kept no open bar; liquors were sold in packages. I should think I had some $2,000 or $3,000 worth of those when I opened the house; the stock was larger then than at any time afterwards; that included liquors I took out of my private house some $600 or $700 worth of liquors that were not invoiced. I kept wines, liquors and cigars all through my business." "I say the Dwight House was the only business I had as a regular business."

Q. When did the Dwight House open?

A. It opened in 1874; the 26th of May, I think.

Q. And closed when?

A. It closed the 8th day of March, 1877.

Q. I understand you made your settlement on your wife about when?

A. It was done in the latter part of June or July, 1868.

Q. From that time down to the time of the commencement of the Dwight House business, had you any business of your own?

A. I had not; not further than my lawsuits, general living and the like of that. I had no business of my own.

In addition to this explicit evidence of the untruthfulness of his representations, it appears from an examination of the application made by him for insurance during the month of August, 1878, that his representations as to his business and occupation were quite contradictory and misleading.

On July 31, 1878, in his first application, he describes himself as a general dealer in grain and produce, and his place of business as being mostly in Chicago. In subsequent applications he quite uniformly describes himself as a real estate and grain dealer, but occasionally varies the description by statements that "it was formerly real estate." "Real estate and grain dealer always." "Formerly same, speculator, army, hotel keeper." "Formerly same as now." "Real estate and grain dealer always." "Real estate and grain dealer always; no change in occupation or employment." "Always been dealer in real estate and grain."

It is quite impossible to reconcile these various statements with each other or with the established facts of the case.

The history of his life, as related by himself, shows that from 1868 to 1878 the only business or occupation pursued by him in his own name was that of a hotel keeper. All allusion to this business is suppressed in the application in question. From 1868 to 1874 he was engaged in building upon and improving about thirteen acres of land in Binghamton; and if this afforded any justification for his description of business as a real estate dealer the conceded ownership of such property by his wife rendered the declaration that such business was "his own" untrue.

The trial court, in charging the jury, stated that Dwight's sworn declarations as to his business and occupation did not constitute an estoppel against the plaintiffs, as to the truth of such statements. This may be admitted to be correct, without invalidating their force as evidence of the facts stated. They did constitute evidence of such facts, and in the absence of countervailing evidence became conclusive upon Dwight's representatives as to such facts.

It is quite clear that these answers gave no information as to the actual employment and business of Dwight to the defendant, and would have been quite as correct and satisfactory if he had represented himself to be a geologist or professor of elocution.

We think it was clearly the duty of the trial court, upon this evidence, to have directed a verdict for the defendant.

It is claimed by the plaintiffs that if there is a scintilla of evidence in support of a proposition, or if the evidence against it does not amount to a demonstration of its incorrectness, a question is raised which must be left to the jury.

We do not so understand the rule. If the proof of a fact is so preponderating that a verdict against it would be set aside by the court, as contrary to the evidence, then it is the duty of the court to direct a verdict. People v. Cook, 8 N. Y. 67; Wilds v. Hudson River R. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 433; Appleby v. Astor Ins. Co. supra; Kelsey v. Northern Light Oil Co. 45 N. Y. 509; Caggar v. Lansing, 64 N. Y. 427; Neuendorff v. World Mut. L. Ins. Co. 69 N. Y. 392.

It was said in Baulee v. N. Y. & Harlem R. R. Co. 69 N. Y. 366, by Judge Allen, that "It is not enough to authorize the submission of a question as one of fact to the jury that there is 'some evidence.' A scintilla of evidence or a mere surmise that there may have been negligence on the part of the defendant would not justify the judge in leaving the case to the jury," quoting from Williams, J., in Toomey v. London B. & S. C. R. Co. 3 C. B. N. S. 146. See Culhane v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. Co. 60 N. Y. 136; McKeever v. N. Y. Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 88 N. Y. 667.

In Hyatt v. Johnson, 91 Pa. 300, Justice Sterrett says: "Since the scintilla doctrine has been exploded, both in England and in this country, the preliminary question of law for the court is, not whether there is literally no evidence, or a mere scintilla but whether there is any that ought reasonably to satisfy the jury that the fact sought to be proved is established;" citing Ryder v. Wombwell, L. R. 4 Exch. 39.

The rule held by the Supreme Court of the United States is expressed by Mr. Justice Clifford in Schuykill etc. Improvement Co. v. Munson, 14 Wall. 442 [81 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 867], as follows: "Nor are judges any longer required to submit a question to a jury, merely because some evidence has been introduced by the party having the burden of proof, unless the evidence be of such a character that it would warrant the jury in finding a verdict in favor of that party. Formerly it was held that if there was what was called a scintilla of evidence in support of a case, the judge was bound to leave it to the jury; but recent decisions of high authority have established a more reasonable rule: that in every case, before the evidence is left to the jury, there is a preliminary question for the judge, not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury can properly proceed to find a verdict for the party producing it, upon whom the onus of proof rests."

To the same effect are Pleasants v. Fant, 22 Wall. 120 [89 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 782]; Comrs. of Marion Co. v. Clark, 94 U. S. 284 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 61]; Griggs v. Houston, 104 U. S. 553 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 840]; Bailey v. Cleveland Rolling Mill, 21 Fed. Rep. 159; Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. C. 451.

We think this a case where the conclusive character of the proof required the application of the rule, and that the court should have intervened to prevent a verdict upon evidence so insufficient to support it.

Many other questions arose under the various defenses presented upon the trial which would, if it were necessary to the decision of this appeal, be instructive and interesting to examine and discuss; but in the view we have taken it would be a work of supererogation to do so.

The questions arising over the defense that the whole scheme of insurance conceived and carried into effect by Dwight originated in a design to cheat and defraud the insurers, and the further allegation that Dwight's answer to the question, whether he ever had the disease of spitting blood, are among the most prominent of those presented upon the argument.

The circumstances of the case are quite extraordinary and unnatural and might well give rise to various and conflicting theories and conjectures, in the effort to account for its strange and abnormal features; but in view of the fact that a new trial must be ordered upon other grounds, it would serve no useful purpose to attempt to determine the questions raised thereby.

The judgments of the courts below are therefore reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

All concur except Danforth, J., dissenting, Miller, J., not voting, and Finch, J., taking no part.

Alfred N. BEADLESTON, Appt.,

v.

Mary E. BEADLESTON, Respt.

Held, on the facts, in an action of divorce where, before trial, an allowance had been ordered and paid to the wife for the expenses of her defense, that a further allowance, after the referee had reported against her and the plaintiff had moved for judgment, to pay expenses incurred in the past conduct of her defense, should have been refused.

(Decided October 29, 1886.)

APPPEAL from an order of the Supreme Court at General Term in the First Department, modifying and affirming as modified an order of the New York Special Term, made in an action for absolute divorce, granting defendant an additional allowance for expenses of the action. Reversed.

Memorandum of decision below, 39, Hun, 658.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel Untermyer, for appellant:

There was no power in the court below to make the order appealed from, after the case had been decided adversely to the defendant; and the order is therefore appealable.

Collins v. Collins, 71 N. Y. 275.

Section 1769 of the Code of Civil Procedure only authorized an order directing the payment of money "necessary to enable the wife to carry on or defend the action." Her defense to the action had been completed and a decision rendered against her before the order appealed from was made.

The report of the referee was a final determination of the action, since his findings could not be reviewed by the special term.

Schroeter v. Schroeter, 28 Hun, 280; Ross v. Ross, 81 Hun, 141; Goodrich v. Goodrich, 21 Week. Dig. 264.

"Where the facts appearing upon an application for alimony pendente lite in an action for divorce are such that, on general principles of equity, the wife is not entitled to demand the same, the question of the granting thereof is one of law reviewable in this court."

Collins v. Collins, supra.

Mr. Eugene D. Hawkins, for respondent:

I. In actions for divorce the court may, in its discretion "during the pendency thereof, from time to time, make and modify an order or orders requiring the husband to pay any sum or sums of money necessary to enable the wife to carry on or defend the action, * * * having regard to the circumstances of the respective parties."

Code Civ. Proc. § 1769.

This power is constantly exercised.

Donnelly v. Donnelly, 68 How. Pr. 481; Lee lie v. Leslie, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. 811; McQueen v. McQueen, 61 How. Pr. 282; Winton v. Winton, 12 Abb. N. C. 159; Green v. Green, 8 Daly, 358.

II. At the time this additional allowance was made, no judgment whatever was entered. There was merely a report of the referee on file, to which exceptions had been filed, awaiting the action of the court. Until judgment thereon was rendered by the court, none existed and none whatever could be entered.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1229; Rule 77, Gen. Rules Pr.

The action of the court might be favorable to the report, or it might be adverse. The power to make orders for additional allowances is coextensive with the power to make orders for alimony. The power to make these two classes of orders is contained in the same section and sentence of the statute; and the decisions as to when there is such a final determination of the action as will stop alimony show the limit within which the court has power to make additional allowances for the counsel fee and expenses of the wife's defense.

"The rule as to payment of alimony is that the same is to be paid up to the entry of the final judgment, even if the decision of the trial should be adverse to the wife."

Moncrief v. Moncrief, 15 Abb. Pr. 188.

In Green v. Green, 8 Daly, 359, the court said: "The action is still pending and cannot be said to be finally determined, not only not until after the entry of the decree, but also not until the right to appeal therefrom has been lost by lapse of time or other cause." To the extent that the action is not finally determined until the entry of the decree, but is still pending, and an additional allowance for counsel fee may be granted, this case has not been overruled.

III. The stay upon the entry of the judgment in the order appealed from was entirely proper under the circumstances, and within the power of the court to grant.

Miannay v. Blogg, 41 N. Y. 521.

IV. The sole question for consideration on this appeal is whether in granting the order appealed from the court exceeded its power.

By section 190, subd. 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the court of appeals has no jurisdiction to review a discretionary order. Its jurisdiction to hear appeals from orders is limited to those which are not discretionary.

V. In De Llamosas v. Llamosas, 62 N. Y. 619, it was held that no testimony was needed to fix the amount of an allowance "that the court could determine, from its own experience and from the facts and circumstances of the case as they appeared to it from the pleadings and other papers and proceedings, what was a reasonable fee."

See also Green v. Green, 8 Daly, 359.

VI. The fact that the referee's report is against the defendant has no bearing whatever upon the propriety or the amount of the allowance to be ordered by the court to enable her to pay her counsel for the services and expenses of the defense. The counter charges are by statute a legitimate and proper part of her defense.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1758.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff commenced this action against the defendant for an absolute divorce, on the ground of her adultery. She recriminated in her answer, and denied the charges made against her. The cause being at issue was referred to a referee to hear and determine the same; and he, after hearing the evidence, made his report, wherein he finds the defendant guilty of the adultery charged, and the recriminating charges untrue, and he ordered judgment in plaintiff's favor.

Before the trial of the action the court, upon motion of the defendant, made her an allowance, besides alimony, of $1,000 for the payment of counsel fees and other expenses in making her defense. That allowance the plaintiff paid.

After the report of the referee, the plaintiff moved for judgment thereon, and the defendant moved for a further allowance to pay her expenses, including counsel fees incurred in the defense of the action, and all plaintiff's proceedings were stayed until her motion could be heard and determined.

In her moving papers the defendant did not claim that she needed any allowance to oppose plaintiff's motion for judgment; but her sole claim was that she needed it to pay expenses theretofore incurred, and for that purpose the court at special term granted an allowance of $3,500.

Upon appeal by the plaintiff to the general term, the order of the special term was modified by reducing the sum allowed to $2,500, and as thus modified it was affirmed. The allowance was not claimed at any time, nor granted, upon the ground that it was necessary to enable the defendant to carry on her defense to the action.

We think the allowance was unauthorized. The authority to make such an allowance during the pendency of the action rests entirely upon the statute (Code, § 1769), which provides that the court may, during the pendency of the action, "from time to time make and modify an order or orders, requiring the husband to pay any sum or sums of money necessary to enable the wife to carry on or defend the action."

The purpose of the statute is to furnish the wife means to carry on her action or to defend the same during the pendency thereof. The allowance looks to the future. There can be no necessity for an allowance to make a defense which has already been made, or solely to pay expenses already incurred.

There is ample power in the court to make allowances from time to time to enable a wife to carry on her defense, and when she needs money for that purpose she must apply for it. But if she has succeeded in making her defense from her own means, or upon her own credit, she cannot before judgment, while the action is pending, have an order compelling her husband to pay such expenses; and there is no statutory authority in the court to make such an order and thus to compel him to pay her debts.

We confine our decision to the precise facts of this case as they appear in the record. We have no doubt that an allowance to a wife, during the pendency of the action for some past expense, might be authorized if it were shown that its payment was necessary to enable her to further carry on the action, or her defense thereto.

The orders of the Special and General Terms should be reversed and motion denied.

All concur except Ruger, Ch. J., and Danforth, J., dissenting.

v.

NEW YORK ELEVATED R. R. CO.

An appeal lies directly to the court of appeals from a judgment entered on a verdict after a decision by the general term reversing an order granting a new trial, and from the order of reversal.

(Decided October 12, 1886.)

MOTION by plaintiff to dismiss defendant's appeal. Denied.

Action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant.

Reported below 24 N. Y. Week. Dig. 431.

Upon the trial at the New York Circuit, at the close of plaintiff's case defendant moved to dismiss. The motion was denied and defendant excepted and, relying upon its exception, offered no evidence. The case went to the jury, who found a verdict for plaintiff. Thereupon defendant moved the trial judge to set aside the verdict as contrary to the evidence, etc., which motion was granted and a new trial ordered.

On appeal by plaintiff the general term reversed the order granting a new trial. No judgment had up to that time been entered. The opinion of the general term, and the order of reversal entered in accordance therewith, did not in terms direct entry of judgment on the verdict, but, probably through inadvertence as to the state of the record, stated that the judgment was affirmed. After the verdict was restored by the decision of the general term, plaintiff entered judgment thereon. From this judgment and from the order of reversal the defendant appealed to the court of appeals, and the plaintiff moved to dismiss the appeal.

Mr. Jacob A. Gross, with Mr. David Levy, for the motion:

The attempted appeal from the order is not authorized by subdivision 2 of section 190 Code Civ. Proc.

See Dodge v. Mann, 85 N. Y. 643.

The judgment in question has not been reviewed by the general term and hence no appeal from it lies to this court.

Code Civ. Proc. § 190; Dodge v. Mann, 85 N. Y. 643; White v. Del. etc. R. R. Co. 41 N. Y. 520; New York, etc. R. R. Co. v. Schyler, 34 N. Y. 81.

The direction of the general term order that the judgment be affirmed is mere surplusage, the appeal pending before that tribunal being from the order setting aside the verdict; and as no judgment had been entered thereon, there was none in this respect to be affirmed.

Motion to dismiss appeal from the judgment and order is put upon the sole ground that this court has not jurisdiction. The contrary is well settled. 39 N. Y. 869; Beecher v. Conradt, 11 How. Pr. 181.

1. To constitute manslaughter there must have been no design to kill. If such design be present, the offense is murder in one of its degrees.
2. For the existence of the deliberation required to constitute the statutory crime of murder in the first degree the time need not be long and may be short. If it furnishes room and opportunity for reflection, and the facts show that such reflection existed, and the mind was busy with its design and made the choice with full chance to choose otherwise, the condition of the statute is fulfilled.
3. In a case of homicide, held, that the facts disclosed the existence of a design to kill and of premeditation and deliberation sufficient to warrant a conviction of murder in the first degree.

(Decided October 26, 1886.)

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Third Department, affirming a judgment of the Columbia Oyer and Terminer on conviction of defendant of murder in the first degree. Affirmed.

Memorandum of decision below, 40 Hun, 638

The general facts of the case were as follows:

The deceased Simon A. Vandercook approached and entered the defendant's cabin where, in a struggle with the defendant or otherwise, he was stabbed by defendant with a knife, which wound, either of itself or with other injuries inflicted upon him by the defendant with an ax, caused his death. The defendant at once proceeded to mutilate the body in a revolting and inhuman manner, actually destroying some portions of it by burning. He immediately and before the homicide was known, fled and remained absent for about three years, when he was discovered in Canada bearing a fictitious name, and from whence he was brought back to answer the charge laid against him in the indictment. Articles identified as having belonged to the deceased were found in his possession. It was also proved that he entertained unfriendly feelings toward the latter, with whom he had unsatisfactory business relations in reference to a mine in which both were interested, and the prisoner claimed that Vandercook attempted to poison him a few days previous to the date of the killing.

It was proved that the prisoner had expressed a desire that some one would put the deceased out of the way, and that it would be to the pecuniary advantage of one to do so.

The physician who examined Vandercook's remains testified that the wound inflicted with the knife was in his opinion inflicted before death occurred, inducing a possible inference that the immediate cause of death was because of the injuries inflicted with the ax. He also testified that such wound would not necessarily cause immediate death, although if not given attention it would eventually prove fatal.

As bearing upon the question whether there was a struggle between the parties, as was asserted by the defendant, the physician stated that the wound with the knife was apparently made by one coming up behind, although it might have been inflicted by one in front reaching over.

The defendant gave exculpatory evidence in his own behalf, to the effect, as claimed by him, that he acted simply and solely in self defense. He testified that Vandercook came into his cabin unbidden and against his will, by actually breaking the door fastenings; that he ordered Vandercook out, saying he was afraid he would poison him again; that Vandercook expressed regret that the poison failed of its purpose; that the prisoner applied to Vandercook an opprobrious epithet, to which the latter replied, and that an altercation immediately ensued accompanied by a blow from the deceased, followed at once by a scuffle and struggle between them; that Vandercook seized a stick of wood, and there was a further struggle for its possession; that Vandercook was getting the advantage, pushed him against the wall, and seized him by the throat, whereupon he (defendant) reached out, took a butcher knife from a shelf, passed it to his other hand and used it; that this caused Vandercook to stagger a little; he added:

"We then had a kind of scuffle, then a little and I was a little the best for him about that time; got him down and choked him awhile, * * * I guess he did not get up very far; I don't think he did; I don't think he ever did get up very far; I hung onto him and choked him some time; I finally found that he was about past recall; I let him go; I was afraid I had killed him."

His cross examination on this matter was as follows: Q. It is not true that Mr. Vandercook started for the door and you struck him on the head with an ax? A. No sir; not then. Q. When was it? A. When he fell I jammed him over near the door perhaps two feet; I don't know how far from the door; about that time I used the ax. Q. Where did you use it on him? A. On his skull; blood flew up against the door.

Q. Was not he in such condition, after the stab with the knife, that you could have handled him without this blow from the ax? A. I don't know whether it was so or not. Q. Did not stop to find out? A. No sir. Q. You could have handled him without crushing in his skull with an ax after that blow with a knife? A. I don't know. Q. You did not care? A. I did not care much about it, one way or the other; I considered I had a right.

The question presented, together with other portions of the evidence, are stated in the opinion.

Mr. L. F. Longley, for appellant:

Where, as in this case, there is evidence of an altercation and attack by the deceased upon the defendant, previous expressions of ill will on the part of the defendant, even if amounting to threats, will not alone furnish evidence that the homicide was committed in pursuance of a deliberate purpose. There must be some act of defendant indicating his purpose preceding the killing.

People v. Hovey, 29 Hun, 882; Sindram v. People, 88 N. Y. 196; People v. Majone, 91 N. Y. 211; People v. Cornetti, 92 N. Y. 85; Leighton v. People, 10 Abb. N. C. 261; 2 Stark. Ev. p. 948.

It was held in Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 164, that under the statute classifying homicide, mere proof that one has been deprived of life by the act of another fails utterly to show the class to which the homicide belongs.

The prisoner may, in certain instances, extenuate his crime and reduce it from murder to manslaughter, by proof that the act was committed during a transport of passion and resentment, excited by sudden provocation which for the time subdued his reason. What degree of provocation and under what circumstances, heat of blood, the furor brevis will or will not avail the defendant, is usually a question of law, arising upon the special facts of the case.

Roscoe, Cr. Ev. 964.

It is the nature of the provocation and not the mere effect of it on the mind of the prisoner, which the law regards; and the sufficiency of the provocation to extenuate the prisoner's guilt is a question of law. If one kill another immediately upon a grave and serious provocation, likely to excite great passion, the offense will amount to no more than manslaughter, although the defendant used a deadly weapon.

Id. 965.

"Where, after mutual combat, a question arises whether there has been time for excited passions to subside, the question always takes this form; whether there had been sufficient time to cool, and not whether, in point of fact, the defendant did remain in a state of anger."

People v. Sullivan, 7 N. Y. 400.

"The indulgence which is shown by the law in some cases to the first transport of passion, is a condescension to the frailty of the human frame, to the furor brevis, which, while the frenzy lasts, renders a man deaf to the voice of reason."

1 Russ. Crimes, p. 518, and cases cited.

"Death in the course of mutual combat, though in some cases it amounts to murder, is generally found to constitute manslaughter only."

186

Roscoe, Cr. Ev. 640.

There is no evidence of any time for passion to cool.

Id. 714; Leighton v. People, 88 N. Y. 117.

There is no legal evidence of the deliberate and premeditated design required (Penal Code, § 188) in the definition of murder in the first degree, and which is an element in the People's Case necessary to be established affirmatively.

If Vandercook was dead before the blow with the ax was struck, as may fairly be inferred from the defendant's testimony, when he swears that he choked the deceased until he was about past recall before striking him with the ax (on this point as on every other, he is entitled to the benefit of the doubt), this case is within section 205 of the Penal Code, defining justifiable homicide, for it will be remembered that the deceased had broken into his dwelling by violence, had refused to go out when ordered, and after striking defendant with his fist, seized a billet of wood and attacked him with that.

1 Russ. Crimes, p. 662; Roscoe, Cr. Ev. p. 710.

Mr. A. B. Gardenier, Dist. Atty., for the People:

The court plainly submitted to the jury the question whether the blow with the ax was necessary to the defense or protection of the life or person of the prisoner when it was administered, and they found that it was not necessary, by their verdict.

The rule is that if a fatal blow be struck in self defense, the homicide is not justifiable unless the prisoner first retreated as far as possible.

It was said by Judge Johnson in People v. Clark, 7 N. Y. 393: "If there be sufficient deliberation to form a design to take life, and to put that design into execution by destroying life, there is sufficient deliberation to constitute murder, no matter whether the design is formed at the instant of striking the fatal blow or whether it be contemplated for months."

In Leighton v. People, 88 N. Y. 117, Judge Danforth says: "If the killing is not the instant effect of impulse, if there is hesitation or doubt to overcome, a choice made as the result of thought, however short the struggle between the intentions and the act, it is sufficient to characterize the crime as deliberate and premeditated murder."

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

That the prisoner killed the deceased by the blow of an ax he himself has testified. While the jury were not bound to believe his account of the struggle and its origin, and might well have doubted it, as in many respects improbable and unreasonable, yet, if they gave it credence, it furnished, in connection with the other evidence, sufficient ground for the verdict which they rendered.

The argument before us was largely devoted to the point that the final blow was delivered at the close of a furious struggle and before sufficient time had elapsed for the prisoner's passions, engendered by the conflict, to subside and cool; and so the crime was manslaughter only. But that grade of homicide is marked by the important characteristic that there is no design to kill. If such purpose be present the offense is murder in one of its degrees. The evidence very clearly shows the existence of that design.

Granting all that the prisoner says of the struggle, yet it is apparent that while the blow of the knife might have been given in the heat of the affray, and without a purpose to kill, the blow of the ax admits of no such explanation. That was struck when the struggle had ended, and the victim lay paralyzed and unresisting. The knife had penetrated the lung, and weakened him perceptibly, and the prisoner had choked him until, to use his own expression, he was "about past recall," and then, with no danger remaining, his own personal safety assured, and abundant opportunity to escape from the cabin without injury, or hand the assailant over to justice, he nevertheless "let go" of his antagonist, rendered helpless and harmless, went after and obtained his ax, and with it ended the life not yet destroyed by the blow of the knife and the choking which followed.

The weapon was selected and the blow was struck with a palpable design to effect death. No other inference is reasonable. If we assume, what the evidence does not show, and the prisoner does not say or pretend, that the ax was near at hand and easily and swiftly grasped, and the knife had been dropped in the struggle, which also is wholly unproved, it is still true that the conflict was at an end and the prisoner himself says: "I let him go; I was afraid I had killed him."

That was a natural fear, and the presence of such an emotion, the shock of discovering that he had endangered the life of his adversary is quite inconsistent with the continuance of frenzy and rage. The passion of the fight was probably replaced by the fear of consequences naturally born of the condition of the deceased. Scarcely anything would cool the prisoner's anger more swiftly than the sight of the dying man on the floor and the consciousness of having perhaps killed him; for one strong emotion drives out another. That fear of consequences, he tells us, came into his mind and following it seems to have arisen an evident purpose to evade those consequences by making sure of the death of his enemy, and proceeding to mutilate and destroy the body, with a view to escape detection. And so the ax was wielded with a settled design to kill.

There was some degree, also, of premeditation and deliberation. The process of reasoning which the prisoner's own words suggest shows that he deliberated. He reflected enough to be conscious that his victim was in danger of death; enough to feel an emotion of fear for the consequences to himself; enough to decide that it was safer to finally kill him than run the risk of his recovery, or his death lingering and discovered; enough to select and choose the ax as the surest weapon, instead of the knife which he had already used; and then, having inflicted death, to proceed coolly to the logical end of his deliberation by burning so much of the body as could be identified, by taking from the pockets of the dead man whatever would reveal his name, by a thoughtful preparation for flight, by escape into Canada, and concealment under a false name. When he was asked why, when further violence was unnecessary for his own defense, he persisted in the work of killing his antagonist, he answered first that he did not know what he was about, but finally said: "I thought I had a right."

Ordinarily we are compelled to infer the intent from the nature and surroundings of the act, and these alone in this case would furnish a sufficient answer; but the prisoner himself reveals two of the thoughts that arose in his mind, and with their aid we can quite accurately ascertain the rest. As he looked upon the result of his action, there came a consciousness of what he had done, and with that consciousness a shock that would sober almost any rage. Then arose the fear that his victim might linger and die, and he himself be detected and punished. How to avoid that result was the natural sequence of his thoughts; and then came the other reflection of which he tells us, brutal and ignorant it may be, but with which he braced his nerves and hardened his courage for the final act: that he "had a right" to kill the man, who was not yet dead, and so avoid detection and punishment. Then followed the choice of a weapon. The knife which he had just used would naturally come first to his mind; but he either sees or remembers his ax and chooses that as the more effective weapon of the two, and possibly also because he had then in mind a mutilation of the body which would prevent identification. In all this there is very much more than impulse or an unreflecting blow. There is thought, choice and plan.

The rule as to deliberation and premeditation has been stated so often as to have become familiar. The time need not be long and may be short. If it furnishes room and opportunity for reflection, and the facts show that such reflection existed, and the mind was busy with its design and made the choice with full chance to choose otherwise, the condition of the statute is fulfilled. The jury were justified in their conclusion that there was a deliberate and premeditated design to kill, even though they credited the prisoner's account of the affray. But they may have disbelieved it entirely. Why should Vandercook, on finding the cabin door barred, proceed to force an entrance? What foundation was there for an accusation of poisoning? When Beckwith made that accusation Vandercook is represented as having admitted it, and as coolly expressing his regret that it failed of its purpose because Beckwith threw it off of his stomach. If there was any quarrel between these men it was about the mine; that was their sole cause of hostility; and yet neither mentions it at all, or broaches the subject by a word. On the contrary, Beckwith calls Vandercook by an opprobrious epithet as far away as possible from the subject of difference, and thereupon the latter, who had borne without emotion the charge of attempted murder, flames into a rage at being called a "whoremaster" and resorts to violence.

In relating what occurred, as a witness, the prisoner at first on his direct examination conceals the fact of a blow with the ax given after the close of the struggle, and confesses it only when pressed by the cross examination. After that blow he admits that he cut Vandercook's throat and pulled out his tongue. The atrocity of the act is here said to indicate frenzy; but the prisoner gives a different and very strange explanation, saying that it was "same as the masons do; that is the penalty they have to inflict on one another."

The answers that he made often had about them a tone of brutality, of cold unconcern; and the jury may very well have disbelieved his story of an affray and reached their conclusion with little trust in the prisoner's explanation. In that view of the case they had before them the quarrel about the ownership of the mine which had developed in the prisoner a considerable degree of hostility; his repeated threats to put his enemy out of the way, and his tempting another to murder, with the suggestion of the money to be gained from the man he hated; the opportunity offered by Vandercook's presence in the solitary cabin hidden in the ravine and little exposed to observation; the thrust of the knife indicating a blow struck from behind; the chopping of the body into fragments and burning whatever could be identified; the falsehood told to explain Vandercook's absence, and the final departure and flight; these facts taken together tend to the conclusion which the jury reached.

The grade of the crime was a question of fact for their determination acting under proper instructions as to the law. There is no complaint of those instructions, and the verdict rendered on the question of fact it would be our duty to respect, even if it bred in us a doubt—which we do not feel.

The request to discharge the juror, Neir, after he had been accepted and sworn was by the statute within the discretion of the trial judge. Code, Crim. Proc. § 871.

That discretion was not at all abused, and if we were at liberty to review it, we should feel that it was not unwisely or improperly exercised.

Discovering no error in the record, our duty is to affirm the conviction.

The judgment must be affirmed.

All concur.

Lipman ARENSBERG, App't.

1. It is essential, to create the offense prohibited by Laws 1885, chap. 183, § 7, as amended by chapter 458, that the article not produced from milk or cream, the manufacture and sale of which is forbidden, should be in imitation or semblance of butter.
2. Whether "oleomargarine" is or is not, in a given case, an imitation of butter, is a question of fact.

(Earl, J. dissenting, discusses the constitutionality of the Act.)

(Decided October 29, 1886.)

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court at General Term in the Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of Sessions of Kings County on conviction of defendant of selling oleomargarine. Reversed. Reported below, 40 Hun, 358.

Statement made by Earl, J., prefatory to his dissenting opinion:

The defendant was indicted and convicted for selling oleomargarine at the City of Brooklyn, in this State, in violation of section 7 of chapter 183 of the Laws of 1885, as amended by chapter 458 of the same year.

Upon the trial a witness, who described himself as a state dairy expert, testified as follows: that the defendant was engaged in the business of manufacturing oleomargarine; that on the 16th day of July, 1885, he bought of him personally three tubs of oleomargarine; that he asked for oleomargarine and bought it as such, and that he subsequently delivered a sample of it to Mr. Gladding, who was also called as a witness and testified that he was a chemist; that the sample delivered to him by the previous witness was of a yellow color resembling butter; that it was composed of animal fat, or animal or vegetable oils, not produced from unadulterated cream; that he did not know the particular substance used to give it color, but that a coloring substance had been used; that he was acquainted with oleomargarine and its ingredients, and that in its pure manufacture it has a dull, pearl white color, resembling tallow. On his cross examination he testified that the article was probably made of tallow or of lard or of a mixture of both, and that it was composed of the same things as are found in milk, except that in milk they are combined with other things and in different proportions; that it contained all the ingredients found in pure butter, but in different proportions and differently combined.

Another witness, a chemist, called on the part of the People, gave similar evidence.

When the defendant began to call his witnesses, the trial judge announced that he would hold that any affirmative testimony on his part as to the qualities of oleomargarine or its constituent parts was inadmissible, unless he proposed to show that it was made from pure unadulterated milk or cream.

The defendant called an expert chemist and asked him: "What is the difference between oleomargarine and butter, if any?" The plaintiffs objected to this, and on the admission of defendant's counsel that he did not pretend that the article sold by the defendant was made of unadulterated milk or cream, the judge again stated that he should exclude all affirmative testimony on the part of the defendant as to the constituents of the oleomargarine, as to its manufacture and healthfulness or otherwise, and he excluded the question.

The witness was then asked to look at the sample of oleomargarine produced by the plaintiffs and state "whether it is not butter." This was objected to by the plaintiffs and excluded. The following questions were then put to the same witness, and all, on the objection of plaintiffs' counsel, were excluded: "Look at that (Gladding's analysis of the specimen of oleomargarine), and state whether or not the ingredients which go to make up that compound are not in themselves separately and in the compound, wholesome articles of food." "State whether an article made of these separate ingredients would or would not constitute a healthful and cleanly article of food." "You have stated that the article we have spoken of as oleomargarine had been invented by a Frenchman in 1870 or 1871; will you state, if you please, whether since that time this article has been used extensively all over the world as an article of food?" "Will you state whether there is or is not in this composition, any thing which is not found in butter?" "Is there anything in butter which is not found in this article?" The same questions were also put to Professor Chandler, an expert chemist, and excluded.

The defendant was sworn as a witness on his own behalf, and testified that he had been in the oleomargarine business for about five years; that there was a large sign with the word "Oleomargarine" thereon on the outside of his place of business, and that he had there machinery and property employed in that business. He was then asked the following questions, which, on the objection of plaintiffs' counsel, were excluded: "What was the value of that machinery and property on the 80th day of April, 1885?" "What would be the value of that machinery and property in case you were not allowed to use it in the manufacture of oleomargarine?" He then offered to prove that the article in question "is a form of butter made otherwise than by the natural process." Plaintiffs' counsel objected to this on the ground that "the offer is not to prove that the product is made from substances other than those prohibited by section 7 of the statute," and the evidence was excluded.

The counsel for the defendant requested the judge to direct the jury to acquit him, on the ground that the statute under which he was indicted was unconstitutional, and also on the ground that the statute was aimed only at fraud, and that here there was no evidence of any fraud. The judge denied the request, and then charged the jury "that this is a valid and constitutional law; that if you believe that the defendant did sell this article called oleomargarine, and that it was not a production of pure, unadulterated milk, or cream of the same, then he committed an offense under the law. The simple question for you to decide is, Did this defendant, or did he not, sell an article known as oleomargarine? and was that article made of pure, unadulterated milk or cream of the same? If he did so sell that article, and if it was not so made, he is guilty of the violation of this statute, which I again charge you is a valid and constitutional law." Proper exceptions were taken to this portion of the charge and to all the rulings against him.

The jury found him guilty, and his conviction having been affirmed at the general term, he appealed to this court.

Mr. F. R. Coudert and Wheeler H. Peckham, for appellant: Claimed that the charge of the court, that if the defendant sold an article called oleomargarine as such and it was not manufactured from milk or cream, the defendant was guilty under the third count, was error; and also claimed that the statute under which defendant was indicted was open to the same objections as that held invalid in People v. Marx, 99 N. Y. 877.

Messrs. Edward B. Thomas and W. P. Quinn, for respondents:

I. The appellant was not indicted for having made or sold an article "designed to take the place of natural butter." The words, "or designed to take the place of" can be separated from the other provisions of the section. They do not therefore affect the validity of the balance thereof. In the amendments to the law enacted since the one under which the defendant was indicted they have been omitted. No one has ever been indicted for having made or sold an article "designed to take the place of natural butter" which was not "an imitation or semblance thereof."

Without the words "or designed to take the place of," section 7 under which the appellant was convicted prohibits the manufacture from the forbidden ingredients and in the manner stated therein of any article "in imitation or semblance of natural butter produced from pure unadulterated milk or cream of the same," it being sold, kept for sale or offered for sale, whether made in this State or elsewhere.

No guilty knowledge or intent to deceive is required to constitute a violation of the section.

Cronin v. People, 82 N. Y. 323, and cases cited.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court: This record discloses an error in the charge of the trial judge to the jury. He submitted to them the bare question whether the defendant had manufactured or sold oleomargarine not made from milk or cream, and charged that if he did, he was guilty under the law. The language of the court was especially clear and decisive. The jury were told: "If you believe that the defendant did sell this article called oleomargarine, and that it was not a production of pure unadulterated milk or cream of the same, then he committed an offense under the law. The simple question for you to decide is, Did this defendant or did he not sell an article known as oleomargarine, and was that article made of pure unadulterated milk and cream? If he did so sell that article and if it was not so made, he is guilty of a violation of this statute."

It would be difficult to make the direction plainer. But the guilt of the prisoner did not and could not lie in the simple manufacture and sale of the article, and depended upon the further inquiry whether it was manufactured in imitation or semblance of butter; whether, by the use of ingredients not necessary or essential to the article itself, it was sought to accomplish such imitation or resemblance.

The proof showed that when oleomargarine was put upon the market in its normal condition and before the addition of ingredients designed to modify its natural taste and color, it was of a pearly white hue resembling tallow, but that coloring matter was sometimes added.

It was to prevent such or similar imitations that the Act of 1885 was framed. Section 7 forbids two things: the manufacture not from milk or cream of an article or product in imitation or semblance of butter, or designed to take the place of butter. The latter clause is ineffectual as we held in the Marx Case, 99 N. Y. 877.

It was under the first alone that the defendant could be convicted, and yet the charge of the court ignored this element of offense entirely, and missed the precise point of the accusation.

Whether the oleomargarine manufactured by the defendant was or was not an imitation or semblance of butter became the material inquiry, but was withheld from the jury; and they were instructed to convict upon proof of the manufacture and sale of the article known as oleomargarine. Practically that was a ruling as matter of law that the article thus known is an imitation of butter; whereas, it may or may not be, and the question whether in a given case it is or not is one for the jury. A sample of the product manufactured by the defendant was produced before them and open to their observation. The vital point of the alleged crime is the manufacture and sale of an article which is an imitation and semblance of butter and so is calculated to deceive, and indicates a deceptive purpose immediate or ultimate; and that is a question of fact which the court was not authorized to determine as a matter of law, but upon the evidence produced should have submitted it to the jury.

It is said that the imitation was admitted and the case tried on that assumption. I am unable to agree in that proposition. I do not think the imitation was conceded, and a distinct exception was taken to the charge, which ignored the fact of imitation as essential to the crime, and argued before us on the appeal.

For this error, without considering the constitutional question, the judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered.

Ruger, Ch. J., Rapallo and Danforth, JJ. concur; Earl, J., reads dissenting opinion; Andrews, J., for affirmance, on the ground that it was proved and assumed on the trial that coloring matter had been added to the substance called oleomargarine to give it a yellow color resembling natural butter, and that the sale of oleomargarine so colored constitutes an offense under the Act, within the competency of the Legislature to declare; Miller, J., not voting.

Earl, J., dissenting, after stating the case as above:

Besides the general statutes prohibiting the adulteration of food, there have been in this State for several years stringent special enactments prohibiting the sale of unwholesome and deceptive dairy products. The Legislature has attempted to keep pace with the devices of men to circumvent its policy.

By the Act, chap. 415 of the Laws of 1877, it first undertook to deal with oleomargarine, which a short time before had first made its appearance in this country. By section 1 it was provided that every person who should manufacture for sale, or offer or expose for sale, any article in semblance of butter not the legitimate product of the dairy, and not made exclusively of milk or cream, but with which the oil or fat of animals entered as a component part, should distinctly and durably stamp or brand upon every tub or package of such article the word "Oleomargarine"; and that in case of retail sale of such article in parcels, the seller should in all cases deliver therewith to the purchaser a written or printed label bearing the plainly written or printed word "Oleomargarine"; and it was declared that every sale of such article or substance not so stamped or branded should be unlawful, and that no action should be maintained to recover the price thereof. Sections 2 and 3 provided that every person who should knowingly sell or offer to sell any of such articles required by the first section to be stamped or branded, not so stamped or branded, should for each and every offense forfeit and pay a fine of $100, and be guilty of a misdemeanor. All the sections of that Act were amended by the Act, chap. 439 of the Laws of 1880, making them more explicit and stringent, particularly as to stamping and branding the packages, and the notification of the character of the substance sold.

In 1882 the Legislature, finding the previous legislation not sufficient to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, and to protect the public against deception, again dealt with the matter in four Acts: chapter 214, "An Act to prohibit the coloring of oleomargarine, butterine, and adulterating cheese"; chapter 215, "An Act to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine or any form of imitation butter and lard, or any form of imitation cheese, for the prevention of fraud and the better protection of the public health"; chapter 238, "An Act for the protection of dairymen and to prevent deception in the sales of butter and cheese"; and chapter 246, "An Act to prevent fraud in the sale of oleomargarine, butterine, suine, or other substances not butter."

These Acts among other things prohibited the coloring of oleomargarine in semblance of butter, the introduction therein of any substance for the purpose of causing it to resemble butter, the sale thereof representing it to be butter, and required the packages containing it to be plainly marked "oleomargarine butter," and were plainly intended to protect the People against fraud and imposition.

After two years' experience these stringent Acts were not deemed sufficient to accomplish their purpose, and in 1884, the Legislature again had the subject under consideration and passed the Act, chapter 202, "An Act to Prevent Deception in Sales of Dairy Products." In that Act the Legislature recognized the difficulty of preventing the sale of impure and unwholesome milk and imitation butter, and of discovering and detecting such milk and butter, and therefore created the office of state dairy commissioner, the incumbent of which was authorized to employ experts and chemists, and was armed with power to detect frauds and impositions and to enforce the provisions of the Act.

That Act repealed chapter 415 of the Laws of 1877, chapter 439 of the Laws of 1880 and chapter 214 of the Laws of 1882, and left the other Acts above mentioned in force; and in section 6 it provided that "No person shall manufacture out of any oleaginous substance or any compound of the same, other than that produced from unadulterated milk or cream of the same, any article designed to take the place of butter or cheese produced from pure unadulterated milk or cream of the same, or shall sell or offer for sale the same as an article of food," and imposed severe penalties for violations of the section. That section was under consideration in this court in the case of People v. Marx, 99 N. Y. 377, which was decided June 16, 1885.

The Legislature of 1885, evidently being of opinion that the prior legislation was still inadequate to guard the public health and protect the People against fraud and deception in the sale of dairy products and simulated butter, on the 30th of April passed the Act under which the defendant was convicted, entitled "An Act to Prevent Deception in the Sale of Dairy Products and to Preserve the Public Health, Being Supplementary to and in Aid of Chapter 202 of the Laws of 1884." This Act did not repeal any of the prior Acts, and in section 20 each section thereof is declared to be enacted "to prevent deception in the sale of dairy products, and to preserve the public health," which is said to be endangered by the manufacture, sale or use of the article or substances regulated or prohibited. It prohibits the sale of impure, unhealthy, adulterated or unwholesome milk, and has many provisions to prevent and detect fraud and deception in the sale of dairy products. It enlarges the powers of the dairy commissioner and imposes more and severer penalties. Section 6 of the Act of 1884 is re-enacted, and section 7 is as follows: "No person by himself or his agents or servants shall make or manufacture out of any animal fat, or animal or vegetable oils not produced from unadulterated milk or cream from the same, any article or product in imitation or semblance of or designed to take the place of natural butter or cheese produced from unadulterated milk or cream of the same; nor shall he or they mix, compound with or add to milk, cream or butter, any oils or other deleterious substance or any animal fats, or animal or vegetable oils not produced from milk or cream, with design or intent to render, make or produce any article or substance or any human food in imitation or semblance of natural butter or cheese; nor shall he sell, keep for sale or offer for sale any article, substance or compound made, manufactured or produced in violation of the provisions of this section, whether such article, substance or compound shall be made or produced in this State or in any other State or country." The amendments made by chapter 458 are not now material.

The crime of which the defendant was convicted is plainly described in this section. He did sell an article manufactured out of animal fat or oil "not produced from unadulterated milk or cream from the same;" and it was sufficiently shown and indeed not disputed upon the trial that the article was manufactured "in imitation or semblance of natural butter." An article must be in imitation or semblance of butter when to the senses it appears like butter or to be butter; and that was true of this oleomargarine. It was not incumbent upon the People to show that the defendant made the sale with intent to defraud or deceive anyone.

The statute imposes upon the seller the duty of knowing the nature of the article in which he deals, and absolutely prohibits the sale of the prohibited article.

The defendant was therefore legally convicted, if the particular provision of law under which he was indicted was constitutional and therefore valid; and whether it was or not is the main inquiry in this case.

In approaching this inquiry, we should not be unmindful of the important and wholesome rule laid down by many eminent judges and enforced by a proper respect for the legislative department of the government, that courts will not hold a statutory provision to be unconstitutional unless a clear and substantial conflict exists between it and the Constitution, and that every presumption is in favor of the constitutionality of legislative Acts.

Butter is one of the most common articles of human food, used by nearly all the People of our State at every regular meal. Either from prejudice, or education, or habit, or because of the conviction that it is best and most wholesome, the consumers want butter made from pure milk or cream, and almost unanimously will use no other unless imposed upon.

The manufacturers of oleomargarine aim to make their product like butter, and their success is measured by the closeness of their imitation. The final process is to add butterine and color to give it the flavor and external appearance of butter. The manufacturer who sells to the wholesale dealer, like the manufacturer of counterfeit coin, may not himself deceive or intend to deceive anyone; and the same may be true of the wholesale dealer who sells in large unbroken packages to persons who buy to sell. But we may from our general knowledge and observation, assume to know, or we may at least assume, that the Legislature had information that the consumers are nearly always deceived when they purchase oleomargarine. They rarely, if ever, seek and buy it as such, and to them it is rarely if ever sold as such. They seek butter, and, in its place, are unwittingly deceived into the purchase of oleomargarine.

The President in his message accompanying his approval of the recent congressional Oleomargarine Bill said: "Notwithstanding the immense quantities of the article described in this bill which is sold to the people for their consumption as food, and notwithstanding the claim made that its manufacture supplies a cheap substitute for butter, I venture to say that hardly a pound ever entered a poor man's house under its real name and in its true character." And a United States Senator in his speech before the Senate in advocacy of the bill said: "Although it may be sold to the dealer upon its own merits and under its own name, yet the statement which I now make can be verified to the fullest extent, and that is, that not less than nine tenths of all the imitation butter made in this country is sold to the consumer as butter, bought as butter, and used by the consumer believing it to be butter." If these facts are not so notorious, in view of the many Acts of the Legislature, of the action of Congress, the debates in public bodies, and of the discussion in the public prints and in other places, that we may assume judicially to know them, we cannot assume that they are not true or that the legislators did not know them when they framed this legislation to protect the People against the deception.

That the Legislature has the right to pass appropriate laws to protect the People against fraud and imposition is not disputed. The right was most emphatically affirmed in the case of People v. Marr. There is the same foundation for legislative authority to enact laws to protect against fraud as there is to protect against crime. One who is deprived of his property by theft is no more wronged or outraged than he who is deprived of it by fraud.

However, under the mere guise of Acts to protect against fraud, the Legislature cannot arbitrarily strike down private rights, invade personal freedom or confiscate private property. The police power must be exercised within its appropriate sphere and by appropriate methods. But laws enacted in the exercise of the police power may be unwise, arbitrary and unjust, and yet be unassailable in the courts. The sole remedy for them may be an appeal to the People by those who complain of them. As was said in the Jacobs' Case, 98 N. Y. 98: "Generally it is for the Legislature to determine what laws and regulations are needed to protect the public health and secure the public comfort and safety; and while its measures are calculated, intended, convenient and appropriate to accomplish these ends, the exercise of its discretion is not subject to review by the courts."

This Act absolutely prohibits the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine "in imitation or semblance of" natural butter. Did the Legislature not have constitutional power to do this? It may absolutely prohibit the sale of adulterated or simulated substances, and has frequently done so. It may punish as a criminal the ignorant seller of an adulterated or forbidden article. U. S. v. Bayaud, 16 Fed. Rep. 384; Commonwealth v. Farren, 9 Allen, 489; Commonwealth v. Wentworth, 118 Mass. 441; Commonwealth v. Smith, 103 Mass. 444; People v. Cipperly, 37 Hun, 320, aff'd. in this court 101 N. Y. 684 [S. C. 1 Cent. Rep. 804].

Oleomargarine is well calculated to deceive. It is a close imitation of butter which cannot be detected by ordinary observation, or the skill and experience which the great bulk of consumers possess. The Legislature had, during several years, tried by many enactments, various expedients to protect the public against the deception and to compel the sale of oleomargarine to consumers in its real character. We may assume that these enactments proved to be inefficient and failed completely to accomplish their purpose, and that finally the Legislature concluded that it could not effectually protect the People against the deception, except by entirely suppressing the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine made "in imitation or semblance of butter." Who shall say that this was not an appropriate means to accomplish the end? The means may be harsh and rigorous, but we must assume that the Legislature in the exercise of its discretion, after full examination and information, found the exigencies of the case to be such as to require such a measure. It does not prohibit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine when so made (as it can be) as not to resemble or imitate butter. The color and but-terine, added to give it the semblance of butter, contribute nothing to its wholesomeness and usefulness as food. They may be omitted, and if consumers desire it as a cheap food, they will still purchase it. This is not, therefore, a case where a useful branch of industry is stricken down, but is one where it is simply regulated so as to give protection against fraud and deception.

The Act, chapter 721 of the Laws of 1871, was in the same line as this legislation. There it was provided that no person should kill, or expose for sale, or have in his possession after the same had been killed, any of the game birds mentioned, between the first day of January and the 20th day of October in any year, under the penalty of $25, except that a person selling or in possession of the game should not be liable to the penalty up to the first day of March, provided he proved that it was killed before the prohibited time or outside of the limits of the State, where the killing was not prohibited. In that case the Legislature concluded that it would not be effectual simply to prohibit the killing of the game during the months mentioned; but to accomplish the purpose of protecting the game it absolutely prohibited the having in possession or selling the same during the prohibited time.

The constitutionality of that Act was challenged in Phelps v. Racey, 60 N. Y. 10, and Church, C. J., writing the opinion of the court, used language quite applicable to this case: "The measures best adapted to this end are for the Legislature to determine, and courts cannot review its discretion. If the regulations operate in any respect unjustly or oppressively, the proper remedy must be applied by that body. Some of the provisions of the Act in question might seem to one unversed in the mysteries of the subject, to be unnecessarily stringent and severe; but we cannot say that those involved in this action are foreign to the objects sought to be attained, or outside of the wide discretion vested in the Legislature."

While the legislation we are considering is appropriate and well adapted to protect the public against fraud and deception, we cannot assume that it was adopted for the purpose of suppressing one branch of industry for the mere purpose of fostering and promoting another. Soon Hing v. Crowley, 118 U. S. 703 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 1145].

We reach the conclusion that the provision of the law under which the defendant was convicted was constitutional and valid, whether oleomargarine is a wholesome or unwholesome product. We do not deem it important to go any further and determine whether this provision could also be upheld as enacted to preserve the public health.

The conclusion which we have reached is in no way in conflict with any thing decided in the case of People v. Marx. There we condemned the provision in the Act of 1884, which absolutely prohibited the manufacture or sale, as an article of food, of any substitute for butter.

The provision we declared to be unconstitutional, because the prohibition was not limited to unwholesome or simulated substitutes, but absolutely forbade the manufacture or sale of any compound designed to be used as a substitute for butter, however wholesome, valuable or cheap it may be, and however openly and fairly the character of the substitute might be avowed and published. The power of the Legislature by appropriate legislation to protect the People against fraud and deception in the sale of imitation butter was fully recognized.

The provision of the Law of 1884 condemned by that decision was carried into the law of 1885, enacted before the decision was announced, but the defendant's conviction was in no way based thereon. That provision was eliminated by the amendment of the Act of 1885, by the Act, chapter 577 of the Laws of 1886.

It follows from these views that there was no error in the rulings of the trial judge, and that the judgment of the General Term should be affirmed.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

David C. ENGLISH, Admr. of William A. Van Deursen, Deceased,

v.

William A. NEWELL et al.

An executor who had taken no part in the administration of the estate held, under the circumstances of the case, not to be liable for a waste or misappropriation committed by his coexecutor who had assumed all the active duties of the administration; such waste or misappropriation having been committed without the knowledge of the nonacting executor and without suspicion on his part that it would be committed, and it appearing that an account which purported to be a joint executors' account was, in fact, the separate account of the acting executor only.*

(Decided November 3, 1896.)

BILL for relief. On final hearing upon pleadings and proofs.

The facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. J. Kearney Rice and A. H. Strong, for complainant.

Mr. A. V. Schenck, for defendant Hendrickson.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

William A. Deursen, late of New Brunswick, deceased, died on or about February 13, 1873. By his will, after ordering payment of his debts and funeral expenses, he gave to his wife $5,000 and certain household furniture absolutely, and the interest of $2,000, for life. He then gave to his son William an annuity of $600 for life, and gave to his grandson John H. Van Deursen a specific legacy. He then directed that after paying his debts and the $5,000, his executors should invest a sum sufficient to produce the annuity to William, and that they should also invest the $2,000. He gave to his daughter Joanna, wife of William A. Newell, one half of all the residue of his estate, including in that half, after the death of William, one half of the fund to be invested to produce William's annuity, and after the death of his wife, one half of the $2,000. The other half of the residue he gave to the children of his deceased son John and their heirs in equal proportions, to be paid to them at the death of the mother of the children; and he gave to her the interest thereof for life. He appointed his son-in-law William A. Newell, and his brother-in-law Charles I. Hendrickson, executors, authorizing and directing them to sell his real estate at their discretion.

The will was proved by both executors, February 27, 1873, and they together filed an inventory of the estate on the 27th of March following.

The bill is filed by the administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo, the executors having been removed from office. It states that Newell took upon himself the execution of the will and the administration of the estate and received and took into his hands the assets to a large amount; that Hendrickson never took into his custody any of the assets and never, so far as the complainant is informed and as he believes, took any active part in the management of the estate; that the executors on the 14th of July, 1874, filed a joint partial account; that on or about the first day of September, 1879, in pursuance of citations issued to them by the Orphans' Court of Middlesex County, at the instance of certain persons interested in the estate under the will, they filed another account to which some of the children of John Van Deursen, deceased, filed exceptions, but the exceptions were never brought to a hearing because a compromise was made between the exceptants and Newell, in pursuance of which, each of the children of John Van Deursen, deceased, except Charles A. Van Deursen, who has been absent and has not been heard from for many years and is believed to be dead, in consideration of certain moneys paid to them by Newell, released and discharged the executors from all claim for moneys then distributable; and it was admitted that there remained in Newell's hands after such payment, $14,635.41, which amount was made up of the following sums: $11,000 invested to produce the annuity for William Van Deursen, $2,000 invested for the widow, and $1,635.41, the share of the before mentioned Charles A. Van Deursen, of the money which was distributable when the compromise was effected; that by the compromise it was agreed that the account should be restated so as to show a balance of the above mentioned sum of $14,635.41; that a restatement of the account was prepared accordingly but, it was never filed, and the bill alleges that it remains in Newell's hands; that on or about the 10th of January, 1881, two of the children of John Van Deursen, deceased, filed a petition in the orphans' court, setting forth that Newell had wasted the money of the estate, and that he refused and neglected to pay the interest due the widow and the annuity due to William Van Deursen, and that Hendrickson refused to have anything to do with the estate, and praying that the letters testamentary granted to the executors might be revoked; that under that petition the complainant was appointed administrator pendente lite and that subsequently, the executors having been removed, he was appointed administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo; that under the first appointment he received from Newell's attorney certain securities amounting in the aggregate to $3,773.60 of principal, but has never received any more of the assets, and that on a just accounting it would appear that there was at the time of the compromise a larger balance than $14,635.41 in Newell's hands.

The bill further states that among the credits claimed by Newell in the account then made was one of $9,664.40, which he claimed to have paid to his wife; but the complainant says he is informed and believes that Newell has never paid it and that he has no receipt or voucher for it nor any release from it, and the complainant insists that the executors are accountable for it, with interest from July 1, 1874.

The bill further states that Newell claimed credit for money paid William Van Deursen which he had not in fact paid; that the complainant believes that the assets not accounted for have been employed by Newell in his own business and diverted to his own use; and the complainant insists that if that is the case, Newell should be held accountable therefor.

The bill also states that Newell resides out of this State but that at the time of filing the bill he was temporarily here, but intended soon to leave the State. It prays that the defendants (Newell and Hendrickson) may answer; that Newell may make discovery as to the assets; that Newell and Hendrickson may state and settle the account of their executorship in this court, and that Newell may be decreed to pay over the balance which may be found due upon such settlement, and that in default of such payment by him, Hendrickson may be decreed to pay it; and it prays a writ of ne exeat against Newell.

It appears very clearly from the evidence that, although both executors proved the will and joined in the inventory, Newell alone had possession of the assets and that he alone took the entire management of the estate. He even made leases of the real estate although the executors had only a power of sale, and made them in his own name and received the rents. Although a sheriff's deed upon sale under foreclosure was taken in the names of both executors, it was so taken by Newell without Hendrickson's knowledge. The bill states that Newell took upon himself the execution of the will and the administration of the estate and received and took into his hands the assets; and that Hendrickson never took into his custody any of the assets nor, so far as the complainant is informed and as he believes, took any active part in the management of the estate.

The same facts are stated also in the petition in the orphans' court for the removal of the executors and in the petition for the appointment of an administrator pendente lite. It is urged that the executors filed two joint accounts and that their joint liability is thereby established.

It is true that where executors jointly settle their final account they are jointly liable for the balance in their hands as ascertained by the account and the decree of the court thereon. Laroe v. Douglass, 2 Beas. 308.

But while an account may purport to be a joint account, it may in fact be only a separate one. If so it does not create a joint liability in equity. Fennimore v. Fennimore, 2 Green, Ch. 292; Beatty v. Cory Universalist Society, 14 Stew. 585; [S. C. post, —].

There is no evidence in this case that any joint final account was in fact ever made, nor that any account was filed which of itself, because it was joint, should impose any liability whatever upon Hendrickson to answer for any of the assets or for the management of the estate or any part of it in any way. The account of 1874 was not a final account but an intermediate one only. It purports to be joint but it was not such in fact. It was the account of Newell only. It was sworn to by him alone and it was filed by him alone. It may be true that Hendrickson was present when it was drawn up or when instructions were given by Newell for drawing it, but it was not his account. He had had none of the assets and had taken no part in the management of the estate. The bill says so.

He had no account to make, and did not intend to make any, whether joint or several.

The account filed in September, 1879, under the citation, also purports to be a joint account; but it is also sworn to by Newell alone and was prepared and filed by him. It is in fact entirely an account of his receipts, disbursements and transactions, and in no way an account of any receipts, disbursements or transactions of Hendrickson. There were none such. The attorney by whom the account was drawn up says that Hendrickson had nothing whatever to do with the making, preparing or stating of that account or the supplement thereto. When Hendrickson proved the will he declared to those interested that on account of his age he would take no part in the settlement of the estate, but would leave it to Newell; and it was understood by them from the beginning that such was his determination. Not only does he testify to this but he is corroborated by the testimony of John H. Van Deursen who is a principal witness for the complainant.

Hendrickson says in his answer, and he supports the statement by his testimony, that the persons interested in the estate acquiesced in his determination to have nothing to do with the settlement, and that they consented that Newell should alone take the assets and administer them; and he is corroborated by the conduct of those persons. They at all times recognized the fact that Newell had all the assets and was administering them alone, and that Hendrickson had neither had any of them nor taken any part in the management of the estate. This appears, as before stated, in the proceedings in the orphans' court and in the statements of the bill in this suit.

It is true John H. Van Deursen says that what Hendrickson said was that he "could not act as acting executor but would keep Newell straight." To which the witness says he replied that if he, Hendrickson, left it all to Newell they (the legatees) would not get a cent, because Newell did not attend to anything. He says that his reason for saying this was that he had always understood in the family that Newell did not keep his business appointments and (he adds) he was away too much at Washington, and besides was engaged in politics. He does not say that he questioned the pecuniary responsibility or integrity of Newell. Nor does it appear that there was any reason for doubting either his solvency or his probity. He was at that time reputed to be wealthy.

It is urged that under the circumstances it was the duty of Hendrickson to protect the estate against loss by the misconduct or mismanagement of his coexecutor. Executors are not necessarily liable for each other's acts, or responsible for the property which comes to each other's hands. As a general rule they are answerable for no more than they receive; but they may by their own conduct make themselves answerable. Fennimore v. Fennimore, supra.

The rule in regard to the liability of an executor for money not received by him, but received and wasted or misapplied by his coexecutor, is that if he knows that the assets received by his coexecutor are not applied according to the trusts of the will or in a due course of administration, and he stands by and acquiesces in it, or suffers the assets to be wasted by his coexecutor without any effort to require or compel a due execution of the trusts and a due application of the assets in the course of the administration thereof, he will be held liable for any waste or misapplication of such assets. But it will be otherwise if he has no knowledge of such misapplication or waste. Story, Eq. Jur. § 1280 a.

In Hovey v. Blakeman, 4 Ves. 596, it was held that one executor in trust is not answerable for the receipts of the other, merely by taking probate, permitting the other to possess the assets and joining in acts necessary to enable him to administer; and that he is only answerable by concurring in the application of the assets. See also Monell v. Monell, 5 Johns. Ch. 283; Sutherland v. Brush, 7 Johns. Ch. 17; and Ormiston v. Olcott, 84 N. Y. 839.

In Williams v. Nizon, 2 Beav. 472, where two executors were directed after making some annual payments to invest and accumulate the surplus, one of them received the dividends of stock for several years and misapplied them; it did not appear that the other had any knowledge of such misapplication. It was held that he was not answerable for the breach of trust.

In that case Lord Langdale, M. R. said that there can be no doubt that if an executor knows that the moneys received by his coexecutor are not applied according to the trusts of the will, and stands by and acquiesces in it, without doing anything on his part to procure the due execution of the trusts, he will, in respect of that negligence, be himself charged with the loss; but that in cases of that kind it is always to be observed that the testator himself having invested certain persons with the character of executors, has trusted them to the extent to which the law allows them to act as executors, and in that character each has a separate right of receiving and giving discharges for the property of the testator; that if in the case before him the defendant knew that his coexecutor was misapplying the moneys received and acquiesced in it, he himself became liable, because he was a witness and an acquiescing party to the misapplication or breach of trust; but that if he was not aware of the misapplication, he, Lord Langdale, knew of no case in which the court had gone the length of saying that an executor shall be held personally answerable for standing by and permitting his coexecutor to do that which for anything he knows to the contrary was a performance of the trusts of the will. He further said that if he were to charge the defendant in that case generally with all the assets received by his coexecutor, he must in every other case say that an executor who does not personally act and who, having no reason to suspect any misapplication by his coexecutor, permits him to act alone, is liable for every misapplication committed by his coexecutor; and he adds that he does not think that he can lay down any such rule.

In the case before me the persons to whom the declaration of Hendrickson, that he would not and could not act as executor, etc., were made, were not creditors but were persons who were interested in the estate as legatees; and it is in their behalf that this suit is brought. Under the circumstances it would seem that they themselves were bound to take action against Newell, for the preservation of the assets in his hands, if they supposed that there was danger that the assets would be wasted or misappropriated. The fact that Hendrickson made the declaration and that he swears that they acquiesced in his determination is a very important circumstance.

According to the evidence, the complaints which were made to Hendrickson were in reference to Newell's delay in paying William Van Deursen's annuity and the interest of the $2,000. John H. Van Deursen says that he expressed to Hendrickson a wish that the estate might be taken out of Newell's hands, and he says that he was quieted by what Hendrickson said in reply; that Hendrickson's conversation led him to believe that the estate would come out all right and that he, Hendrickson, would see that it should come out all right; that Hendrickson said that the witness had no reason to complain; that Newell was well off and would not use the estate's money.

He says that at that time Newell, so far as he knew, was reputed to be wealthy; that he lived in good style and had the appearance of being rich; that Newell about that time had bought another farm. So that it appears from the testimony of this witness that there was no reason to suspect that Newell had wasted or misappropriated the estate, or to apprehend that he would do so. Hendrickson evidently did not suppose that the estate was in any danger in Newell's hands. Nor did anyone suppose that there had been any waste or misappropriation.

On the 9th of September, 1879, it was agreed, between the proctor of the petitioners (in the proceedings for the removal of the executors) and the proctor of Newell, that the application in those proceedings should be continued for two weeks from that time, upon Newell's agreement to assign securities to the amount of $6,500 to Hendrickson, to be held by him as the principal, to produce the annuity of William Van Deursen and the interest payable to the widow. Hendrickson was not a party to this agreement. In pursuance of it Newell sent to him an order upon his attorney for certain securities.

Hendrickson, being unable to get the money upon the order as he had expected to do, refused to assume the trust and at once gave notice of his refusal to those interested. He says that Newell spoke to him about accepting the order; and he told Newell that he would accept the money, that he would take care of the money for the trust fund if it were paid into his hands. He says he did not want to take the trust. He also says that he demanded the money from the attorney because the order was for money; that he accepted the order only to have the money; that he thought that if he had the money he could take care of it for the children. As before stated, when he found he could not get the money he refused to take the trust.

In November, 1879, all of the children of John Van Deursen, deceased, except Charles A. Van Deursen (who, as before stated, had long been absent and had not been heard from for many years and was supposed to be dead), settled with Newell for their interest in the estate, except their interest in the fund to produce the annuity for William Van Deursen, and the $2,000 invested for the benefit of the widow for life and the share of Charles A.

Van Deursen in the money which was at that time distributable; and they released him accordingly.

It may be added that while there is no proof that the money credited in the account made at or about that time (and upon which that settlement was made) as having been paid by Newell to his wife has been in fact paid, there is no evidence upon the subject. It does not appear that Newell has wasted the estate or misappropriated any part of it, except as it is to be presumed from the fact that he has not turned over all of the assets pursuant to the order of the orphans' court made in July, 1881, requiring him to pay, deliver over and transfer to the complainant as administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo, all the assets which were in hand on the 21st of March, 1881, the date of the decree removing him from the office of executor.

There is no evidence upon which Hendrickson can be equitably held liable to make up the deficiency. The persons interested in the estate might themselves have taken measures to bring Newell to an account years before they did so. They might have done so when the payment of interest was delayed. They knew that Hendrickson had declared in the outset that he would not be responsible for the assets or for the management thereof. If he said in connection with such declaration that he would "keep his coexecutor straight" he certainly did not intend to promise to stand surety for Newell or to assume any responsibility for his acts. There was no occasion for doing so; for, as before remarked, none of the persons interested had any doubt about Newell's responsibility or his integrity.

What Hendrickson meant by saying that he would keep Newell straight, if he used the expression, was that he would give Newell the benefit of his advice; that although he would not and could not, on account of his age, undertake the duties of executor and would not consent to take any responsibility, he would give the estate the benefit of his judgment in the management, if occasion should require. It is by no means probable, to say the least of it, that he meant that he would commit the assets and the management thereof wholly to his coexecutor and be responsible for him.

When in 1879 Newell gave to Hendrickson the order for the funds, to secure the annuity to William and the interest to the widow, it was not supposed that there was or would be any deficiency. No demand was then made upon Hendrickson to protect the estate. It was not supposed that it needed protection, but it was supposed that the funds were in existence and would be handed over by Newell or by his attorney, in pursuance of his order. The waste or misappropriation was committed without Hendrickson's knowledge and without any suspicion on his part that it would be committed. He neither knew nor suspected it until after it was done. Under such circumstances he is not answerable.

Nor is this conclusion in conflict with or in contrariety to the doctrine of the cases cited by the complainants' counsel. In Laroe v. Douglass, 2 Beas. 308, a surviving executor, Douglass, was held liable for the waste of his coexecutor, Laroe. Not only had the executors in that case settled a joint final account, but Laroe had canceled a mortgage which was given to the executors to secure the payment of legacies which the bill was filed to recover. The mortgage was upon the real estate of the testator, which was sold by the executors; and they took the mortgage for part of the purchase money. Laroe became the owner of the property subject to the mortgage. He sold the property and improperly canceled the mortgage. Douglass knew he was about to sell and notified the purchaser of the existence of the incumbrance. Laroe then called upon Douglass and told him that he, Laroe, could not make the sale except by canceling the mortgage, and said that he would pay the cestui que trust. Douglass was held liable because he did not prevent, as he might have done, the meditated wrong of which he was fully apprised.

In Schenck v. Schenck, 1 C. E. Green, 174, the suit was against the executors of an executor. They had received a trust fund held by their testator at the time of his death in his character of executor and not as trustee. They had settled a joint final account on which they claimed and obtained credit for the fund in question. They were consequently both held liable.

In Fisher v. Skillman, 3 C. E. Green, 229, an executor was held liable for funds which his coexecutor had wasted, but he had voluntarily placed the funds in the hands of his coexecutor.

In Suydam v. Bastedo, 13 Stew. 433, the liability of an executor for funds of the estate which had been wasted by his coexecutor was based upon the fact that the executors had settled a joint final account.

Hendrickson has acted in good faith. He supposed and had reason to be believe that those interested in the estate acquiesced in his openly declared determination not to act in the settlement of the estate, and consequently he did not act therein. If there was waste or misappropriation of the estate by his coexecutor he was not aware that it was about to take place.

The bill should be dismissed as to him, but without costs.

1. A valid and binding contract for the sale of realty, such as equity will specifically enforce against an unwilling purchaser, operates in equity as a conversion of the land into money.
2. Where a contract for the sale of realty is one which could, at the time fixed by it for completing the purchase, have been enforced against the purchaser by the vendor, if he had then been living, the rights of the next of kin of the vendor thereunder, after his decease, can not be defeated by the unwillingness of his heir to perform the contract.
3. Hence, where a decedent had entered into a contract for the sale of realty such as worked an equitable conversion of the land into money at his death, and his widow was willing to have the contract performed but his heir was unwilling, and the administrator of the deceased vendor brought suit to compel specific performance, which failed as against the vendee because of the time which, without fault of the widow and by fault of the heir, had elapsed since the time fixed by the contract for its completion,—held, that the widow of the vendor was entitled to recover from his heir a distributive share of the purchase money as part of the personal estate of her husband.

(Decided November 6, 1886.)

BILL for relief. On final hearing upon pleadings and proofs.

The facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Alfred Mills, for complainants.

Messrs. S. D. Haines and S. B. Ransom, for defendant Faulka, cited Leigh & Dalz. Equit. Conv. 98; Hawley v. James, 5 Paige, 318.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The bill states that John B. Miller, deceased, late of Madison in the County of Morris, made and entered into a valid contract in writing with Jehiel K. Hoyt upon the 25th of April, 1872, for the sale and conveyance by him to the latter or to such company of individuals as might be named by him, Hoyt, certain land therein mentioned, for the price of $800 an acre; and that on or about the 10th of June following he made another like agreement in writing with Hoyt for the conveyance to him, his heirs and assigns, or to such person or persons as he might designate, of the same property on or before the first day of September then next, for the price of $39,392, to be paid, and which Hoyt thereby stipulated to pay, as follows: $100 upon the execution of the agreement and $4,900 on the delivery of the deed; the balance $34,392, to be secured by the bond of the grantee or grantees and his or their mortgage of the property; that the time for the delivery of the deed was by another agreement in writing made on the 20th of August, 1872, between Miller and Hoyt, extended to the first day of October then next; that Miller died September 5, 1872, intestate, leaving a widow and a son, the defendant David L. Miller, who was his only heir at law; that letters of administration of his estate were granted to Theodore Little, October 1, 1872; that after the death of John B. Miller and on or about the 28th of September, 1872, Hoyt notified David L. Miller that he would be ready to take the deed and carry out the agreement on his part on the first of October then next, and requested Miller as heir at law to deliver at that date a deed for the property in conformity with the contract, to Henry E. Reddish and Henry C. Ohlen, whom he designated as grantees; that David L. Miller did not and never would convey the property, except upon condition that he should receive the purchase money for his own use; that the complainants are informed that Reddish and Ohlen on or about the first of October, 1872, demanded of David L. Miller that he convey the property to them by warranty deed, free from any dower of his wife and from the dower of the widow of his father and from the lien of certain judgments which were of record against him, David L. Miller, and tendered the money and bond and mortgage, but he would not comply with the request; that neither David L. Miller nor Hoyt, Reddish or Ohlen ever requested the widow to release her dower to Reddish and Ohlen; that she never refused to release it to them, but was at all times ready to release it upon condition that the purchase money should be paid and secured to be paid to the administrator of John B. Miller, and that David L. Miller was aware of her readiness to release upon that condition; that on or about the 18th of December, 1872, the widow wrote a letter to her late husband's administrator, in which she said that she had expected to join with her husband in the conveyance to the purchaser, but he died before any conveyance was made; that she was still ready to do all that she could to perform the agreement and was ready to release her dower, on condition that the purchase money should be paid or secured to be paid to the administrator, and she offered to release her dower upon those terms, in case the administrator should take judicial proceedings to compel specific performance of the agreement; that he did bring suit to that end in this court, in December, 1872; that in January following the widow died and the complainants in this suit were appointed administrators of her estate; that in the suit brought by the administrator of John B. Miller specific performance was decreed, but the decree was, upon appeal, reversed so far as Hoyt and Reddish and Ohlen and the performance of the agreement by them were concerned.

By the decree of the court of errors and appeals the bill was dismissed as to those defendants but was retained as to the others, in order that the legal representatives of the widow might have an opportunity of raising, by cross bill, the question whether they have any remedy against David L. Miller.

This suit is brought accordingly by the administrators of Mrs. Miller against David L. Miller and his wife and his assignee in bankruptcy (he filed his petition in bankruptcy after the decree for specific performance was entered), the administrator of John B. Miller (he refused to bring the suit or to join in it or to permit the complainants to bring it in his name), and the administrators of a judgment creditor of David L. Miller.

The prayer of the bill is that the land may be decreed to be personal property and may be sold under the order of this court; that the proceeds of the sale may go into the hands of the administrator of John B. Miller as personal property to be administered and distributed by him accordingly; that it may be decreed that the complainants as the legal representatives of the widow shall have her share thereof according to law, and that, if necessary, it may be decreed that David L. Miller's wife has no dower in the property and that the judgment above mentioned is no lien upon the premises. None of the defendants have answered except the assignee in bankruptcy.

By the decree in the above mentioned suit brought by John B. Miller's administrator (Miller's Admr. v. Miller, 10 C. E. Green, 855; S. C. on appeal; Reddish v. Miller's Admr. 12

C. E. Green, 514), in addition to decreeing specific performance, it was decreed that David L. Miller at and ever since the death of his father had been and at the date of the decree was seised of the property as a trustee to and for the use of Reddish and Ohlen and not otherwise, and that David L. Miller's wife was not and had not been entitled to any dower or right of dower in or to the land, and that the judgment creditors of David L. Miller were not entitled to any lien to or claim upon or against the property by virtue of their judgments; and also that the moneys decreed to be paid and the bond and mortgage, decreed to be given on account of purchase money, were and should be personal assets in the hands of the administrator of John B. Miller, and should be by him administered as personal property in due and legal course of administration, and that he should pay to the administrators of the widow her distributive share thereof. That decree (it was made over ten years ago) was not appealed from by David L. Miller.

The only question presented for decision is whether, under the circumstances of the case, the contract of sale worked an equitable conversion of the land into money at the death of John B. Miller. That it would have done so had the contract been enforced against the vendee is indisputable and is not denied. But the answering defendant insists that the failure to compel specific performance prevents such result. That failure, however, was due, not to the invalidity of the contract but to the fact that because of the length of time which had elapsed between the time fixed by the contract, as extended, for the completion of the purchase, and the making of the decree for specific performance, it was inequitable to require the vendee to complete the purchase, seeing that he had tendered himself ready to comply with the requirements of the contract on his part at the time fixed and that in the meantime the property had fallen in value.

It may be remarked that the noncompliance upon the part of the heir was not due to the widow. She did not refuse to release. She was never asked to release. On the 13th of December, 1872, she stated to her late husband's administrator by letter that she was willing to release in case he should take judicial proceedings to compel specific performance of the contract.

It is proved that on the very day on which, under the contract, as extended, the deed was to be delivered, her attorney stated to the attorney of Reddish and Ohlen that she was willing to release upon such a payment as would secure her rights, by which was meant payment to her husband's administrator and not to David L. Miller.

A valid and binding contract of sale, such as a court of equity will specifically enforce against an unwilling purchaser, operates as a conversion. The cases in which the court has refused to decree that a contract for sale works equitable conversion are those in which the contract was such as equity would not enforce.

The counsel of the answering defendant insists that the decision in the case of Teneick v. Flagg, 5 Dutch, 25, is decisive of the question under consideration and is adverse to the claim of the complainants. But it is to be observed that that was an action at law. Mrs. Attie Teneick had agreed to convey land to James Buckalew and had received part of the purchase money. He refused to accept the deed because of the pendency of an action of ejectment brought against Mrs. Teneick by other parties, to obtain possession of the land. She delivered a deed for the property to her agent, to be delivered by him to Buckalew upon the favorable termination of the action of ejectment. She died before that termination was reached. By her death the action of ejectment abated and it was not renewed. After her death her heirs conveyed the property to Buckalew in pursuance of her agreement; and the purchase money was paid to her administrators. The husband of one of the heirs brought suit against the administrators, to recover a share of the money. The court held that he was entitled to recover, upon the ground that on the death of Mrs. Teneick the title descended to her heirs, the deed held in escrow passing no title, since the event on which it was to be delivered to Buckalew did not happen in the lifetime of the grantor; and at her death the deed ceased to have any validity. In the decision of the case the difference between the equitable rule and the legal rule was distinctly recognized by Justice Haines in his opinion. The cause was of course decided in the court of law upon the legal rule. Upon a full and careful consideration of the matter I reached the conclusion in the suit for specific performance that the contract worked a conversion. See Miller's Admr. v. Miller, supra.

The only new feature now presented is the fact that the appellate court has decided that specific performance ought not to have been decreed. The reason for that conclusion has already been stated. It was not the invalidity of the contract nor any consideration which rendered the contract unenforceable in equity at the death of John B. Miller or at the time fixed by the contract for completing the purchase. The contract was one which at the time fixed by it for completing the purchase could have been enforced against the purchaser in equity and it would have been enforced at that time on the application of the heir, with the consent of the widow; and she was willing to join him in enforcing it if he had been willing to secure to her her right in the purchase money. In equity he ought to have enforced it.

Equity regards that as done which ought to have been done. The doctrine of conversion is a reasonable one. In this case John B. Miller had made a sale of the property which, had he lived, he would have been able to enforce in equity and which it is to be presumed he would have enforced. He had sold the property at a high price. It should not be and it is not in the power of the heir to defeat the right of the next of kin by his own unwillingness to carry out the contract. By force of the contract the vendor became in equity trustee of the property for the vendee and the latter became trustee of the purchase money for the former. It has been held that the equitable rights of the next of kin of the vendor are not defeated where the vendee, by his laches after the death of the vendor, loses his right to specific performance, provided the contract was enforceable in equity at the death of the vendor. Curre v. Bowyer, reported in a note to Farrar v. Earl of Winter-ton, 5 Beav. 1.

Where there is a contract for the sale of an estate, the estate is in equity considered as converted into personality from the time of the contract, although the purchaser has an election to purchase or not as he shall see fit. Laves v. Bennett, 1 Cox. Eng. Ch. 167; Sugd. Vend. 8th Am. ed. 187, and cases cited.

The sale in this case worked an equitable conversion of the land into money, and the widow was entitled accordingly to a distributive share of the purchase money as part of the personal property of her husband.

SUPREME COURT.

Dennis CONDON

v.

Margaret A. BARR.

- *1. It is essential to recovery against a married woman, in an action at law, by force of the Statute of 1862, that she be shown to have a separate estate chargeable in equity with the debt contracted by her.
2. A mere moral obligation or duty is not a sufficient consideration to support a subsequent express promise to pay.
3. An obligation enforceable in equity will support an express promise to pay, and make it suable at law.
4. At common law the promise of a feme covert could not be enforced against her, unless she had a separate estate. No personal decree could be made against her, but her contract operated as an appointment out of her separate estate.
5. Where the feme covert has no separate estate her contract does not create an obligation which is enforceable in equity, and therefore is not such a consideration as will support her express promise to pay, made after the death of her husband.

(Decided November 10, 1886.)

RULE to show cause why a verdict in favor of plaintiff should not be set aside and a new trial granted, in an action to recover for money loaned defendant during coverture. Rule made absolute.

Argued before Beasley, Ch. J., Depue, Van Syckel and Knapp, JJ.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr A. V. Schenck, for defendant:

The contract was made between March 24, 1866, and May 14, 1870. It is, therefore, governed entirely, in regard to its legal effect, by the Act of the Legislature of this State, entitled "An Act to Prevent the Fraudulent Transfer of Property and to Facilitate the Collection of Just Claims," approved March 24, 1862.

Laws 1862, p. 271; Wilson v. Herbert, 12 Vroom, 454.

*Head notes by VAN SYCKEL, J.

N. J.

The Act of March 24, 1862, has been repeatedly construed by this court, and consistently with that construction this action can not be maintained.

Eckert v. Reuter, 4 Vroom, 266; Vankirk v. Skillman, 5 Vroom, 109; Lewis v. Perkins, 7 Vroom, 139; Wilson v. Herbert, 12 Vroom, 454; Mather v. Brokaw, 14 Vroom, 587; Heywood v. Shreve, 15 Vroom, 94; Morris v. Lindsley, 16 Vroom, 485.

The promise alleged by plaintiff to have been made by the defendant, after the death of her husband, was without consideration and void.

A moral obligation alone is not a sufficient consideration to support either an express or implied promise.

1 Story, Cont. § 590; Nixon v. Vanhise, 2 South. 492; Updike v. Titus, 2 Beas. 151; Freeman v. Robinson, 9 Vroom, 883.

The distinction is between void and voidable contracts. Where the promise is void, ab initio, it is not capable of ratification.

1 Story, Cont. § 593.

Thus where a married woman gave a promissory note and after her husband's death promised, in consideration of the forbearance of the payee, to pay it, it was held that the note was absolutely void, and that forbearance, where there was no cause of action originally, is not a sufficient consideration to raise a promise.

Loyd v. Lee, 1 Str. 94; Watkins v. Halstead, 2 Sandf. 811.

Messrs. W. Strong & Sons, for plaintiff.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought to recover money alleged to have been loaned by the plaintiff to the defendant during her coverture, between the years 1866 and 1870. To support his case the plaintiff produced evidence to show that the money was loaned to the defendant in the lifetime of her husband, and that after his death the defendant promised to pay the plaintiff. Under the instructions of the trial court a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff. The questions to be disposed of arise on an application for a new trial, and are:

First, whether, under the Act of March 24, 1862, a married woman who lives with and is supported by her husband, and who has not any separate estate of her own nor any separate trade or business, is liable at law for money loaned or advanced to her during her coverture.

Second, whether, under the facts stated, any legal liability exists on the part of the defendant to pay the plaintiff.

The Act of 1862 has been so repeatedly construed by this court that a brief reference to the cases will dispose of the first question.

In Eckert v. Reuter, 4 Vroom, 268, this court declared that "This Act of 1862 should be strictly construed, and not held to endow the wife with any new power to contract. As a feme covert she could only contract in reference to an equitable liability against her separate estate, for such debts and claims as could be charged against it. This Act merely recognizes that power; it does not extend it, and only gives a remedy in the courts of law for the collection of such equitable debts or claims. Whenever her separate estate could be reached in the court of chancery for such debts or claims, a suit at law could be maintained therefor."

And again: "The remedy given by the Act is personal and by a personal judgment; but that remedy can be adopted only when the debt or claim would be equitably chargeable against any separate estate she may have had when her equitable liability was created."

This construction of the Act of 1862 has been rigidly adhered to in every instance in which it has been since presented for adjudication.

In Vankirk v. Skillman, 5 Vroom, 109, the Chief Justice in adverting to the case of Eckert v. Reuter, says:

"The principle of that construction was this: that the Act did not attempt to confer upon a feme covert any new power to contract; that the only instance known to the law in which a feme covert could, in her own right, bind herself by agreement, was where she had property of her own, with respect to which her agreements would be good in equity; and that consequently if a feme covert, having no separate estate, did contract, such an act being wholly void, no debt or claim could thereby remain unsatisfied."

To this interpretation and limitation of the Act of 1862 this court has committed itself in all subsequent decisions. Lewis v. Perkins, 7 Vroom, 138; Wilson v. Herbert, 12 Vroom, 454; Mather v. Brokaw, 14 Vroom, 587; Heywood v. Shreeve, 15 Vroom, 94; Morris v. Lindsley and Bradley v. Johnson, 16 Vroom, 435, 487; Bradley v. Johnson, 17 Vroom, 271.

It is essential therefore to recovery in an action at law, by force of the Statute of 1862, that the wife shall be shown to have a separate estate chargeable in equity with the debt contracted by her.

The absence of that element in this case precludes the plaintiff from invoking the support of that statute.

The question remains whether an action can be maintained upon the promise made by the defendant, after the death of her husband.

That a mere moral obligation or duty, as an executed consideration, is not a sufficient consideration to support a subsequent express promise to pay is shown by Mr. Justice Depue in Freeman v. Robinson, 9 Vroom, 383, to be well settled in the adjudications both in England and in this country.

The verdict, therefore, in this case rests upon no stable foundation, unless some consideration can be found to support the defendant's promise, which in legal aspect is of higher quality than a mere moral obligation.

In Rusling v. Rusling, 18 Vroom, 8, the Chief Justice says that an equitable obligation will support a promise to pay; and that by force of such promise, what was before an equitable obligation is transformed into an obligation enforceable at law.

This discussion turns upon the question whether, prior to the express promise, a duty rested upon the defendant to pay the plaintiff's claim, which could have been enforced in a court of equity.

In Pentz v. Simonson, 2 Beas. 232, Chancellor Green says that a married woman may incur liabilities which will be charged upon her separate estate; but that no doctrine of the common law is better settled than that a married woman can enter into no contract or covenant, by which she will be personally bound.

In equity a liability assumed by a married woman will be charged upon her separate estate; but she cannot in the absence of statutory enactment be made personally liable. Bradley v. Johnson, 17 Vroom, 271.

The authorities are collected in Francis v. Wigzell, 1 Madd. 145.

Lord Cottenham in Aylett v. Ashton, 1 Mylne & C. 105, in commenting on Francis v. Wigzell, says: "It was there decided, and clearly in conformity with all previous decisions, that the court has no power against a feme covert, in personam; but that if she has separate property, the court has control over that separate property; in all cases, however, the court must proceed in rem, against the property. A feme covert is not competent to enter into contracts, so as to give a personal remedy against her. Although she may become entitled to property for her separate use, she is no more capable of contracting than before; a personal contract would be within the incapacity under which she labors. Sir Thomas Plumer says: 'There is no case in which this court has made a personal decree against a feme covert.'"

Mr. Justice Story, in his Equity Jurisprudence, Vol. 2, § 1399, expresses the same view: "She may charge her separate estate; her agreement however, creating the charge, is not (it has been said) properly speaking, an obligatory contract, for as a feme covert she is incapable of contracting, but is rather an appointment out of her separate estate."

I think search will be made in vain to find in the history of equity jurisprudence a case in which a feme covert has been charged with an obligation, unless it appeared that she had a separate estate.

The immunity of the wife at common law did not rest upon the fact that her husband would be held for her contracts. The husband's liability for the wife's engagements made without his authority during coverture was circumscribed within very narrow bounds.

The disability of the wife to incur personal obligations was an incident of the marriage relation, supposed to be dictated by a wise public policy.

The rule that her separate existence was merged by coverture in that of her husband was relaxed in equity, and her separate existence recognized for the sole purpose of dealing with her separate estate. The power to charge her in a court of equity was coextensive with and inseparable from the separate estate, and expired with its appropriation.

An interesting and instructive review of this doctrine will be found in Perkins v. Elliott, 8 C. E. Green, 526.

The legislation in force when the alleged loans were made to the defendant furnishes no reason in public policy for amplifying the scope of this equitable rule.

The defendant in this case being without a separate estate, there was, at the time of the new promise, no enforceable equitable obligation resting upon her, which could in law support such promise and transmute an equitable into a legal obligation. The promise to pay was without valid consideration, and therefore nudum pactum.

Such is the view taken in the elaborate note to Wennall v. Adney, 8 Bos. & Pul. 247, in which the English cases are reviewed. It is there said that "An express promise, as it should seem, can only revive a precedent good consideration which might have been enforced at law, through the medium of an implied promise, had it not been suspended by some positive rule of law, but can give no original right of action, if the obligation on which it is founded never could have been enforced at law, though not barred by any legal maxim or statute provision."

Under this rule a promise to pay a debt barred by the Statute of Limitations, a promise by a man after he becomes of age to pay a debt contracted during minority, a promise by a bankrupt after his certificate to pay his debts in full, and other like promises, may be enforced.

But a promise by a feme covert is not merely voidable but absolutely void at common law. Therefore in Loyd v. Lee, 1 Strange, 94, the promise of the defendant, after her husband's death, to pay a promissory note given by her during coverture was held to be void.

Lee v. Mugeridge, 5 Taunt. 86, is cited as a case holding the contrary rule; but in that case the married woman, when she executed the bond during coverture, had a separate estate and thus incurred an obligation which equity would have enforced.

Littlefield v. Shee, 2 Barn. & Adol. 811, and Meyer v. Haworth, 8 Adol. & Ell. 467, are in line with Loyd v. Lee.

The doctrine upon which these cases rest was adhered to by Lord Denman, C. J., in Beaumont v. Reece, 8 Adol. & Ell. 483, and was approved in this court in Freeman v. Robinson, 9 Vroom, 833, before cited.

In New Hampshire it is well settled that the promise of a married woman, made when the common-law disability of coverture existed, does not furnish a consideration upon which her promise to pay the same debt, made after the death of her husband, can be sustained.

In the recent New Hampshire case of Kent v. Rand, the authorities are collected. East. Rep. October 30, 1886, p. 174 [S. C. 2 New Eng. Rep. 858].

In my judgment the rule to show cause should be made absolute.

CERTIORARI to review a judgment of the Hoboken District Court, in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages resulting from the bite of a dog. Affirmed.

Argued before Dixon, Reed and Parker, JJ. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Niven & Minturn, for prosecutor:

The plaintiff below should have been nonsuited, because he failed to prove that the dog had a vicious disposition and that defendant had notice of it. Scienter is the gist of the action.

1 Add. Torts, 283; Van Luven v. Lyke, 1 N. Y. 515.

It is not enough, to maintain the action, that the dog evinced a vicious disposition, under extraordinary circumstances and great provocation; such was the extent of the scienter proven by plaintiff. His natural and ordinary disposition must be shown to be vicious.

Tupper v. Clark, 43 Vt. 200; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 8d ed. 191.

Bounding on people in play, though in so doing he might frighten them or annoy them, does not evince a vicious disposition, and is not notice to the owner sufficient to sustain the action.

Line v. Taylor, 3 Fost. & Fin. 781.

Messrs. Daly & Fleming, contra.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An action was brought in the Hoboken District Court, by John McDermott against Samuel Evans the prosecutor, to recover damages occasioned by the bite of a dog.

It was proved that McDermott, at the time he was bitten, was in the saloon kept by the prosecutor as a place of public resort; that the prosecutor was the owner and possessor of the dog; that in going from the billiard room to the bar room of the saloon, McDermott met the dog in the passage way; that he put out his hand to motion the dog out of the passage way he was obstructing, when the dog growled and bit him on the hand.

McDermott swore that about a month after he was bitten his hand broke out from the effect of the bite; that he became nervous, lost sleep and suffered pain; that he employed a physician, paid for medicines, lost two or three weeks' wages and was out of pocket in money about $25.

Dr. Pinder, a practicing physician, swore that about the time McDermott's hand broke out, he was consulted professionally; that he made an examination of the hand and prescribed for the injury. He said that he found the skin broken, the hand considerably inflamed and swollen, and that it appeared to him to be a pretty bad hand. The witness added that hydrophobia might possibly result from such a wound, but that he did not apprehend such result in this case.

At the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the counsel for the defendant moved to nonsuit, on the ground that it did not appear that the dog had bitten McDermott maliciously, and also on the ground that there was no proof that the dog had bitten other persons except in play, or that the defendant had knowledge of the propensity of the dog to bite.

The judge refused to nonsuit. In charging the jury, the judge said: "Some time ago a girl was bitten by a dog in this State. The case was carried to the supreme court and a judge there held the owner of the dog liable for an injury committed by the dog, if he had notice of his mischievous propensity; and this is the law which applies to this case."

Upon request to charge, the judge held, in substance, as he had ruled on the motion to nonsuit. The jury found for McDermott in the sum of $300 damages.

When the plaintiff rested there was evidence of the propensity of the dog to bite, and that the defendant knew of it before McDermott was bitten.

But it is said, on the part of the prosecutor, that although several persons had been bitten by the dog, of which he had information, yet it appeared that in every instance, the biting occurred while the dog was in a playful mood; and it is argued that damages cannot be recovered where it is shown that the dog had a propensity to bite only in play; but that, to justify a recovery, it must appear that the dog was in the habit of biting mankind while in an angry mood, actuated by a ferocious spirit.

This is not the law. An action can be maintained against the owner, by a party injured, upon evidence that a dog, with the knowledge of the owner, had a mischievous propensity to bite mankind, whether in anger or not. In either case the persons bitten would suffer injury. A mischievous propensity is a propensity from which injury is the natural result.

In the case of Hudson v. Roberts, reported in 6 Exch. [Welsb. H. & G.] 699, it appears that the plaintiff was walking in the street wearing a red handkerchief. The bull of defendant, ordinarily gentle and quiet and not known to have gored any person previously, was being driven along the street, when he attacked and gored the plaintiff. The defendant said that the red handkerchief caused it, and that he knew the bull would run at anything red. The plaintiff recovered. The bull had no hostile feeling against the man he injured, and no disposition to gore mankind, yet because of his mischievous propensity to rush at a red object, of which his owner knew, it was held that when he caused injury to the plaintiff through that propensity his owner should pay damages.

A domesticated bear may hug a man until his ribs be broken. This may be the mode adopted by the animal to manifest his affection; yet if he had on other occasions previously, shown his affection in that way, causing injury, and his owner knew of such propensity, the owner would have to pay damages caused by breaking the man's ribs. It is true that the bear is classed with animals feræ naturæ and the presumption in such case would be that, although domesticated, the animal had relapsed into his wild habits; yet although the presumption on the question of scienter would be against the owner, he might be able to prove that the habit of embracing persons did not proceed from the savage nature of the bear, but under the influence of civilization, from a cultivated affection. But this proof would not avail the owner, in a suit by a party embraced. Such a propensity would be held to be mischievous, because hurtful to those who were the object of the bear's affection.

In the case of Oaks v. Spaulding, reported in 40 Vt. 347, it appeared that Mrs. Oaks was driving cows home from pasture, when the ram of Spaulding attacked and injured her. It was shown that the ram had a propensity to butt mankind and that the defendant knew it; but it did not appear whether the previous buttings by the ram proceeded from an ugly disposition, or from the exuberance of a playful spirit; yet it was held that the defendant was liable. It did not cure the hurt nor assuage the pain of the woman to be told that the ram, when he butted her, was only in one of his accustomed sportive moods. It might have been fun for the ram, but it was hurtful to Mrs. Oaks. It was a mischievous propensity, whether proceeding from ugliness of temper or from good nature which if known to the owner of the ram, made him liable for damages resulting from such propensity.

There is no doubt that in cases of animals not naturally inclined to do mischief, a previous mischievous propensity must be shown and the scienter clearly established. The gist of the action is, not the keeping of the animal but the keeping with knowledge of the mischievous propensity, whether proceeding from a savage disposition or not.

The conclusion is that the plaintiff below, having shown by his proof that on several previous occasions the dog in question had bitten various persons on the hand, with knowledge of the defendant, he was entitled to recover, even if the habit did not proceed from a ferocious nature but was the result of a mischievous propensity.

In this instance, whatever may have been the circumstances attending the previous bitings of the dog, the bite was accompanied by a growl, while McDermott was in a place where he had a right to be and when he was doing nothing except to motion the animal out of the passage way which the dog was obstructing.

The damages found by the jury are not excessive. In such cases they cannot be measured by mere expenditure of money to cure from the effects of the bite. Compensation should be made for the pain and the anxiety of mind which must necessarily follow the bite of a dog.

STATE, ex rel. ESSEX PUBLIC ROAD BOARD,

v.

Jacob SKINKLE.

*1. Under the Act to authorize the compromising or settling by arbitration of any tax or assessment laid by any public road board in this State passed in 1832, the only parties to the proceeding are the road board and the applicant under the Act. The only taxes, assessments and impositions to be considered are those against the applicant; and the value of his lands in proportion to the burdens laid upon them is to be estimated, and then the arbitrators are to fix the sum the applicant is to pay in discharge of such burdens.

2. The object of said Act is to relieve lands when the assessments against them are greater than the accruing benefit. The relief is limited to the party applicant; and to bring himself within the Act, he must show such excess of burden.

(Decided November 9, 1886.)

CERTIORARI to review a report of arbitrators, in proceedings by defendant for re-assessment of damages and benefits on improvement of a public road. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John W. Taylor, for relator.

Mr. J. Frank Fort, for defendant.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The subject matter for review in this case is the report of arbitrators appointed on the application of Jacob Skinkle, the defendant, under the provisions of the Act entitled "An Act to Authorize the Compromising or Settling by Arbitration of any Tax or Assessment Laid by any Public Road Board in this State." Laws 1882, p. 256.

The relator insists in the first place that the arbitrators should have taken into consideration, not only the assessments against the defendant who alone petitioned for the benefit of said Act but also all other assessments for the same improvements imposed by the Road Board on all the lands assessed therefor. Does the failure to pursue such a course render the proceedings abortive?

The proceeding under the Act was instituted by Skinkle for his own benefit. No other land owner is interested in it. Every land owner affected by like assessments may at his option institute proceedings under the Act for his own exclusive benefit.

The estimate and assessment of the arbitrators, in each case in which the benefit of the Act is invoked, is conclusive only as to the petitioner under the Act, and has no effect whatever upon the assessments of other parties. The judgment of arbitrators appointed in one case could not guide or control those appointed in any other case. With the diversity of opinion which would naturally be entertained by different boards of arbitrators, the review in each case of the entire assessment could have but little tendency to preserve the principle of equality and proportion which should mark the original assessment. The magnitude of the labor which would be involved in reviewing and considering each assignment in its entirety would be appalling. There is nothing in the Act which indicates a purpose to establish such a scheme.

The third section of the Act provides that after the arbitrators are sworn, they shall view the land and real estate upon which the tax or taxes, assessment or assessments is laid or imposed, and after such view shall notify all parties in interest of the time and place when they will hear the parties and their witnesses, and shall after hearing the parties and taking into consideration all taxes, assessments and impositions of every nature whatsoever, and of the value of the land and real estate in proportion to the taxes and assessments against the same, proceed to fix and adjust the sum to be paid by the owner or owners so petitioning, in full settlement of the tax or taxes, assessment or assessments levied or imposed by the road board.

The only parties to this proceeding are the Road Board and Skinkle. The taxes, assessments and impositions to be considered are those against Skinkle; and the value of his lands and real estate in proportion to the taxes and assessments against them is to be estimated, and then the arbitrators are to proceed to fix the sum he is to pay in discharge of such taxes and assessments.

The object of the Act of 1882 is to relieve lands when the assessment against them is greater than the accruing benefit. The relief is limited to the party applying for the protection of the Act; and to bring himself within it, he must show such excess of burden. Such was the view taken by this court in a cause between the same parties reported in 18 Vroom, 93. The court there said:

"The object of the Act is to give relief to the petitioner from an assessment in excess of the benefits conferred upon him. The review which he institutes by his application is for his exclusive benefit and does not affect the prior proceedings, so far as they relate to others. The sole question is whether he is burdened in excess of his benefits. To entitle him to a review he must make a prima facie case to that effect."

If the assessments have been fixed by the arbitrators at a sum equal to the full benefit conferred upon Skinkle's lands the Road Board cannot complain that due proportion between the various land owners assessed has not been preserved. The consideration of proportion might ease one land owner and burden another; but in no event could it lead to the laying of an assessment in excess of the benefit conferred. Does the report of the arbitrators show that they have imposed upon Skinkle's lands a burden equal to the benefit? The language of the report is this:

"We fix the specific sum to be paid by the petitioner at the sum of $840; and we do hereby certify that we have so fixed said sum after a careful examination of said land and said public improvements for which said assessments were laid, with a view to charge said property with and to make said assessments conform in amount to the benefits conferred, and do hereby determine that the benefits conferred upon said property by said improvements amount to the said sum of $840."

This language leaves no room to doubt that the assessment fixed by the arbitrators is equal to the entire benefit conferred by the improvements.

In these respects there is no error in the proceedings, nor does any error appear in the order of the judge in regard to costs.

The proceedings below should be approved.

STATE, William HILLMAN, Prosecutor,
v.
Isabella STANGER.

*Where a judgment has been rendered in a justice's court, in favor of plaintiff in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, and it is made to appear that title to lands came in question before the justice, a certiorari will lie to review the judgment as one rendered without jurisdiction.

(Decided November 5, 1886.)

CERTIORARI to review a judgment of a justice of the peace, in favor of plaintiff in an action of trespass on land. Reversed.

Argued before Scudder and Magie, JJ.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Crandall, for prosecutor.

Mr. Howard J. Stanger, for defendant.

Unless the title to lands, tenements, hereditaments or other real estate came in question, the jurisdiction of the justice admits of no debate.

R. S. p. 539, § 1.

To oust the justice of jurisdiction, the possession must be merely constructive, such as can only be shown by proof of title.

Jeffrey v. Owen, 12 Vroom, 260-262.

When the plaintiff can maintain his right to sue in trespass, by proof of actual possession, which the justice may determine upon evidence of facts, without any inquiry into title, the action is cognizable in a justice court. Id.

The supreme court on certiorari will not go into the trial of the case on its merits or determine disputed questions of fact.

Beach v. Mullin, 5 Vroom, 346; Jeffrey v. Owen, supra.

If the defendant below thought himself aggrieved by the court below in its finding of the facts, he should have appealed. If the justice had jurisdiction he was confined to the appeal.

R. S. p. 556, § 96.

Magie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment of a justice of the peace in favor of the plaintiff in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit has been removed here by this writ, and is attacked upon the ground that the justice had no jurisdiction to render the judgment.

What occurred before the justice appears by a state of the case agreed on by the attorneys of the respective parties.

It thus appears that there was no evidence that the plaintiff was in actual possession of the locus in quo. The sole evidence of possession was the inference derived from a deed conveying the land to plaintiff, which deed she put in evidence.

At the close of the plaintiff's case, defendant asked for the dismissal of the action for want of jurisdiction, upon the ground that the title came in question. The motion was denied and judgment rendered for plaintiff.

In this course the justice was clearly wrong. The use made of the deed in evidence involved a question of title. The justice was thus ousted of jurisdiction and had no authority to render the judgment. Messler v. Flemming, 12 Vroom, 108; Jeffrey v. Owen, 12 Vroom, 260.

The only question of importance raised is whether the remedy for this error is not by appeal rather than by certiorari. That an appeal would lie is beyond doubt. Messler v. Flemming, supra; Jeffrey v. Owen, supra. But this fact does not exclude the resort to a writ of certiorari. Such a writ is expressly permitted in all cases where the justice has no jurisdiction; and this has been construed to mean, not only merely jurisdiction to entertain the action below, but jurisdiction to render the judgment. The remedies by appeal and by certiorari are therefore concurrent. Ritter v. Kunkle, 10 Vroom, 259.

For the lack of jurisdiction to render this judgment, it must be reversed.

Julia W. LITTLE.

*1. In proceedings to drain lands, under the statute, where a married woman's land has been sold under foreclosure, and conveyed, without change of possession,—notice to the owner and to the husband who occupies the land with his wife under arrangement for reconveyance is sufficient.

2. The prosecutrix, having no legal title or exclusive possession of the land, is not entitled to a writ to question the legality of the proceedings to drain lands.

3. Delay and acquiescence, inducing expenditure of moneys by others, in works of a quasi public nature waive irregularities.

(Decided November 13, 1886.)

CERTIORARI in matter of drainage of lands in the County of Bergen. Writ dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Chas. H. Voorhis, for prosecutor.

Mr. W. M. Johnson, for defendant.

Scudder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Proceedings were taken by the defendant Julia W. Little, under the "Act to enable the owners of swamp or meadow ground, to drain the same, etc." (Rev. 652), to cut, make, clear out and keep open sufficient ditches or drains in and through lands adjoining or near to her lands in Midland Township, Bergen County. The certificate and return made by the surveyors of highways and chosen freeholders show that a portion of the ditch or drain in controversy was allotted to the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, being the part of ditch or drain which is embraced within the limits of the property of the company.

These lands formerly belonged to the prosecutrix Jane W. Berryman, and were occupied by her and her husband William H. Berryman.

* Head notes by SCUDDER, J.

Prior to these proceedings for drainage, the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, holding a mortgage on said lands, foreclosed the same and, at the sale under execution, became the purchasers and owners. There was no change of possession after the sale; and the prosecutrix claims that she remained on the property, under some verbal arrangement for a repurchase and reconveyance of the property. Her first reason assigned for setting aside the return and proceedings is that she was not given notice as required by law. It appears in the return and proofs that legal notice was served on the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York and William H. Berryman, who is described as being in possession of the lands of said company.

The evidence taken under this writ also shows that the husband appeared in answer to such notice and contested the proceedings before the surveyors and freeholders, and that the prosecutrix had knowledge of his acts in the attempt to prevent the charge upon the lands. She was not injured in fact by want of notice, nor has she been injured in law; for notice to the husband who was actually in possession of the property, without anything appearing of record or by other notification that she had any separate or exclusive interest in the land, was sufficient for the purpose of this statute, and between these parties.

The other reasons relate merely to the form of the return and will not be considered, because the prosecutrix has not shown that she is entitled to this writ. Her alleged verbal agreement with the company was, as her husband testifies, made with an agent of the company whose authority to make such arrangement, if it were otherwise available in these proceedings at law, does not appear. As she has shown no ownership in the lands through which the ditch or drain runs, or possession, separate from her husband therein, she has no right to the writ to contest the return in dispute.

There is another sufficient reason for dismissing the writ, in the delay and acquiescence of the prosecutrix and her husband. The return of the surveyors and freeholders is dated June 25, 1883, and this writ is tested March 31, 1886. Since the date of the return Mr. Berryman, by agreement with the Mutual Life Insurance Company, has undertaken to make the ditch through their land, according to the map and profile furnished to him by the surveyors employed by the surveyors and freeholders; and his wife and the company have paid part of the expenses thus incurred.

The ditching under the return was begun in February, 1884, and was completed, excepting through the land of the insurance company, where it was delayed by the act of Mr. Berryman. In the latter part of December, 1884, or the first of 1885, the ditch was dug from the road by the bridge through the Berryman property down to Voorhis' line. If these facts had appeared in the application for this writ, the allowance would not have been made, because of the delay in prosecution; for where delay has permitted the expenditure of money in the furtherance of enterprises of a quasi public nature, or when, under cover of a proceeding of a public nature, individuals have been induced by the delay to expend their own money or labor, the writ will be dismissed. There must be reasonable diligence shown in the prosecution where other interests are involved in the delay; and this principle has been applied to proceedings under the Drainage Act. Haines v. Campion, 8 Harr. 49; State, Britton, v. Blake, 6 Vroom, 208; Bowne v. Logan, 14 Vroom, 421.

The writ will be dismissed, with costs.

John J. CRAIG et al.

A return of the laying out of a public road by surveyors of the highways was amended by striking out an award of damages for lands taken to "the heirs of A. B.," and inserting in lieu thereof a specific award to each individual owner. Held, that such owners had a right to caveat and procure a review of the necessity and utility of the road by chosen freeholders after the original return was received by the county clerk, by taking the steps required by the statute within the time prescribed; and that such right was not revived or renewed by such an amendment to the return.

(Decided November 5, 1886.)

CERTIORARI to review proceedings to lay out a public road in Warren County. Proceedings set aside.

Argued before Scudder and Magie, JJ.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Angle, for prosecutor.

Messrs. L. D. W. Taylor and N. Harris, for defendants.

Magie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Proceedings to lay out a public road in the County of Warren (a branch of which proceedings is now brought before us), have already been twice before this court. In State, Oxford, v. Brands, 16 Vroom, 332, the return of the road by surveyors of the highways was considered and found to be erroneous in only one particular, viz., in awarding damages for some land taken to "the heirs of Thomas Craig, deceased", instead of to the owners thereof by name. In accordance with a well settled practice under the present Road Acts, the error was held not to invalidate the whole proceedings, but the record was remitted to the court below, to enable it to make proper amendments. In Craig v. Brands, 17 Vroom, 522, the amended return was brought here, and the action of the court below, which resulted in the amendment, was set aside and the record again remitted to be proceeded on according to law.

The present writ brings before us a caveat against recording the return of the road, filed September 15, 1885; an application to the common pleas for the appointment of chosen freeholders to review the road, filed the same day; an order of that court appointing freeholders, made November 24, 1885, and the return of the freeholders, dated December 18, 1885. The original return was filed August 18, 1880. It was amended after the proceedings were last remitted from this court, and the return as so amended was filed September 4, 1885.

By section 7 of the Road Act (Rev. 995) the time for filing a caveat is limited to the fifteen days next succeeding the time when the clerk receives the return. The caveat before us was filed within fifteen days from the time the amended return appears to have been filed, but more than five years after the original return was received by the clerk. If the Road Act permits the interposition of the caveat, under the circumstances of this case, the proceedings before us are unassailable; but if not they are without jurisdiction and void.

When the matter was last before the court, the question now presented was anticipated; and it was declared that by the true construction of the Road Act an amended return was to be considered as a new return only with respect to new matter inserted as an amendment and not as respects matter remaining unamended. Upon that construction the court held that relief by caveat or appeal after the amendment of a return could only be accorded to such persons as were, in regard to such relief, affected by the new matter inserted in the return by the amendment, and that an amendment would not operate to revive the right of caveat or appeal, by persons who had once had that right.

It has not been contended on this argument that these conclusions were erroneous. Upon reconsideration of them, I do not perceive that, with respect to their bearing on the case before us, their correctness can be questioned.

But it is now contended that upon the construction thus given to the Road Act the proceedings before us must be sustained. The insistence is that the caveators, who were in fact the heirs of Thomas Craig, became parties to the proceeding only by the amendment of the return awarding damages to them individually for their land taken for the road. They urge that until such an award was made there was no condemnation of their lands.

Admitting the force of this contention, the conclusion sought to be drawn by defendants does not follow. The proceeding in road cases, initiated by a caveat, is designed to obtain a review of the surveyors' determination as to the necessity of the road. The freeholders, who are the reviewing officers, are to adjudge, not the regularity of the proceedings nor the propriety or justice of the awards for damages, but only the necessity and usefulness of the road. If they adjudge it to be necessary and useful, their adjudication affirms the proceedings; if they adjudge it to be unnecessary or injurious, their adjudication annuls the proceedings.

The power to caveat and apply for this review is given every person who shall think himself injured or aggrieved. Rev. 996, § 8.

It is not restricted to persons to whom awards for damages were properly made. The defendants therefore clearly had a perfect right to avail themselves of this proceeding when the original return was filed. The admitted facts show that some of them did avail themselves of the right to review the necessity and usefulness of the road. The amended return introduced no new matter affecting that subject. Whatever was new in it was only a correct award of damages to them. With respect to the quantum of such damages, the defendants may have a right to an appeal. According to the conclusions reached in the previous case, they would have such a right. But whether that be so or not, I am very clear that an amended return, amended only with respect to the assessment of damages, will not revive the right to caveat and review the utility of the road, which right every person aggrieved had for the statutory period following the reception by the clerk of the original return.

The proceedings brought up by this certiorari must therefore be set aside, with costs.

(Decided November 10, 1886.)

CERTIORARI to review an assessment of taxes. Writ dismissed.

Argued before Dixon, Reed and Parker, JJ.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. S. Appleget, prosecutor, pro se.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This certiorari brings before the court the assessment of taxes for the year 1885, on property of Adrian S. Appleget in the Township of Monroe in the County of Middlesex.

The only reason for setting aside the assessment, urged by the prosecutor, is the alleged erroneous valuation by the assessor, of his farm. It is said by prosecutor that his farm is rated higher than similar farm land, of equal or greater value, in the same township. An effort was made to prove this, but the evidence is not satisfactory. Even if the testimony proved that the farm was rated too high, in comparison with other lands in the vicinity, it would not avail the prosecutor in this proceeding. He had legal notice of the tax levied, in time to apply to the commissioners of appeal. He did not apply to the commissioners for a reduction. He says he had applied for reduction before other boards of commissioners in former years, and had been refused. This is not a good reason for not applying to the board of 1885.

The prosecutor has no legal right to have the court order a reduction of the tax, or to set aside the assessment. On a question of value, depending on evidence, the court will not, on certiorari, entertain it, except by way of appeal, after the commissioners have acted. State, Young, v. Parker, 5 Vroom, 49.

Whether an assessment is excessive is within the province of the commissioners of appeal to determine, and application should first be made to them. 8 Zab. 553; 5 Vroom, 58.

If a party assessed has opportunity to make appeal before the board of commissioners and fails to do so, he cannot have relief on certiorari. State, Hall, v. Snedeker, 13 Vroom, 76.

In State, Conover, v. Davis, 19 Vroom, 112 [S. C. 2 Cent. Rep. 260], it is held that on certiorari the court cannot determine disputes as to value of rates.

The certiorari in this case is dismissed, with costs.

v.

1. A plea bad for duplicity is properly taken advantage of by motion to strike out.
2. The rule that upon demurrer judgment shall go against the party whose pleading is first defective does not prevail on motion to strike out a plea.

(Decided November 13, 1886.)

ON motion to strike out plea. Granted.
Argued before Scudder and Magie, JJ.
The case is stated in the opinion.
Mr. Craig A. Marsh, for plaintiff.
Messrs. Gaston & Bergen, for defendants.

Scudder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action on the case is brought by the plaintiff to recover damages from the defendants for causing the death of a horse of the plaintiff, while pasturing in a field adjoining land of the defendant Caroline Hudson, by erecting and maintaining a barbed wire fence, dangerous to cattle, by which the horse was fatally torn, and from which injury he died. Several counts vary the statement.

To this declaration the defendant pleaded: first, the general issue, which is admitted to be a good plea; second, that the fence complained of was a partition fence, between the land of said Caroline Hudson and the land of one Charles Hyde, on which the plaintiff's horse was pasturing; that it was lawfully constructed of posts and rails, with a fence wire strung along the top thereof, and such as was in common use, not calculated to do injury, and was kept with due care and repair. And further, that it was erected and maintained by the leave and license of said Charles Hyde, the owner of the close in which the plaintiff's horse was depasturing.

This plea is embarrassing, and bad for duplicity, in presenting several distinct defenses. As the plaintiff could only take advantage of the defect by special demurrer, and special demurrers are now abolished by statute (Practice Act, § 189), the motion is properly made to strike out the plea. Salt Lake City Bank v. Hendrickson, 11 Vroom, 52; Practice Act, § 132.

The suggestion is made that the declaration is also irregular and defective, and framed so as to embarrass the trial of the action. The rule upon demurrer, that judgment shall be against the party whose pleadings are first defective in substance, does not prevail on motion to strike out the plea. Hogencamp v. Ackerman, 4 Zab. 183.

The plea will be stricken out, but with leave to amend on payment of costs.

2. The objection may be raised by a general demurrer.

(Decided November 13, 1886.)

ON demurrer to declaration. Demurrer allowed.

Argued before Scudder and Magie, JJ.

The nature of the case, and facts and questions raised are set out in the opinion.

Mr. M. Rosenkrans, for plaintiff.

Mr. F. J. McGee, for defendant.

Scudder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs brought this action against the defendant under the "Act to provide for the recovery of damages, in cases where the death of a person is caused by wrongful act, neglect or default." Rev. 294.

In the declaration the cause is styled an action of tort; and to this form of pleading a general demurrer has been filed. This objection is not a matter of form, but of substance, and may be raised by a general demurrer. Flanagan v. Camden Mut. Ins. Co. 1 Dutch. 506; Gregory v. Thompson, 2 Vroom, 166.

Prior to Rule 16 of the supreme court, of June Term, 1885, this action for causing the death of the intestate by the alleged neglect of the defendant's agents, in running its engine and cars, would have been brought in the form of an action on the case, as has been the usual practice in our courts; but if the pleader supposed that this rule has made a change in the form of action as applicable to this case, he has failed carefully to examine its terms.

Actions of trespass for injuries to property, real or personal, actions of trover and of trespass on the case for injuries to property, real or personal, shall be hereafter styled, in the process and pleadings, actions of tort. These are the words of the rule. Injuries to property, not injuries to the person, are included in the form of action prescribed. If the person had not been killed but merely wounded, by the collision set out in the declaration, he, in bringing his action charging negligence and consequent injury to his person, would not be within the terms of the rule, and could not sue in tort. The administrator who stands in his place since his death, to keep the cause of action alive for the benefit of the widow and next of kin, is suing for the injury to the person and not to the property of the decedent, and must bring his action as if the rule had not been made.

The demurrer is allowed, but the plaintiffs may amend, within this term, on payment of costs, and service of a rule to plead on the defendants.

(Decided November 8, 1885.)

CERTIORARI to review proceedings before an alderman of the City of Camden, to punish plaintiff in certiorari for a violation of a city ordinance, in regard to the sale of liquor. Reversed.

Argued before Reed and Dixon, JJ.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. B. Taylor, for plaintiff in certiorari.

The writ in this case raises the question of entire absence of jurisdiction to issue a warrant under the 18th section of an ordinance of the City of Camden, entitled "An Ordinance Regulating the Licensing of Persons to Keep Inns, and Taverns, etc.," passed June 12, 1884.

The only questions involved are: 1, whether there was any jurisdiction; and 2, whether the certiorari was granted prematurely.

1. In order to support jurisdiction to issue a warrant it must appear by proof:

1. That the person so charged is regularly licensed, and licensed under the ordinance in question.

Act June 12, 1884, § 12.

2. That such person so holding such license has actually violated the provisions of the ordinance. Id.

*Head notes by DIXON, J.

II. The writ of certiorari is a discretionary writ, in the absence of any statute requiring it to be granted; and the time of its allowance, as well as all other circumstances, is subject to legal discretion.

State, Hozsey, v. City of Paterson, 10 Vroom, 498.

It is not necessary for a person to wait until his liability is fixed, before he can have redress. "It is enough that he may be affected by an illegal ordinance to entitle him to a hearing, before any attempt has been made to enforce it."

State, Danforth, v. City of Paterson, 5 Vroom, 163.

The writ may be invoked previous to the exercise of a final power, if the proceedings already show such final exercise of the power must be illegal.

State, Jersey City Gaslight Co. v. Jersey City, 16 Vroom, 480.

Mr. J. Willard Morgan, for defendant in certiorari.

Dixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This certiorari brings up proceedings before an alderman of the City of Camden designed to punish the prosecutrix for violation of a city ordinance passed June 12, 1884, in regard to the sale of liquor.

The ordinance (§ 18) authorizes any person to be proceeded against before an alderman, upon proof being made by affidavit of the violation of any of its provisions; whereupon the alderman is by his warrant to require the person accused to be brought before him, and is to hear and determine in a summary way the guilt or innocence of the person so charged.

One of the provisions of the ordinance (§ 10) is that whosoever shall sell any spirituous, vinous or malt liquors, in less quantity than a quart, without having first obtained a license therefor, shall be punished by a fine of $50, or, in default of payment, by ten days' imprisonment.

Another provision (§ 12) is that if any person licensed under the ordinance shall sell to a minor any spirituous, vinous or malt liquors, he shall pay a fine of $100, or in default of payment, be imprisoned ten days.

In the present case, the affidavit filed with the alderman was as follows:

"Camden City and County, ss: John Wood upon his oath complains that he has good reason to believe and does verily believe that on March 10, 1885, at said City, one Mary Mowery did knowingly and unlawfully sell and offer for sale spirituous, vinous and malt liquors, to wit: one gill of brandy to one James Thomas, a minor under the age of twenty-one years, contrary to and in violation of the before mentioned ordinance."

On this affidavit, the magistrate issued his warrant, the prosecutrix was arrested and a day was set for her trial; thereupon, she obtained this certiorari.

Under our prior adjudications it is plain that this affidavit furnished no legal support to the proceedings of the magistrate. The ordinance requires, as preliminary to a warrant, proof by affidavit of some violation of its provisions; while the affidavit tendered proof only of the affiant's belief and his opinion of its reasonableness. This was fatally insufficient, since the affidavit was to constitute a charge whereupon to base a conviction. Roberson v. Lambertville, 9 Vroom, 69.

Moreover, if the affidavit was designed to formulate a complaint for violating the tenth section of the ordinance, it should have averred that the accused had sold without having first obtained a license to sell; State, Greely, v. Passaic, 13 Vroom, 87; Fleming v. New Brunswick, 18 Vroom, 231; while if a violation of the twelfth section was in view, an averment that she had been licensed under the provisions of the ordinance was requisite, according to the words of the section.

It must indeed be admitted that if the matters believed by the affiant were true, the person charged was guilty of an offense, for the sale of a gill of brandy to a minor in the City of Camden was a prohibited act; but it is not enough for a criminal complaint to aver mere guiltiness in the accused; it must allege a specific offense, so that the accused may know how to prepare his defense, if he have any, and so that the court may be able to render the legal judgment on conviction. This charge would answer neither purpose.

If the accused was to be tried for violating the tenth section, proof by her of the majority of the vendee would be of no avail, but proof of a license would be a complete defense. If she was to be tried under the twelfth section, then proof by her of a license would be of no avail, but proof of the majority of the vendee would be a complete defense. If the accused had come before the alderman and confessed the truth of the affiant's belief, the magistrate could not have judicially decided whether to impose the fine of $50 under the tenth section, or the fine of $100 under the twelfth section. If she was licensed, the latter penalty was the legal punishment, if she was unlicensed, the former penalty was prescribed; but whether she was licensed or not, neither the charge nor her confession would indicate. Such a complaint was fatally defective.

The insufficiency of the complaint being thus manifest, the defendant nevertheless contends that the certiorari was premature, because allowed before conviction, and for that reason should now be dismissed.

The rule on this subject is stated by Chief Justice Hornblower, in Hinchman v. Cook, Spen. 272, to be that "A certiorari, at the common law, goes to special and summary tribunals and brings up the whole or any part of their proceedings according to the command and exigency of the writ; and such writ may be issued before the inferior jurisdiction has consummated its authority. But a writ of error, or a certiorari substituted by statute for that writ, cannot go for part only of the record, nor before final judgment." The same rule was enunciated by the court of errors in State, Hozzey, v. City of Paterson, 10 Vroom, 489, and is therefore settled.

The theory adopted in this State, as I understand it, is that when a certiorari is used as a statutory substitute for a writ of error, it cannot legally issue until after final judgment below; when the object is to remove a cause to be continued in this court, a certiorari in criminal matters, and a habeas corpus cum causa in civil matters, is the appropriate writ, although sometimes in the latter class certiorari has been used. Chandler v. Monmouth Bank, 4 Halst. 101.

When the purpose is to review the proceedings of a special tribunal on complaint of irregular procedure in matters legally brought within its jurisdiction, a certiorari may legally issue before final decision, but ordinarily should not be allowed until then, for haply the tribunal may correct its own error in time. When the design is to reverse proceedings of special tribunals in matters not legally brought within their jurisdiction, then the writ of certiorari may legally, and ordinarily should, be allowed when asked for, either before or after final decision, because each step in such proceedings is an unlawful vexation of the party prosecuted, against which this writ is his sole protection. The discretion of this court in the allowance and dismissal of the writ, and now also with regard to costs on final judgment, affords an adequate safeguard against any abuse.

Under the rule laid down in Hinchman v. Cook, and State, Hozzey, v. City of Paterson, supra, the legality of the issuance of the present writ is clear. It was allowed, not as a statutory writ of error, but by the common law power of the court, to inquire into the acts of a special and summary tribunal, which was proceeding against the prosecutrix upon a complaint that gave it and could give it no legal authority to proceed.

In a proper sense it may be said that the magistrate had not acquired legal jurisdiction over the cause; the case was only colorably, not really, under his jurisdiction. In view of the fact that the proceedings, if carried on to a conviction, threatened an immediate and unlawful imprisonment of the prosecutrix, for which however the law, according to Grove v. Van Duyne, 15 Vroom, 654, would give her no redress, I do not think discretion was improvidently exercised in allowing the writ at the threshold. Certainly no useful result can be attained by now dismissing it.

The proceedings below should be reversed, but since no application was made to the magistrate to dismiss the complaint before suing out this writ, no costs will be awarded.

STATE, Daniel L. SAVAGE, Prosecutor,
v.
George L. COLLINS.

- *1. If, in the court for the trial of small causes, a party files a legal affidavit of the absence of a material witness out of the State, the justice may postpone the trial to a time not exceeding three months from the return day.
2. If, upon filing such affidavit, the justice adjourns to a time less than thirty days from the return day, a second adjournment cannot be legally granted the party, to a time exceeding thirty days from the return day, a further affidavit of the continuing absence of the witness not being filed.

*Head notes by PARKER, J.

3. In this case, the justice proceeded with the trial and rendered judgment after he had lost jurisdiction of the cause.

(Decided November 10, 1886.)

CERTIORARI to review a judgment of a justice of the peace in favor of plaintiff. Reversed.

Argued before Dixon, Knapp and Parker, JJ. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Barton B. Hutchinson, for prosecutor:

"The party applying for a second adjournment must make affidavit of the want of a material witness, whom he shall name, and that he thinks he can produce at a future period.

Midler v. Lazadder, 2 Green, Law, 84.

Chief Justice Kirkpatrick says, in Bisham v. Tucker, 1 Penning, 255: "They (the Legislature) intended to provide tribunals which, in these small causes, should render speedy justice, justice without procrastination or delay; and for this purpose they introduced this section" the section relating to adjournments in justice courts. The language of the statute is "to any time," not "from time to time."

Plaintiff was not obliged to obey the grand jury subpoena in derogation of his own suit and at the possible risk of losing his jurisdiction over the defendant. He would have had "a lawful and reasonable excuse" for not obeying it and could have readily purged himself from any allegation of contempt for the grand jury process.

Hurst's Case, 4 Dall. 387 (4 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 878), opinion by Justice Washington; Halsey v. Stewart, 1 South. *367; Miles v. McCullough, 1 Binn. (Pa.) 77; Cole v. Hawkins, 2 Strange, 1094. See also Revision, "Evidence," p. 379, § 18.

Plaintiff had a right to elect which course to pursue, viz.: to prosecute his suit or obey the subpoena. By obeying the subpoena he elected to abandon his cause to its fate, and should take the consequences.

Icehour v. Martin, Busb. (N. C.), 478.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On August 24, 1885, George L. Collins commenced an action by warrant, in the court for the trial of small causes, against Daniel L. Savage. Mr. Savage, when arrested, entered into recognizance to appear before the justice on the 5th day of September, 1885.

On the day last named, both parties appeared and Collins applied for an adjournment. Upon his making and filing an affidavit of the absence from the State of a material witness, the trial of the cause was postponed to the 21st day of September. On that day both parties again appeared before the justice, and Mr. Collins then applied for a further adjournment, alleging as a reason the continued absence of the witness, but not making further affidavit of the fact. Savage objected to the adjournment, but the justice granted the application and again postponed the trial to the 13th day of October, a date more than thirty days after the time of the first appearance of Savage before the justice, according to the condition of the recognizance.

In this cause, it is not necessary to decide whether the adjournment to the 13th of October would have been legal, if Collins had made an additional affidavit of the continued absence of the witness. Upon filing the affidavit of the 5th of September, the justice had the power to postpone the trial of the cause to a day not exceeding three months; but the adjourned day having been fixed for the 21st of September the justice had no power, on the strength of the original affidavit only, to further postpone the trial to a time more than thirty days from the day of the first appearance.

There was no proof before the justice on the 21st day of September that the witness was then absent from the State; and without such proof, the further postponement, if granted, should have been to a day not exceeding thirty days from the time of the appearance mentioned in the recognizance. Revision, p. 545, § 30.

On the 13th day of October, Savage again appeared before the justice, but Collins did not appear. By his appearance on the 13th of October, Savage did not waive his right to object to the adjournment to that day. If the justice had lost jurisdiction of the cause by an adjournment to a date more than thirty days after the first appearance of Savage, he did not waive any of his rights.

On the 13th of October Collins did not appear, and Savage, who was present, asked that the case be dismissed; but this was refused by the justice, and the trial was further postponed by him to the 27th day of October, on the alleged ground that Collins had informed him that he could not attend on the 13th of October, because he had been subpoenaed to attend on that day before the grand jury of Mercer County as a witness.

On the 27th day of October, Savage did not appear but Collins was present, and a trial was had which resulted in a judgment against Savage.

It is clear that at the time of the trial and the rendering of the judgment the justice had not jurisdiction of the cause.

The judgment is reversed, with costs.

RULE to show cause why a verdict in favor of plaintiff should not be set aside and a new trial granted, in an action to recover damages for a personal injury caused by alleged negligence of defendant. New trial granted.

Argued before Beasley, Ch. J., and Depue, Van Syckel and Knapp, JJ.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Vredenburg & Garretson, for defendant.

Mr. James Fleming, for plaintiff:

The employer contracts with his employee to use reasonable diligence to protect him from unnecessary risks. The omission is negligence for which employer is liable.

Harrison v. Central R. R. Co. 2 Vroom, 293.

Where plaintiff charges defendant with negligence in introducing a new explosive without informing plaintiff fully of its dangerous character, held, defendant is liable.

Smith v. Oxford Iron Co. 18 Vroom, 467.

If the master knows, or would have known had he used ordinary diligence, that the buildings or materials he provides are unsafe, he is certainly answerable for all injuries caused thereby.

Ryan v. Fowler, 24 N. Y. 410; Keegan v. W. R. R. Corp. 8 N. Y. 175; Cayzer v. Taylor, 10 Gray, 274; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 93, 95, 97.

This case is within the rule laid down in Paulmier v. Erie R. R. Co. 5 Vroom, 153.

When the servant, in obedience to the master, incurs the risk of machinery which, although dangerous, is not so much so as to threaten immediate injury, or if it is reasonably probable that it may be used safely by extraordinary caution, the master is liable for a resulting accident.

Patterson v. Pittsburg etc. R. R. Co. 76 Pa. 389.

Plaintiff will not be nonsuited unless, on his own showing, he has been guilty of negligence.

Bonnell v. Del. Lack. & West. R. R. Co. 10 Vroom, 189.

A master is bound to take ordinary and reasonable care not to subject his servant to unreasonable or extraordinary dangers by sending him to work in dangerous buildings or dangerous premises.

Thomp. Neg. 972, 973.

Generally the servant only takes the risks of what may fairly be denominated seen dangers. Thomp. Neg. 980, § 9.

It is but another expression of rules already announced to say that if the negligence of the master combines with the negligence of the fellow servant, and the two contribute to the injury, the servant injured may recover damages of the master.

Thomp. Neg. 981, § 10.

It is negligence to use cars dangerous in construction, when there are others to be used not dangerous.

St. Louis etc. R. R. Co. v. Valirius, 56 Ind. 511, 512.

It was for the omission to observe the dangerous appearances and to adopt suitable means of protection that defendant is liable. Plaintiff had a right to rely upon the master's adopting suitable means of protection.

Pantzar v. Tilly Foster Iron Min. Co. 99 N. Y. 368.

When a servant receives an injury in part by the negligence of his master and in part by that of a fellow servant, he can maintain an action against the master for such injury.

Company held liable to engineer for negligence of the conductor of train.

Chicago etc. R. Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 377 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 787).

Stills of insufficient strength constructed under president; company liable.

Ardesco Oil Co. v. Gilson, 63 Pa. 146.

Conductor injured by insufficient side track; company liable.

Patterson v. Pittsburg etc. R. R. Co. 76 Pa. 389.

Cook v. Hannibal & St. Jo. R. R. Co. 63 Mo. 397.

Common laborer injured by negligence of conductor; company liable.

Chicago etc. R. R. Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205.

If the defendant has by his own act thrown the plaintiff off his guard, and given him good reason to believe that vigilance was not needed, the lack of such vigilance on the part of the plaintiff is no bar to his claim for damages.

Fowler v. Baltimore etc. R. R. Co. 18 W. Va. 588; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 28; Ernst v. Hud. Riv. R. R. Co. 35 N. Y. 9; Newson v. New York Cent. R. R. Co. 29 N. Y. 883.

The negligence of plaintiff which will defeat his recovery must be a proximate cause of the injury; and the act must be one which he could reasonably anticipate would result in his injury.

Fowler v. Baltimore etc. R. R. Co. 18 W. Va. 579.

Contributory negligence is not imputable to a person for failing to look out for danger, when under the surrounding circumstances the person sought to be charged with it had no reason to suspect that danger was to be apprehended.

Langan v. St. Louis etc. R. Co. 72 Mo. 392.

The age, intelligence and experience of one who has suffered from an injury, help to determine whether he has been guilty of contributory negligence, so that the jury may ascertain whether he fully understood and appreciated the danger.

Swoboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 420.

Notice and warning is necessary to be given to minors engaged about machinery or dangerous structures.

The same remark applies to servants whose grade of intelligence or education is not such as to enable them to detect a defect with which the master, from the fact that he must operate the machinery in which the defect exists, is or ought to be familiar.

Whart. Neg. § 216; Noyes v. Smith, 28 Vt. 59.

Whether or not the servant was in the course of his employment is to be inferred from circumstances and is for the jury.

When there is doubt whether the employee was requested or ought to have made himself acquainted with the risks, the question of his negligence in this respect is for the jury.

Whart. Neg. § 217; Huddleston v. Lowell Machine Shop, 106 Mass. 282.

Plaintiff may recover, not only the amount of damage which he suffered prior to suit but all injury to verdict and what it is reasonably certain he will suffer after.

Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 597, 606.

A widow, although she dies, is entitled to dower according to her expectancy of life and not by actual value as determined by length of life.

McLaughlin v. McLaughlin, 7 C. E. Green, 506.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is instituted by the administratrix of George Collyer, deceased, to recover damages for injury inflicted upon the decedent in his lifetime, by the alleged negligence of the defendant. The death of the decedent was not produced by the injury. Our statute has saved the right of action to his personal representative. Collyer was in the employ of the defendant Company and was injured by the falling of a sliding door in the Company's store at the foot of Laight Street in the City of New York.

The plaintiff insists that the injury resulted from the negligent and unskillful manner in which the door was constructed, and from the careless manner in which the door was handled at the time of the accident.

A master is bound to take reasonable care and precaution to guard his servants against danger. If he fails to exercise reasonable skill in furnishing machinery or buildings for the use of his servants while in his service, he is responsible for the consequent damage.

He cannot claim immunity upon the ground that he has exercised due care in selecting mechanics of competent skill in the construction of such machinery and buildings, but assumes the burden of seeing that such mechanics actually exercised reasonable care and skill in the execution of their work. The evidence shows that this door was constructed with ordinary skill, and that the injury was caused by the careless and negligent manner in which the door was opened by the man who had charge of it.

The evidence also is that the Company exercised due care in the selection of these servants.

If Collyer at the time of the injury was lawfully in the vicinity of the building in the course of his employment, he was a fellow servant with the men whose negligence inflicted the injury upon him; and he therefore cannot recover.

If he was there as a trespasser or by sufferance, no duty with respect to him rested upon the Company, except to refrain from acts willfully injurious. He assumed all the ordinary risk incident to the character of the place, and is without remedy. Vanderbeck v. Hendry, 5 Vroom, 467.

The verdict should be set aside, and a new trial granted.

ON demurrer to declaration in an action of contract, to recover fees and other compensation collected by defendant as county clerk of Camden County. Demurrer sustained.

Argued before Beasley, Ch. J., and Depue, Van Syckel and Knapp, JJ.

The question is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Jonas S. Miller and D. J. Pancoast, for plaintiff.

Messrs. Thos. B. Harned and Garrison & French, for defendant.

*Head note by VAN SYCKEL, J.

†The Act of 1874 is as follows:

Be it enacted, By the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That the clerk of the County of Camden shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum for his services as clerk of the criminal and civil courts of said county; which sum is to be paid to him in quarterly payments by the collector of said county, and is to be in lieu of all fees, costs and compensation now allowed him in the said courts, and all fees, costs and compensation that said clerk is now entitled by law to receive shall be taxed in all bills of costs the same as are now taxed, and shall be collected by the sheriff of said County of Camden, and be by him paid over to the collector of said county for the use of the said county.

The Act of 1880 is as follows:

Be it enacted, By the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That in all the counties of this State, as to which it is now or shall hereafter be provided by law that the compensation of the county clerks shall be by annual salary, the said salary shall be in lieu of all fees, costs or other remuneration or compensation whatsoever, for any and all services required to be performed by said clerks, and shall be paid to said clerks in quarterly payments by the collectors of said counties, respectively; and all fees, costs and compensations that are now allowed said clerks for services in the courts of said counties shall be taxed in all bills of costs the same as they are now taxed, and shall be in each county collected by the sheriff, and be by him paid over to the county collector for the use of the county; and the fees now allowed by law for all other services rendered by the said clerks shall be by them collected and paid over to said collectors respectively.

The Act of 1884 is in all matters similar to the Act of 1880 above, save that the words "said clerk" are substituted in place of the word "sheriff" (italicized in that statute.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The right of the plaintiff to maintain this suit rests upon the Act of March 6, 1884, and the Act of March 11, 1890. Laws 1884, p. 58, and Laws 1890, p. 247.

The classification adopted by the Legislature in both these Acts is based upon the Act of March 17, 1874 (p. 280).

In Gibbs v. Morgan, and Ernst v. Morgan, 12 Stew. 126, 391, such classification was held to be vicious. The view taken by the chancellor was concurred in by the court of errors and appeals in reviewing the case last cited. 18 Stew. 733.

The Act of 1890, to which the Act of 1884 is a supplement, applies only to counties in which the compensation to the clerk is by annual salary. Camden County alone is within the operation of its provisions.

The judgment of the court of last resort in Ernst v. Morgan was that the fact that in Camden County the clerk was paid by annual salary did not furnish sufficient ground for the exclusive legislation.

The case under consideration cannot be distinguished.

The plaintiff's action cannot be supported.

STATE, Ichabod AYRES, Prosecutor,
v.
Board of POLICE COMMISSIONERS OF NEWARK et al.

- * 1. A charge against a policeman for incapacity, based on the report of the examining physician and made by the direction of the commissioners, is, for good cause and in proper form, within Statutes May 2, 1885 (L. p. 326), March 25, 1885 (L. p. 163), February 23, 1886 (L. p. 48).
2. A reasonable notice and a fair hearing and investigation, without formality in the procedure, are all that is required.
3. The court on certiorari will not weigh the evidence. It is sufficient if there is a legal and substantial basis for removal, on which the commissioners acted, within their authority.
4. Police officers, serving under the appointment and authority of the board of police commissioners, are not in position to question the constitutionality of the Act constituting the board, on certiorari.

(Decided November 13, 1886.)

CERTIORARI to review proceedings of the Board of Police Commissioners of Newark, removing prosecutor from the police force. Writ dismissed.

Argued before Magie and Scudder, JJ.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. Frank Fort, for prosecutor:

There are only four grounds of removal of a policeman by the authorities of a municipality: 1, incapacity; 2, misconduct; 3, nonresidence; 4, disobedience of just rules and regulations established.

* Head notes by SCUDDER, J.

N. J.

Laws 1885, p. 163, § 1.

Section 5 of the Act of 1885 (Laws 1885, p. 163) provides that no removals shall occur except for "just cause," as provided in the first section; then only after written charge or charges of the cause or causes of complaint shall have been preferred against any such officer, etc., signed by the person making such charge.

This does not mean that a policeman may be placed on trial in any other way than on a bona fide complaint signed, by the voluntary act of some one alleging just cause to place him upon a defense under the grounds enumerated in Act 1885, p. 163, § 1.

The Act under which the respondents were appointed is unconstitutional. It makes eligibility to the office of police commissioner depend upon the political belief of the person appointed.

By our Constitution it is provided in article 1, § 4: "No religious test shall be required as a qualification for any office or public trust."

By article 1, section 2, it is declared: "All political power is inherent in the people."

By article 1, section 19, it is provided: "This enumeration of the rights and privileges shall not be construed to impair or deny others retained by the people."

Again; this Act is unconstitutional in this: that it is in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which provides:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States."

In Barker v. People, 3 Cow. 686, it is held that "Eligibility to office belongs equally to all persons whomsoever, not excluded by the Constitution."

"When neither by Constitution nor statute are the qualifications for office prescribed, anyone is eligible who possesses the right of franchise."

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 748.

"A statute would not be constitutional which should proscribe a class or a party for opinion's sake, or which should select particular individuals from a class or locality, and subject them to peculiar rules or impose upon them special obligations or burdens, from which others in the same locality or class are exempt."

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 483.

"Courts will take judicial notice of the electors being divided into parties; and if one of them is proscribed by a name familiarly applied to it by its opponents, the inference that it is done because of political opinion seems conclusive." Id.

Baltimore v. State, 15 Md. 376.

In Michigan an Act on principle a counterpart of the law here questioned was declared unconstitutional.

Atty-Gen. v. Detroit, 58 Mich. 213.

Mr. Joseph Coult, for defendants.

Scudder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The state of the case agreed on by counsel shows these facts: that the Police Commissioners of the City of Newark were appointed by the mayor and their appointment confirmed by the council, under the "Act to remove the fire and police departments in the cities of this State from political control," approved May 2, 1885 (Laws, 326); which Act was adopted by a vote of the city as therein required; that of the four Commissioners two were selected from each of the two political parties which had cast and polled the greatest number of votes at the last preceding municipal election, and had the other qualifications required by the Act; that the prosecutor was appointed a policeman by the common council, prior to the statute; that a charge and specification in writing was made by the Chief of Police, April 29, 1886; that the prosecutor, patrolman Ichabod Ayres, was incapacitated for duty, because on examination by the police surgeon he was found to be almost totally deaf in the left ear, the left eye to have very imperfect vision, and on account of his general physique and age. Upon this charge he was dismissed.

The eighth section, in the second clause, says: "And the said board of police commissioners shall be fully authorized and empowered to designate, appoint or approve all the policemen or other persons employed in the police department of such city; and said respective boards shall have full power and right to suspend and to expel or discharge any person employed in or under the department under the control of such board, provided good cause shall be shown for such suspension, expulsion or discharge after an investigation by such board."

A power to remove an officer "for cause" can be exercised only for good cause, and after the officer has had an opportunity for defense. State, Haight, v. Love, 10 Vroom, 14.

What in legislative intention is good cause for such suspension, expulsion or discharge, will be found in a statute, in pari materia, passed at the same session of the Legislature (March 25, 1885, Laws, 163, § 1; amended by Act of February 23, 1886, Laws, 48), entitled, "An Act Respecting Police Departments of Cities, and Regulating the Tenure and Terms of Officers and Men Employed in Said Departments."

The amendatory Act does not change the section in this particular; and both say that "No person shall be removed from office or employment in the police department of any city, or from the police force of any city, for political reasons, or for any other cause than incapacity, misconduct, nonresidence, or disobedience of just rules and regulations established or which may be established for the police force or police department of such city."

Within these terms of the law the specific charge against the prosecutor would be incapacity, and no other cause of discharge appears in the facts of the case.

The first reason assigned for reversal is that the charge was not made by the Chief of Police on his own motion, or voluntarily, but by the direction of the Commissioners. This officer in his testimony states his position very distinctly. He says: "I simply acted my part in the law, in formulating the charge. I made the charges on the certificate of the physician and by the direction of the Commissioners."

There is no objection to this action by the Chief of Police and the Board of Commissioners. Their proceeding was a mere form to put the charge in shape for a proper investigation; not voluntarily and without assigning good cause, but in the discharge of their official duty, and for a cause based upon the report of the examining physician of the Board.

Another reason assigned is that the prosecutor was not served with a statement of the grounds of the charges, and no proper notice of the substance thereof. The later Statute of May 2, 1885, is silent as to the procedure for removal or discharge of a policeman from his employment; but section 5 of the Act of March 25, 1885, is particular in the requirement of a written charge of the cause of complaint signed by the person making such charge, filed in the office of the department; a public examination into the charge by the appropriate municipal board; reasonable notice; a fair trial and every reasonable opportunity to make his defense, if he has any or chooses to make one.

A fair trial does not mean that all the formalities shall be observed that are used in the trial of criminals for minor offenses in courts or by magistrates. The policeman under charges is not regarded by this statute as a criminal, but a public agent or servant whose efficiency and fitness for the discharge of his duties may be questioned at any time in the interest of the public; and no mere forms tending to chicanery and delay rather than substantial justice should be regarded. The purpose of the law is to secure the services of reliable men, to preserve the public peace, and not to keep inefficient and litigious men in office until all the forms of criminal cases are observed, and every ingenious objection answered. See State, Devault, v. Camden [ante, 82], June Term, 1886.

Notice in writing was given to the prosecutor on May 4, of hearing on May 8, to be present with witnesses, and the charge stated—of being incapacitated for duty. He appeared with counsel at the time and place specified in the notice; made no objection to the notice; the charge with specifications was read to him and he pleaded to it, not guilty; witnesses were produced, examined and cross examined by both parties. At the close of the examination all the Commissioners voted that he be removed, for incapacity. There was a fair trial within the terms of the statute. High, Extr. Rem. § 411; Rex v. Wilton, 2 Salk. 428; S. C. 5 Mod. 257.

The testimony showed that he was about sixty years old; that he was partially deaf and had imperfect sight in one eye; and the Chief of Police testified that a man having those infirmities is not a proper person for a police officer. It was, however, also proved that he was a man of good habits; that there were no complaints against him and that he had properly discharged his duties. This court will not weigh the evidence on these facts. It is sufficient that there was a legal and substantial basis shown for his removal, upon which the Commissioners acted within their authority. This disposes of the next reason assigned: that the evidence did not justify the removal.

The other reasons relate to the constitutionality of the Act appointing commissioners of police. The Act respecting police departments of cities and regulating the tenure of office of officers and men employed in said departments, above cited, has been passed on in State, Fitzgerald, v. New Brunswick, 18 Vroom, 479 [S. C. 1 Cent. Rep. 457], affirmed in the Court of Errors and Appeals at June Term, 1886. Its constitutionality was sustained on the exceptions taken.

The other Act, to remove the fire and police departments in the cities of this State from political control, is now challenged. The further question is presented whether the Legislature has the power to say that of the four Commissioners to be nominated by the mayor and confirmed by the council, "two shall be selected from each of the two political parties which shall have cast or polled the greatest number of votes at the last preceding municipal election," and whether it can designate classes of citizens from which public offices shall be filled. But this prosecutor is not in a position to raise this disputed point. As in the Fitzgerald Case and others he might contest the authority to remove and retain officers, the formalities to be observed and the constitutionality of the Act under which such authority was given; but the objection here made strikes at the official existence of the Board of Commissioners, and the judgment of this court which is sought against them would in effect be an ouster from their office, by collateral proceeding. It would even go farther and vacate the office which the prosecutor claims that he still holds; for after the enactment of this law he submitted himself to the authority of these Commissioners for one year without objection, and, in the language of the eighth section of the Act, the Commissioners, being fully authorized and empowered, "designated, appointed and approved" him, as one of the policemen or persons employed in the police department of the city.

He was already employed, and they continued his employment as if they had again appointed him.

While, on this statement, he might be a policeman de facto, he would not be such de jure, if his position that there is not a legal Board of Commissioners is correct. He cannot dispute its legal existence, without determining his own; and the inconsistency of his attempt to annul the law is apparent. The question suggested might be raised as in Worthley v. Steen, 14 Vroom, 542, by the Commissioners themselves if, on refusal to act, the attempt were made to compel them by mandamus; but if they continue to act under an alleged writ or unconstitutional Act appointing them, the remedy must be by direct proceeding, and quo warranto. State v. Paterson, 8 Vroom, 177; State v. Tolan, 4 Vroom, 195; State, Hoeg, v. Collector of Ocean Township, 10 Vroom, 75-79.

The writ will be dismissed, with costs.

PUBLIC ROAD BOARD of the Township

that the road board shall decide and determine upon the necessity of a proposed improvement in roads. Their decision must show that they did so decide and determine in exercising their special statutory authority.

(Decided November 12, 1886.)

CERTIORARI to review proceedings on opening an extension of Central Avenue. Proceedings vacated.

Argued before Scudder and Magie, JJ.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. T. McGill, for prosecutor.

Mr. C. H. Voorhis, for defendants.

Scudder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The proceedings brought up for review in this case were taken on the application of twelve freeholders in the Township of Ridgefield, in the County of Bergen, under section 8 of the Act concerning roads in the Township of Hackensack (Laws 1870, p. 8); § 4, Supplement (Laws 1871, p. 1507); and the further Supplement (Laws 1874, p. 579).

The Public Road Board of the Township of Ridgefield having made their decision, award and assessment for laying out and opening an extension of Central Avenue, through the lands of the prosecutor and others, this certiorari is brought to set aside these proceedings, for alleged irregularities.

There are thirty reasons assigned for reversing the action of the Road Board, founded on the complex and difficult provisions of these different statutes. Fortunately, we may stop at the first reason without examining the others which seem to be of minor importance. The section (8) above referred to, in the original Act, which is continued in the supplement, requires that "The said Board shall decide and determine upon the necessity of such proposed improvement, and if the said Board shall decide and determine in favor thereof they shall make their decision in writing, etc."

Section 4 of the Supplement of 1871 adds to the former Act that, after hearing "The commissioners shall appoint a committee of their number to examine the route of the proposed road, and to report upon the feasibility and advisability of the same, and what changes, if any, shall be made therein; and thereupon the said Board shall decide and determine upon the necessity of said proposed improvement, etc.," as in the prior Act.

The Act of 1874 does not change these requirements. In examining the decision in writing returned with the writ, we find that a committee was appointed; that they reported that it was feasible and advisable to lay out and open said road without any changes. "And the said Board did then decide in favor of such improvement of laying out and opening the said road, etc." The important omission is that it does not appear that the Board did decide and determine upon the necessity of such proposed improvement.

The decision and determination by them that the proposed improvement is necessary is made the basis of further proceeding, and it is therefore essential that it should appear on the face of their decision in writing. The Board having only a special statutory authority for taking land for public roads, and assessing damages and benefits therefor, every essential requirement of the law conferring this extraordinary power must appear to have been observed. State, Semon, v. Trenton, 18 Vroom, 489 [S. C. ante, 80].

For this reason the proceedings are set aside and vacated, without costs.

Common Council of GLOUCESTER CITY.

* Section 8 of the Charter of Gloucester City (Laws 1868, p. 106), gives to the Common Council power to pass ordinances for appointing watchmen, constables and an additional police force, and prescribing their powers and duties. They have never passed such ordinance. Held, that the prosecutor, who was appointed a policeman by resolution, is not entitled to notice of removal and hearing, under Act of March 25, 1885, respecting police departments of cities, and regulating the tenure and terms of office.

(Decided November 13, 1886.)

CERTIORARI to review proceedings of the Common Council of Gloucester City, removing prosecutor from the police force. Writ dismissed.

Argued before Scudder and Magie, JJ.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. A. Drake, for prosecutor.

Mr. James E. Hays, for defendant.

Scudder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At a meeting of the Common Council of Gloucester City, held March 25, 1884, a resolution was passed that the prosecutor and three others be elected policemen for the ensuing year. On March 24, 1885, a like resolution was passed. On August 13, 1885, a resolution was passed changing the police force, and another person was appointed policeman instead of the prosecutor. He had no notice or hearing on such removal.

He claims in this suit that under the "Act respecting police departments of cities, and regulating the tenure and terms of office of officers and men employed in said departments," passed March 25, 1885, he could only be removed for just cause, on notice and hearing as provided in section 5 of that Act. This is undoubtedly his right, if he is within the provisions of this Act. State, Fitzgerald, v. New Brunswick, 18 Vroom, 479 [S. C. 1 Cent. Rep. 457].

By section 8 of the charter of Gloucester City (Laws 1868, p. 106), among the powers given, it is enacted "That it shall and may be lawful for the Common Council of said City, or a quorum thereof in council convened, to pass all ordinances for appointing watchmen, constables and additional police, and prescribing their powers and duties."

The Common Council never has passed an ordinance for this purpose. The resolutions, therefore, by which the prosecutor was appointed a policeman were irregular and not within the power granted by the charter. The power is conferred to appoint; but the manner in which that power shall be exercised is prescribed, and the consequence is that such mode must be pursued. Cross v. Mayor of Morristown, 3 C. E. Green, 305-309; Ridgeway v. Michellon, 18 Vroom, 405.

Being thus appointed without authority and irregularly, he was removable at the discretion of council, unless protected by the Act of March 25, 1885. By the terms of that Act, those within its protection are officers and men employed by municipal authority in the police department of any city. Where there is no municipal authority shown for their employment, and there is no police department legally constituted, the Act does not apply.

There is no remedy given by this statute for the removal of the prosecutor; and the writ will be dismissed, with costs.

STATE, George W. ARNETT et al., Prosecutors,
v.

The Mayor and Common Council of the City of LAMBERTVILLE.

1. After the lapse of sixteen years, proceedings to open a street will not be reviewed on certiorari, for failure of the return to show notice of the ordinance and an award of damages.

2. The lack of notice will not be presumed from the silence of the return; and if damages have not been paid, the remedy will be, not to set aside the ordinance but to compel the City to take the requisite steps to make compensation.

(Decided November 5, 1886.)

CERTIORARI to bring up the proceedings of the Common Council of the City of Lambertville, in opening Washington Street over and upon lands of Cornelius Arnett, now deceased. Writ dismissed.

Argued before Scudder and Magie, JJ.

The return to the writ shows:

1. The ordinance laying out Washington Street, approved January 10, 1870.

2. A petition of citizens presented to the common council May 4, 1884, asking that the street be opened and graded as provided for in the said ordinance. This petition was referred to a committee and no action taken.

3. A petition of citizens interested, presented May 11, 1885, asking that measures be taken to open Washington Street for public travel. This was signed by Cornelius Arnett, and was referred to a committee.

4. The committee, June 8, 1885, reported that they had had the street surveyed; that the distance is 900 feet, and the rise is 95 feet, being 1½ inches to the foot; that the cost of opening would be about $900; that the principal advantage would be to the Hill School; that it would be an improvement; and recommending that the work be done.

5. At the same meeting the clerk was instructed to give the necessary notice of the intention to make the road as recommended, the said notice to be in accordance with the city charter.

6. A notice was published June 12, 1885, that the common council intended to open Washington Street, in accordance with the ordinance of January 10, 1870, and requiring persons objecting to present their objections in writing in ten days.

7. At a meeting September 21, 1885, the street committee was directed to proceed to open Washington Street or so much of it, this year, as in its judgment it may think best. This discretion was adopted by a vote of five to four.

Mr. Walter F. Hayhurst, for prosecutors:

The prosecutors object to the proceedings for the following reasons:

1. Because no notice was given or published as required by the charter of the City of Lambertville, approved April 13, 1868, before the passage of the ordinance brought up by this writ.

By "An Act to revise and amend the charter of the City of Lambertville" P. L. 1868, p. 951, § 49, subd. 1, the common council was given the power to lay out, accept and open any street, etc. But by section 50 it was provided that no ordinance should be adopted by the common council for making any improvement or performing any work under and by virtue of the last preceding section, until public notice be given of the intention of the common council to cause such work to be done, etc. No such notice was published until long after said ordinance was passed.

2. Because after the passage of said ordinance no effort was made to treat with the owners of land to be taken for the street laid out by the said ordinance, and no conveyance of the said land was taken from the owners thereof, nor were commissioners appointed as required by sections 52 and 53 of the charter.

3. Because no compensation whatever was made for the land belonging to these prosecutors, which was to be taken for the use of the said public street.

By the reading of the said charter (P. L. 1868, p. 951, § 52) it is clearly the contemplation of said Act that reasonable compensation be made for lands taken; and if agreement cannot be reached and conveyance obtained, section 53 and following sections indicate the course that must be pursued by the said council.

Section 18 of "an Act concerning roads" (Rev. p. 1000) only applies to "such public roads or highways" as are laid out in accordance with this Act.

4. Because no provision was made for compensation for the damage that would have been done to the adjacent land of these prosecutors by the grading of said street.

5. Because the resolution adopted September 21, 1885, was not a direction that the street be opened in accordance with the ordinance above referred to, in that the ordinance directs the opening of the whole of Washington Street, while the resolution leaves it at the discretion of the street committee to open the whole or a part of said street.

6. Because the proceedings in accordance with the ordinance and resolutions above referred to would be the taking of private property for public use without any compensation whatever and in violation of the Constitution of the State of New Jersey.

Mr. Skillman, for Lambertville.

Memorandum, per Curiam:

What interest prosecutors have in the proceedings brought up by this writ does not appear. No testimony has been taken and the court is left in ignorance whether they own land taken for or affected by the public street in question, or only have such interest as any citizen may have therein. Indeed there is nothing to show that they are citizens. It may be inferred from an admission made in argument that they represent one Cornelius Arnett, who, in a petition appearing in the return, represented himself to be a citizen of Lambertville.

But assuming that prosecutors have some right to call for a review of these proceedings, they have been examined.

The ordinance attacked was passed nearly sixteen years before this certiorari issued.

The contention that it must be set aside because no notice was given of the intention to pass it cannot prevail. Such a notice was required by the charter. In the absence of any requirement, notice to persons interested must have been given. If either the charter notice or personal notice to prosecutors (or those whom they represent) was given, or knowledge of this ordinance was acquired by prosecutors (or those whom they represent) at the time of its passage, this certiorari was improvidently issued. The delay would be accounted laches.

Whether prosecutors must excuse this laches by proof that there was no such notice or knowledge acquired, or whether upon such proof a public ordinance may be attacked, after so long a lapse of time, need not be settled. There is no such proof. No evidence having been taken, express proof is wanting. The lack of notice will not be implied because the return is silent on the subject.

If the writ had been directed to the City by its corporate name, the return would be presumed to give the whole record called for, including whatever was in the custody of its officers. Woodbridge v. State, Allen, 14 Vroom, 262; State, Davis, v. Harrison, 17 Vroom, 79.

It is issued to the Mayor and Common Council. The return is by the Common Council. The presumption only is that it contains their proceedings. But the publication of such notices was required to be made by the city clerk; no record of them is required to be put in the council proceedings. Under such circumstances lack of notice is not to be presumed. Nor, under this writ, is the Corporation representing the public bound to defend public rights by proof of due notice.

The objections, that no proceedings to condemn lands taken or to compensate for injury to be inflicted by grading are shown, are (as applied to the ordinance) simply frivolous. Compensation for lands taken or injuries done is to be made by proceedings subsequent to the ordinance. If not made, the remedy of parties aggrieved is, not to set aside the ordinance but to compel the city to take the requisite steps to make compensation.

The only remaining question is directed to a resolution of the Common Council in respect to opening the street.

In the absence of proof that this Act can do any injury to prosecutors it ought not to be adjudicated upon. It is capable of a construction not inconsistent with the requirements of the charter.

It is proper to add for the information of counsel (who seemed to think that other questions were raised by this record) that an examination of the charter indicates that the right to use the land (covered by the ordinance) as a public street must depend not only on the ordinance but upon the circumstances or the further action of the City. Unless the land has been dedicated to public use as a highway the City must proceed to treat for and purchase the right to use it, or to condemn it in the manner prescribed by the charter.

There is nothing to justify any indication of opinion as to the right to damages for an injury to be done by grading this street.

The writ must be dismissed, with costs.

Re CONTEMPT OF Cumberland County Oyer and Terminer, by John CHEESMAN.

- *1. The superior courts of this State, modeled after the English Courts of Common Law, have authority to punish summarily for any words uttered, by speech, by writing or by printing outside of the regular course of litigation, which are designed to bring contempt upon the courts in the exercise of their judicial functions, or to pervert, in a pending cause, the due administration of justice.
2. The jurisdictional facts necessary to legalize a conviction for contempt in the superior courts of law are: first, that matters constituting a contempt should appear to the court to be true; second, that the party charged with contempt should have a fair opportunity to confess or deny those matters; third, that he should confess their truth. Outside of these facts, the steps to be taken are matters of practice only; and although a regular course of procedure has been established, yet strict conformity to it may be waived by the person accused.
3. A conviction for contempt may be sustained, although there was no affidavit preliminary to the rule to show cause, no writ of attachment was issued, and no interrogatories were presented.
4. On appeal from a conviction for contempt under the Statute of 1884, p. 219, this court will not consider the general policy of punishing such contempts as that of which the appellant is guilty. If, according to the law and the facts, the judgment appealed from is lawful and just, it will be affirmed.

(Decided November 6, 1886.)

*Head notes by DIXON, J.

A PPEAL from an order of the Cumberland Oyer and Terminer, adjudging appellant guilty of a contempt in publishing certain articles in his newspaper. Affirmed.

Argued before Depue, Reed and Dixon, JJ. The grand jury of Cumberland County, at the January Term, 1884, of the Court of Oyer and Terminer for said county, returned two true bills against John Cheesman, one for a libel upon one James L. Vansyckel, and the other for an assault and battery upon the said Vansyckel. The indictment for assault and battery was moved for trial at the January Term, 1885; but on account of a disagreement of the jury they were discharged, and both indictments being pending undetermined, the said John Cheesman, who was the editor and publisher of "The New Jersey Patriot," a newspaper published in Cumberland County, published in the issue of January 30, 1886, of said paper, an article, the following paragraphs of which are alleged to constitute the contempt with which he is charged:

"On this point we have no hesitation whatever in saying we honestly believe the grand jury, at the term of court in January, 1884, was packed by Sheriff Husted; and we have no hesitation in saying, further, that we believe it was corruptly packed and for a corrupt purpose."

"We say, further, that men were on that jury who were our openly avowed enemies, and have openly expressed a desire to do us harm; we say further that the sheriff knew of these things, and that in at least one instance he was advised by an officer of the court that a certain man should by no means be summoned to serve on the grand jury, and that notwithstanding this, this same man was summoned; another of the grand jurors bore upon him wounds which were yet fresh, received at the hands of an injured husband, while we believe that several more were of such character that even their judicial oath would not prevent their acting unjustly towards us."

"Instead of disarming and beating him, [meaning Vansyckel] Cheesman would have been justified in defending himself and his castle, in killing the intruding assailant through the exercise of the law of self defense, the first law of nature: self preservation. This he had the courage and coolness to refrain from doing, and hence he has been sustained and sympathized with by the community and court, with the sole exception of the judge, who is, we are sorry to say, and with how much reason we cannot say, charged with personal animus in the matter. We are loth to believe this, and in the absence of direct evidence we will not believe it, preferring to believe that an honest and honorable judge would not seek to gratify personal spleen in the discharge of public duty."

"The mistake the armed belligerent made was in visiting the sanctum; the mistake (in the eye of the law it seems) the editor made was in not killing his assailant. His plea of self defense would have saved him from the penalty attached to killing; and a dead man could not have sued him for assault and battery, nor the court charged against him for the limited means of self defense used in simply disarming an infuriated man."

"Judge Alfred Reed may know more law than Cheesman; and he knows furthermore, by this time, that in trying to secure the conviction of an editor who deserves credit instead of censure for the course he pursued at a critical time, he has placed himself in a position in which he will be and should be criticised, aside from any consideration of whatever motive may have impelled him to do so. It looks too much like 'standing by' one profession to the detriment of another; sustaining a law-violating lawyer, instead of a law-respecting editor."

Mr. William E. Potter, with Mr. William A. Logue, for appellant:

This appeal is taken pursuant to the Act of the Legislature entitled, "An Act Providing for the Review of Convictions and Judgments for Contempt of Court," approved April 17, 1884, P. L. 1884, pp. 219-220.

The statute is of recent enactment and novel in its character in respect of the system of jurisprudence in this State. This is the first appeal which has been taken under it. A brief examination of its provisions, therefore, will be perhaps useful.

The statute is in two sections. The first section consists of a mandatory declaration "That hereafter every summary conviction and judgment by any court, inferior in its jurisdiction to the supreme court, except an orphans' court, for a contempt against its own dignity, peace and good, shall be reviewable, both on the law and the facts, by the supreme court; and every such conviction and judgment by the orphans' court shall be reviewable in the same way and manner by the prerogative court."

Section 2 of the statute delineates the method of procedure upon the appeal.

It provides "That every conviction and judgment shall upon the petition prescribed be, by the court wherein such conviction is had, immediately certified and sent to the supreme court or to the prerogative court as the case may require, to which the same shall be certified and sent, together with the petition of appeal and all proceedings touching the conviction and judgment, and which said court shall be invested with jurisdiction and required to rehear the matter of contempt upon which the conviction was founded, both upon the law and upon the facts, which shall be inquired into and ascertained by depositions or in such other way or manner as the court above shall direct; and it shall be required to give such judgment in the premises as to it shall seem to be lawful and just under all the circumstances of the case, to be enforced in such way and manner as it shall order and direct."

There is an additional provision providing for a supersedeas of all further proceedings in the court below, pending the appeal.

It is evident that the statute is intended to formulate a method for a trial de novo of the subject matter of the contempt both upon the law and the facts. The jurisdiction of the court in this case therefore, upon both of these questions, is substituted for that of the court below, as is also in like manner its discretion.

The provisions of the statute as to inquiry into the facts have in this case been complied with by the certificate of the court below, which certifies the appeal as here presented "to be a full and complete state of the case."

I. I shall endeavor to discuss here two questions:

1. Had the court below, or has this court, under the laws of this State, jurisdiction under any circumstances, to punish by summary conviction as for a constructive contempt, when the subject matter of the alleged contempt is the publication in a newspaper of an article in respect of the court, sheriff or grand jury, critical or contemptuous in matter and style, which publication concerns a judicial proceeding at the time thereof pending and undetermined?

2. Conceding such jurisdiction under some circumstances, are the proceedings of the court appealed from, upon the law and the facts here presented, such as should be reversed upon this appeal?

The first question involves an inquiry into the power of the courts to hear and determine, and therefore to punish, a constructive contempt of the character described; and as it concerns the liberties of the people, and is thus a question of civil liberty of the highest nature, I feel confident that this court will give it the full and careful consideration which its importance demands. I regard it, not as the court below viewed it, nor as the English Courts of Common Law since the beginning of this century have treated it, as a legal question only, but as of much higher import, a politico-legal question.

What therefore is the nature, form, method and extent of the jurisdiction of our courts to summarily convict and punish the citizen as for a contempt?

In countries possessed of Anglo-Saxon civil liberty it is the sole surviving remnant of despotic power. All other powers of despotism having their origin in brute force, in the progress of our race, and through our written constitutions and laws framed upon them, have been swept away. Being despotic, this power radically and necessarily is hostile to and conflicts with all the great safeguards of our constitutional freedom.

It dispenses with a grand jury.

It convicts without the intervention of a petit jury.

It violates the fundamental principle that no judge shall try a cause in which he has a personal interest.

It makes the judge, who is the injured and therefore the offended party, at once the person who makes the accusation, defines the crime, furnishes the evidence, decides as to its sufficiency, convicts, and fixes the term and degree of punishment, which is without limit, except in his own discretion, and may extend to entire confiscation of property and imprisonment for life.

Where the jurisdiction exists, its exercise at the common law is not subject to revision or review, except in mere matters of form.

Rhinehart v. Lance, 14 Vroom, 811, 812; Re Cranford, 13 Adol. & E.N.S. 618; First Cong. Church v. Muscatine, 6 Iowa, 69; Re v. Clement, 4 Barn. & Ald. 218.

It is therefore an absolute as well as a despotic power which holds, within its circle, the property and personal liberty of every citizen.

The courts themselves in this country view it with disfavor.

This court, speaking through Mr. Justice Depue, in Rhinehart v. Lance, above cited, says: "The power to commit, at discretion and for a discretionary term of imprisonment, is a transcendent prerogative power. At best it is an arbitrary power and liable to great abuses."

The Supreme Court of California declares it to be "arbitrary in its nature."

Batchelder v. Moore, 42 Cal. 412.

Other courts declare it to be "an exception to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and not to be extended in the least degree beyond the limits imposed by statute."

Rutherford v. Holmes, 5 Hun, 817; Bergh's Case, 16 Abb. Pr. N. S. 266; People v. Jacobs, 66 N. Y. 8.

Judge Ludlow of Pennsylvania remarks that "History teaches us that the arbitrary conduct of judges protected from just criticism by arbitrary laws, and acting under the control and sanction of the executive power or at the command of the hereditary head of the government, has inflicted serious damage to the cause of liberty."

Grand Jury v. Public Press, 4 Brewster (Pa.) 313.

The Supreme Court of Illinois says: "It is at best an arbitrary power, and should only be exercised on the preservative and not the vindictive principle. It is not a jewel of the court to be admired and prized, but a rod rather, and most potent when rarely used."

The views thus set forth as to judicial power in respect of contempt to us at this day are axiomatic and need no arguments to enforce them. They lead inevitably to the conclusion that none but the most cogent reasons will justify the existence of such a power, under any circumstances, among a free people.

The English Courts have undertaken to sustain the power upon two grounds: first, that the superior courts in that realm are the successors of the court held In Aula Regis where originally the King sat in person to administer justice, so that an interference with or insult to the court or its officers was, in fact, an insult to the royal person of the King himself; and that, as by legal fiction he is still potentially present in his superior courts, the ancient reason still remains.

This is the reason given in Almon's Case, Wilmot's Opinions, 243, prepared in the last century; and by Chief Justice Cockburn in Reg. v. Lefroy, L. R. 8 Q. B. 184, in 1873.

But it is clear that this reason is without force here, for there is no personal sovereignty, either actually or potentially present in our courts.

In the ancient sense and as understood in England and by the old writers, there is no such thing in this country as sovereignty. The King was King by the grace of God, and His earthly representative and custodian of dignity and power; and from him as from the source of a river all power was distributed through its various channels.

But here, not even the people are Sovereign, because their sovereignty is limited and hedged about by written constitutions, so that there remains even to them but a residuum of sovereignty; and that has no elements of a personal character

The second reason given, and the only one which can here justify the existence of the despotic judicial power in respect of contempts, is, when reduced to its primal elements, its absolute necessity to preserve the life of the courts. In other words, it consists in the right of self defense, without which all human life and action must succumb when assailed.

The same reason and no other which justifies one citizen to slay another, or a municipality to blow up a burning building, or hostile States to destroy thousands of lives upon a field of battle, the "ultima ratio regum," the supreme effort of sovereignty for its life, justifies this form of judicial power.

A court with its various departments and officers is like a piece of machinery which, if tangibly, actually and materially interfered with, must stop; and it must have the power, in order to exist, to punish actual obstructions to its duties and disobedience of its process and decrees. But as matter of argument the principle can go no further, and must fail to justify the power in respect to acts intangible in their character, which can in nowise actually and physically affect the operations of the court, but in their farthest limit have only a moral effect upon them. These can justify the power no more than spoken words, however provoking, can justify a homicide.

It is only by blending these two radically different classes of acts, those which physically and materially interfere with the courts and those which by their essence can no otherwise than intangibly and morally interfere with them, and by assuming that no distinction can be logically drawn between such methods of interference, that those who have written upon this subject can frame an argument. The great storehouse from which the arguments of those favorable to the expansion of the judicial power have been drawn, is the opinion of Chief Justice Wilmot of the common pleas, in Almon's Case above cited; and there has been no improvement upon it either in matter or style. It is both singular and interesting to note how logical and powerful the argument of that great lawyer is, in support of the power as it had actually existed in England from the earliest times, and how weak and illogical the same argument becomes, when he endeavors to apply it to a condition of affairs in respect to which there was no precedent.

Without pursuing this line of inquiry further I shall assume, for the purposes of this argument, that the power to punish in respect of contempt by summary conviction, cannot be justified, unless its existence is actually necessary to conserve the life and operations of our courts.

And to narrow the line of inquiry and apply it to the case at bar, my first subordinate proposition is: that in respect to constructive contempts by publication in a newspaper, there is no actual necessity nor even any expediency for the existence of this absolute and despotic judicial power.

This position I shall sustain, not by abstract reasoning, which is at best a feeble weapon, but by pointing out the condition of the law in this country upon this subject.

The statement which I now make is not found in any text book or adjudicated case, but is the result of my own personal examination. It is, that in thirty-three of the thirty-eight States of this country, the power of the courts to summarily convict and punish, as for contempt in respect of a publication, has been, for periods ranging from 1667 until the present time, by positive enactment, either totally forbidden or defined and limited or rendered subject to review.

The Courts of the United States have been in like manner forbidden the power for fifty-five years. By the Act of Congress of March 2, 1831, it is provided that "The power of the Courts of the United States to punish contempt shall not be construed to extend to any cases, except the misbehavior of any person in their presence or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any such officers, or by any party, juror, witness, or other person, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree or command of the said courts."

This Act of Congress grew out of the arbitrary action of Judge Peck in respect of a contempt similar to the one at bar. He was impeached and barely escaped conviction, but was the agent to put it out of the power of any other United States Judge to repeat his offense. I have not been able to find a copy of Peck's Trial, and state the facts only as I have found them referred to in some of the cases.

The laws of the several States upon the subject referred to are as follows:

Alabama. In this State the law is substantially a transcript of the Act of Congress above cited.

Code, Ala. 1876, § 542.

Arkansas. By the new Constitution of this State, adopted in 1874, art. 7, § 26, "The right is reserved to the Legislature to punish all contempts not committed in the presence or hearing of the courts or in disobedience of process."

California. The law is to the same general effect as the Act of Congress above cited.

General Laws, 1850-1864, § 5414. See also Code Civ. Proc. Rev. 1872, § 1209.

Colorado. This State has no statute law upon the subject of contempt.

Connecticut. By the statute of this State first passed in 1667 and re-enacted in the Revision of 1875, it is provided that "Any court may punish by fine and imprisonment any person who shall in its presence behave contemptuously or disorderly." But the punishment is limited to a fine of $100 and imprisonment for six months.

Rev. Laws, Conn. p 61, § 15.

Delaware. This State has no statute on the subject of contempt.

Florida. The same remark holds good as to this State.

Georgia. The law of this State is substantially a transcript of the Act of Congress above cited.

Code, Ga. 1868, § 4614.

In addition, by the amended Constitution of 1865, art. 1, § 12: "The power of the court to punish for contempts shall be limited by legislative Acts."

Id. p. 968, § 4901.

Illinois. This State has no general law limiting the power of the courts as to contempt, but has a statute allowing the discharge, upon habeas corpus, of a person imprisoned for the nonperformance of any order or decree for the payment of money.

R. S. Ill. 1874, p. 570, § 86.

The decisions of the courts in this State, however, have denied the power to punish for contempts of like character with the one at bar.

Stuart v. People, 3 Scam. 395, 402; Storey v. People, 79 Ill. 45.

Indiana. In this State contempts are, by the statute, limited and classified into direct contempts, which are: disturbing the business of the court, and refusing to testify; and indirect contempts, which are: disobeying process, resisting process, and falsely making, uttering or publishing any false or grossly inaccurate report of any case, trial or proceeding, pending and undetermined. The punishment is limited to a fine of $500 and imprisonment for three months.

Careful statutory proceedings for review are provided.

R. S. Ind. 1881, §§ 1005-1013.

Iowa. In this State, by the statute, the power is limited in effect, as in the Act of Congress above cited.

The punishment is limited to a fine of $50 and imprisonment not exceeding one day.

Code Iowa, 1873, §§ 3491-3493.

Kansas. The statute in this State limits the power of the district or county court to punish for contempt to a fine not exceeding $100. The powers of the supreme court are not defined except in general terms.

Compiled Laws, Kansas, 1879, §§ 1665, 1694.

It should be noted that in this State the judges are elected by the people.

Kentucky. The statute provides that "No court or judge shall proceed by process of contempt, or impose a fine against any person who shall by words or writing animadvert upon or examine into the proceedings or conduct of such court or judge by words spoken or writings published not in the presence of such court or judge in the court, during the sitting of court."

Punishment for contempt is limited to a fine of $30, or an imprisonment of thirty hours, except in cases where the matter of contempt is tried before a jury.

Gen. Stat. Ky. 1873, pp. 356, 357, art. 27, §§ 1, 4.

Louisiana has no statute as to contempts except those committed by attorneys at law. As to them, it provides that "Nothing shall be construed or taken to be a contempt, but what shall be said, done or committed directly in the presence or hearing of the court, during the sitting of the same."

R. S. La. 1870, § 1941.

Maine. The statute enacts that "The supreme judicial court may punish contempts against its authority, by fine or imprisonment, or both."

R. S. Maine, 1883, p. 626, § 2.

Maryland. The statute is in effect a transcript of the Act of Congress above cited.

R. Code, Md. 1878, p. 522, § 8.

Massachusetts. This State has no statute on the subject of contempts of its superior courts.

Michigan. The statute enacts that its courts of record shall have power to punish as for a criminal contempt certain specified acts and no others. Among these is "The publication of a false and grossly inaccurate report of their proceedings; but no court can punish as a contempt the publication of true, full and fair reports of any trial, argument, procedure or decision in such court." The punishment is limited to a fine of $250 or imprisonment for thirty days in the jail of the county where the court is sitting, or both; and when the person is committed for the nonpayment of such fine he is to be discharged at the expiration of thirty days."

Howell, Annotated Stat. Mich. 1882, p. 1837, § 7284.

Minnesota. The statute of this State is in effect a transcript of the Act of Congress above cited. Proceedings for any contempt not committed in the immediate view and presence of the court are to be taken only upon affidavit or other evidence of the facts. The punishment in any event is limited to a fine of $250 and imprisonment for six months.

Stats. Minn. 1878 pp. 861-862, §§ 1-12.

Mississippi. The statute provides that "The supreme court may punish any person for contempt of court by fine or imprisonment, or by both;" but the imprisonment is limited to thirty days.

Rev. Code, 1880, p. 408, § 409.

Missouri. The statute is in effect a transcript of the Act of Congress above cited. The punishment is limited to a fine of $50 and an imprisonment of ten days; and when the person is committed for nonpayment of the fine such imprisonment is limited to thirty days.

1 R. S. 1879, p. 194, §§ 1055, 1056.

Nebraska. The statute is in effect a transcript of the Act of Congress above cited.

Compiled Stats. Neb. 1881, p. 619, § 669.

Nevada. The statute is in effect a transcript of the Act of Congress above cited. The punishment is limited to a fine of $500 and imprisonment for five days.

Compiled Laws, Nevada, p. 428, §§ 1521, 1584.

New Hampshire has no statute on the subject of contempt, except those committed by attorneys at law.

Gen. Laws, N. H. 1878.

New Jersey. The only statute in point in this State is the one under which the present appeal is taken.

New York. The statute in this State is in effect the same as the Act of Congress above cited, but its provisions are more elaborate in form. The punishment is limited generally to a fine of $250 and imprisonment for six months, or until the fine is paid.

3 R. S. N. Y. 1859, pp. 849, 850, § 1; p. 858, §§ 22, 25.

North Carolina. The statute of this State as to constructive contempt by publication is identical with that of Michigan above set forth. The punishment is also the same as therein indicated.

Code, N. C. 1883, p. 255, § 648; subd. 7, § 649.

The statute, out of abundant precaution, however, has this further provision that "The several acts, neglects and omissions of duty, malfeasances, misfeasances and nonfeasances, which shall be the subject of contempt of court. And if there be any parts of the common law now in force in this State which recognized other acts, neglects, omissions of duty, malfeasances, misfeasances and nonfeasances, beside those specified and described above, the same are hereby repealed and annulled."

Id. p. 255, § 648, subd. 9.

Ohio. The statute is in effect a transcript of the Act of Congress above cited. The punishment is limited to a fine of $500 and imprisonment for ten days.

R. S. Ohio, 1880, p. 1870, §§ 5639, 5640, 5645.

Oregon. The statute is in effect a transcript of the Act of Congress above cited. The punishment is limited to a fine of $300 and imprisonment for six months.

Gen. Laws, Oregon pp. 311, 312, §§ 640, 641.

Pennsylvania. The statute is in effect a transcript of the Act of Congress above cited, as to the acts constituting a contempt. Punishment by imprisonment is limited to such contempt as shall be committed in open court. The statute further provides that "No publication out of court respecting the conduct of the judges, officers of the court, jurors, witnesses, parties or any of them, in or concerning any cause depending in such court shall be construed into a contempt of the said court so as to render the author, printer or publisher, or either of them, liable to attachment or summary punishment for the same."

1 Brightly, Purd. Dig. 1883, pp. 324, 325, §§ 1, 2, 4.

The Act above quoted was passed in 1836, but a statute almost identical was enacted in 1809, limited originally to two years, but made perpetual by the Act of March 31, 1812.

Laws, Pa. 1700-1812, Vol. 5, pp. 55, 384.

In addition to the foregoing precautions the amended Constitution of Pennsylvania 1874, article 1, § 7, in terms prohibits "Convictions for publications as to the official conduct of public officers, and where not made negligently or maliciously."

Rhode Island. The statute gives the supreme court the power to punish, by fine and imprisonment, "All contempts of authority in any cause or hearing before them."

Pub. Stats. R. I. 1882, p. 505, § 7.

South Carolina. The statute is in terms almost precisely like that of Rhode Island.

R. S. S. C. 1878, p. 497, § 4.

But the Constitution of 1868 of this State, art. 1, § 8, has this provision, which is apparently germane to the subject of contempt: "In prosecutions for the publication of papers investigating the official conduct of officers or men in public capacity, or when the matter published is proper for public information, the truth thereof may be given in evidence."

Tennessee. The statute is in effect a transcript of the Act of Congress above cited. Punishment is limited to a fine of $50 and imprisonment for ten days.

Code, Tenn. 1858, pp. 739, 740, §§ 4106, 4107.

Texas. The statute provides that "The supreme court shall have power to punish any person for a contempt of court according to the principles and usages of law in like cases."

The punishment is limited to a fine of $1,000 and imprisonment for twenty days.

R. S. Texas, 1879, p. 166, § 1015.

Vermont. This State has no statute defining the jurisdiction of the courts as to contempt, but has a statute giving relief upon habeas corpus, returnable to the supreme court in any county.

Rev. Laws, Vt. 1880, p. 801, §§ 1371-1373.

Virginia. The statute in this State is in effect a transcript of the Act of Congress above cited. Code, Va. 1873, p. 1204, § 27.

Without the intervention of a jury the punishment is limited to a fine of $50 and imprisonment for ten days. In addition, although the Governor is forbidden to remit in whole or in part any fine or imprisonment, imposed by any court of record, court-martial or other proper authority, in respect of contempts, he is empowered to pardon the offense and remit the punishment, in whole or in part, except where such contempt consists in the nonperformance of, or disobedience to, some order, judgment or decree of the court.

Id. p. 202, § 21.

West Virginia. The statute is in terms like that of Virginia.

Code, West Va. 1868, p. 690, § 26.

Wisconsin. The statute of this State, as to constructive contempts by publication, is identical with that of Michigan and North Carolina above cited; so also is the punishment. R. S. Wis. 1878, §§ 2565-2568.

The United States Supreme Court has been frequently spoken of as the most august tribunal in the world; and it and the other Courts of the United States have the power to pass upon the constitutionality of Acts of Congress; by their construction of the Constitution, they have the power to mold, and in fact have molded, the Government of the United States. They consider matters of revenue, commerce and great questions of peace and war, involving the rights, liberties and destinies of more than fifty million freemen. Dealing with the gravest politico-legal questions, they have been time and again bitterly assailed in the public prints, and as well the personal integrity of their judges, as their official acts, have been unsparingly attacked; inasmuch that their decisions have been, not only reversed by popular opinion, but rendered forever nugatory by change in the organic law.

If, as is argued by Chief Justice Wilmot in Almon's Case, above cited, and those who follow his line of reasoning, the power to punish publications summarily as for contempt is essential to the dignity and influence of the courts, without which they will be destroyed, it would seem that the Courts of the United States must possess it or fail in their high office. Yet, as we have seen, if it was ever legally inherent in them, they have not possessed it for more than half a century, the greater part of their existence. And in like manner if the courts ever possessed the power to summarily punish for contempt contended for by Chief Justice Wilmot and his followers, they have lost it in thirty-three of the thirty-eight States of the Union; some of them imperial in population and resources, and in the aggregate, to use Webster's brilliant metaphor, in his celebrated Hulsemann letter, spread over a region one of the most fertile on the globe, and of an extent in comparison with which the possessions and area of the State of New Jersey are but as a patch on the earth's surface.

In view of these facts what becomes of the assertion, for it is really nothing more, that the power to punish publications as contempts is essential to the courts?

II. I pass to the second subordinate proposition of my argument as I have arranged it, but which is really decisive, and contend:

That the courts of common law in New Jersey are without jurisdiction to summarily convict and punish any person as for contempt, in respect of words published in a newspaper.

Aside from the reasoning heretofore made, I support this contention upon two grounds:

1. That the doctrine of constructive contempt in respect of publications is of recent introduction, and was not part of the common law brought with them by our ancestors to this country; nor was it a part of the common law at the time of the beginning of the American Revolution.

2. Whatever may be the truth of the above contention, I affirm that this doctrine is not and never has been the law of this State, in the courts of common law.

It was decided by this court in Rhinshart v. Lance, 14 Vroom, 311, 320, that the power to commit for contempt "is not a necessary incident of a court of justice, and therefore is not granted by implication. It can only be derived from the common law or by a legislative grant of such a power;" and this conclusion needs no argument to support it.

There is no statute upon the subject in this State; and therefore if the power exists here, it must be an inheritance from the common law. The term common law as here used, it is well understood, means the common law of England, as it existed at the time of our severance from allegiance to the British Crown; and if in any essential respect the law of England since that period has been changed, it may be construed to be the common law of England, but it is not, in so far as it has been changed, the common law of New Jersey, which still remains as the law of England stood before such change.

The common law in the course of centuries, having been hammered into shape out of the rude customs of barbarous tribes by judicial interpretations and expositions, consists in a body of reported cases called precedents, and has no other legal force and authority than these judicial determinations. Being the creation of precedents whose ultimate force is that they are construed from and founded upon immemorial usage, it is an inevitable conclusion, both logically and legally, that if no precedent can be found to support, either directly or by conclusive legal implication, a doctrine contended for as part of the common law, it must fall; for in such a body of law, the mere fact that no precedent for a particular doctrine or theory is to be found is plenary proof that it does not exist. If this position is not admitted, then the whole body of the common law must be rejected, because it is built up entirely on precedent; and the argument is as potent in one direction as in the other. Assuming that this reasoning is unassailable, I affirm that there is no reported case of the exercise of jurisdiction by a court of common law in the matter of a constructive contempt in respect of a publication prior to the American Revolution.

The art of printing was invented in A. D. 1423, and for a period of more than three centuries and a half thereafter, such jurisdiction was not even so much as hinted at in the decision of any common law court, so far as the reports disclose. Even in the stormy times near the beginning of the reign of George III, when the trenchant pens of Junius and other pamphleteers mercilessly assailed the whole body of the government, from the King to the meanest tide waiter of the custom-house, and in particular the official acts and private reputation of Lord Mansfield, then Chief Justice, no trace of the exercise of this jurisdiction is to be found. The earliest case to which any reference is made in the books is that of Almon in Wilmot's Opinions, above cited. This opinion was prepared as is said in 1765, but was, in fact, never delivered, for the proceedings were abandoned by the prosecution; not as is conjectured in a note to the opinion, because of the resignation of the then Attorney-General, Sir Fletcher Norton, but more probably because neither the prosecution nor the opinion was in accordance with the law of England as it then stood. Not only was there never any judgment in the cause, but the opinion was never even printed until 1802.

See original edition Wilmot's Opinions, printed London, 1802, adv. and note to Almon's Case, p. 243, in State Library.

The first instance in which an order was ever made in England to prevent the publication of proceedings pending a trial, was on the impeachment of Lord Melville in 1806, stated by Denman and Platt, arguendo, in Rex v. Clement, 4 Barn. & Ald. 218, 245.

I have not been able to find, in any reported case, any claim of this jurisdiction by any English common-law court before that date. Indeed, the jurisdiction seems to have been exercised in this country before it was in England, for Respublica v. Oswald, 1 Dall. 319 (1 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 155) was adjudicated in 1788; and although elaborately argued, no authority for the jurisdiction is cited, except the Commentaries of Blackstone.

On the contrary, the only common-law precedents upon the subject, prior to 1800, are decidedly against the exercise of this jurisdiction by the English Courts.

Rex v. Gray, 1 Burr. 510, decided in 1758.

In this case, which was the matter of a libelous publication relative to a question at issue, and in which Lord Mansfield presided, an information was ordered to be filed by the court; an entirely different proceeding from that of contempt.

A similar case was that of Rex v. Jolliffe, 4 T. R. 285. An information was also directed to be filed in this case by Chief Justice Kenyon, who in terms expressly states that at that time there was but one precedent in respect of the subject matter of such a publication, namely: Rex v. Gray, above cited.

These two cases were cited as against the power of the court, in Hollingsworth v. Duane, Wall. C. C. 77.

And Judge Griffith who presided in that case deemed them of such force, that in a foot note, signed with his name and printed with the case, he states that the reason why the court ordered informations to be filed in these two cases, and did not proceed summarily as for contempt, was that the assizes had no jurisdiction in contempt.

But Judge Griffith, although a jurist and lawyer of ability and acquirements, was clearly in error in this statement, for the English authorities are distinctly to the contrary. They hold that "A court of assize is a superior court; and consequently, in a warrant of commitment by a judge of assize for contempt, the adjudication for contempt may be general, and the particular circumstances need not be set out."

Re Fernandez, 6 Hurlst. & N. 717.

S. P. and S. C. 10 C. B. N. S. 3.

Upon this subject, prior to 1800, save in the two precedents noted, as Buller, J., said in Le Caux v. Eden, 18 Howell, St. Tr. 1260, speaking of another matter, there was "A universal silence in Westminster Hall."

Since the beginning of this century, the doctrine of constructive contempt has been greatly expanded in England; and it is beyond doubt, in that country, now fully established in respect of publications, thus making a radical change from the law as it existed before our Revolution.

I have not seen it suggested elsewhere, but my own examination has convinced me that this change in the law of England in the respect noted was due to three principal causes:

First. By the influence of the Commentaries of Blackstone, the last volume of which was published in 1769. On pages 285, 286 of the fourth volume of that work the author has a single clause on the subject of contempts by publication: "By speaking or writing contemptuously of the court or judges acting in their judicial capacity; by printing false accounts (or even true ones without proper permission) of causes then depending in judgment." He gives no authority for this doctrine, but it is evidently borrowed from 2 Hawkins, P. C. book 2, cap. 22, § 36, where it is also stated without citation of authority.

Second. By the elaborate argument of Chief Justice Wilmut in Almon's Case, above cited, first published in 1802.

But as the text of law writers and the arguments of a learned jurist, however forcible, could hardly be sufficient to change the law of England, in a matter imperiling civil liberty, the controlling reason in my judgment was,

Third. The change in the law of England, in respect of the issues involved in the trial by jury of an indictment for libel.

It will be remembered that in the trial of the Dean of St. Asaph, for criminal libel, in 1784, the jury returned a verdict of "Guilty of publishing only," which after some difficulty with Mr. Justice Buller, Mr. Erskine succeeded in having recorded. Upon the coming in of a rule to show cause, Mr. Erskine (in an argument which has been spoken of by high authority, as "beyond all comparison the most perfect union of argument and eloquence ever exhibited in Westminster Hall") contended that the verdict found was tantamount to a verdict of acquittal. But the court, in discharging the rule, held, with Justice Buller, that the sole question upon which the jury could pass was that of publication, and that it remained for the court to decide, whether or not the publication was a libel; and this decision was without doubt in accordance with respectable precedent. Such was the influence, however, of popular opinion, that, with the aid of Lord Camden, although strenuously opposed by Lords Thurlow, Kenyon, Bathurst and all the Judges of the House of Lords, a bill was finally passed by Parliament, June 1, 1792, declaring the right of the jury "to give their verdict in the whole matter at once." This law is the prototype of the provision of our own Constitution that "In all prosecutions or indictments for libel * * * the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the fact."

The pertinence of this historical review may be easily seen. Before the Act of Parliament of 1792, prosecutions for libelous publications upon the court of judges were by indictment, upon the trial of which the jury passed only upon the question of publication; and the judges retained in their own hands the determination of the essence of the crime, namely: its libelous quality. The prosecution, while retaining a color of ordinary and regular legal inquiry, was in effect as arbitrary and almost as summary as proceedings for contempt. But after the intervention of the Act of 1792, prosecutions by indictment for libel ceased to be certain in their results; and the Courts of England, taking advantage of the undefined power in respect of contempt, and fortified by Blackstone's opinion and Wilmot's argument, began to expand the law of contempt so as to reach publications.

This change in the law of England, however, can have no force in this State; for our common law upon the subject in hand is the common law of England as it was before the change.

Second. The second branch of my argument in support of the position now in discussion is that whatever may be the force and truth of the foregoing contention, the doctrine of constructive contempt, in respect of publications, is not and never has been the law of this State, in the courts of common law. No court of common law in this State, from its earliest history, has ever summarily convicted and punished a citizen as for contempt in respect of a publication. This is the first case in which it has ever been attempted, so far as any precedents disclose and so far as I have any information.

The following are all the reported cases in the courts of common law in this State, of attachments as for contempts, with a statement of the causes of the proceedings, for disobedience or resistance by officers, parties, jurors, witnesses or other persons, to writs, processes, rules, decrees, etc.

State v. Hunt and State v. Lee, Coxe, 287, 394; State v. Trumbull, 1 South. 189; State v. Raborg, 2 South. 645; Flommerfelt v. Zellers, 2 Halst. 31; Crane v. Sayre, 1 Halst. 111; Gilliland v. Rappelyea, 3 J. S. Green, 188; McClure v. Gulick and State v. Gulick, 2 Harr. (N. J.) 340, 435; Hendrickson v. Hendrickson, 3 Harr. (N. J.) 886; Struggle v. Hayne, 1 Zab. 245; State v. Ackerson, 1 Dutch. 209; State v. Elkinton, 1 Vroom, 835; Smith ads. State, 2 Vroom, 216; Wandling v. Thompson, 12 Vroom, 142; McQuade v. Emmons, 9 Vroom, 397; Cox v. Pascoe Common Pleas, 16 Vroom, 828.

H. J.

For attempt to communicate with jury, see State v. Doty, 3 Vroom, 408.

That inferior courts and justices of the peace have no jurisdiction in contempt for any cause whatever, see Re Kerrigan, 4 Vroom, 344; Rhinehart v. Lance, 14 Vroom, 311.

In none of the above cited cases is there any reference to the jurisdiction of the courts, in respect of contempt by publication, except in State v. Doty.

That case was a proceeding against a person not a party, nor interested in the suit, for endeavoring to arrange a signal with one of the jurymen, to inform him how the jury stood with regard to their verdict. Chief Justice Beasley, in delivering the opinion of the court says:

"A court would fail of necessity to accomplish the end of its institution, if it could not maintain order and enforce obedience to its precepts. The authority is derived from necessity; and the authority ceases only where such necessity ceases."

This proposition has my full assent, for it is the very principle which I have heretofore stated as the only one upon which the contempt power in any case can be defended. But in giving illustration of the use of this power the Chief Justice uses the following language:

"Thus, it is a contempt of court in all persons who resist the execution of its writs, or treat contumeliously its officers in the lawful discharge of their duties; so, to solicit a witness to disobey a subpoena; to offer insult to a judge for his conduct while on the bench; or to publish anything relating to a cause pending in court, which has a tendency to prejudice the public mind upon the subject, or which contains improper strictures on the conduct of counsel, witnesses or parties."

It is manifest, I think, that in giving these illustrations, the Chief Justice had in mind but one differentia to classify contempts, namely: the inquiry whether they are committed in the face of the court or beyond its precincts and ken; and that he had overlooked the important division of contempts heretofore noted, namely: into those contempts which actually and materially obstruct the operations of the courts, and those which only morally and intangibly interfere with them. It would seem to be easy indeed to bring the case under review, within the limits of the former division, for the complete seclusion of the jury from communication with other persons is, by the common law, of the essence of a jury trial, is guarded by the constable's oath, and is, therefore a standing and uniform and inflexible rule of the court; and any arrangement to communicate with the jury is potentially and pro tanto disobedience or resistance to a lawful rule, order or command of the court. It falls easily, therefore, within the first division of contempts heretofore noted, and within all the illustrations exhibited by the Chief Justice save that in respect to publications; and his remarks as to these may with propriety be considered as a dictum only; and while it is to be treated with respect as the opinion of a jurist of experience, it cannot have the force of a precedent, especially in a case involving personal liberty.

But, assuming that the Chief Justice had in mind what has been suggested as the true criterion of jurisdiction in contempt, and that his illustration as to publications was in point in the case discussed and, therefore, not a dictum only, but an adjudication, let us examine upon what authority it rests; he cites but five authorities:

Rex v. Clement, 4 Barn. & Ald. 218; People v. Few, 2 Johns. 290; Respublica v. Oswald, 1 Dall. 319 (1 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 155); Commonwealth v. Dandridge, 2 Va. Cas. 408; 4 Bl. Com. 258 (285).

I will examine these in the order named:

The first case cited, Rex v. Clement, was in 1821, and therefore has no pertinency here, in view of my argument that the power to punish for contempt in respect of publication did not exist at common law before the American Revolution, and the admission that it has become firmly established in England since that time. In addition, in that case, the proceedings were for the disobedience of an order of the court previously made, expressly forbidding any publication of the proceedings of a trial for high treason, pending the trial. The case itself, even if it were of older date, involved the question whether such publication was a disobedience to a lawful order of the court; obviously, a very different question from the one under discussion here.

In People v. Few, 2 Johns. decided in 1807, the attachment was discharged. No common-law precedent was cited in support of it.

In Respublica v. Oswald, 1 Dall. (1 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 155), decided in 1788, there was a conviction. But no authority was cited by either counsel or court, except the commentaries of Blackstone. The action of the court in this case, sustaining the power, led to proceedings looking to the impeachment of the Judges of the Supreme Court, by the General Assembly of the State. The resolution to that end was defeated by a small majority, apparently because of the strenuous efforts of Mr. Lewis, of counsel for the prosecution in the case cited, who was a member of the House.

See note to the case.

Commonwealth v. Dandridge, 2 Va. Cas. was in 1824. In that case, the judge holding the court was charged with corruption and cowardice while he was upon the steps of the court house, after the hour of opening court had arrived, and when he was about to open court. The offense was, in fact, committed in the face of the court. The leading opinion does not put the conviction on that ground, but discusses generally the law of contempt. The other opinions, however, refer to that fact, and the opinion of one of the judges is carefully worded to guard against the expansion of the power.

No precedent is cited, and on page 487 of the report it is substantially admitted that no reported authority can be found for a constructive contempt proceeding of like character, except the case of Printer of the Champion et al. 2 Atk. 469, which was in the court of chancery and not at common law; and Rex v. Barber, 1 Str. 444, in which there was no conviction, and the proceedings were abandoned.

See note to last named case.

It thus clearly appears that the illustration in respect of contempt by publication, given by the Chief Justice, rests for its sole authority upon the remark in 4 Blackstone's Commentaries, and for this remark, as we have seen, that distinguished author cites no precedent. Stat v. Doty, therefore, cannot be regarded as an adjudication to bind this court to assume despotic power over the property and liberty of the citizen.

In the determination of the question of the existence in our courts of the power to punish, as for contempts, in respect of publications, the nonexercise of the power must have much weight.

In respect of executive, legislative or judicial power, especially when personal liberty is involved, the argument of nonuser is always potent.

It was with this argument, as used by Mr. Burke in his speech upon American Taxation, that the Colonists met and overthrew what Lord Campbell designates as the "unanswerable argument" of Lord Mansfield in support of the power of Parliament to tax the Colonies, declared in the Preamble to the Act repealing the Stamp Act.

"Leave the Americans," says Mr. Burke, "as they anciently stood, and these distinctions, born of our unhappy contest, will die along with it. They and we, and their and our ancestors, have been happy under that system. Let the memory of all actions, in contradiction to that good old mode, on both sides, be extinguished forever. Be content to bind America by laws of trade; you have always done it. Do not burden them with taxes; you were not used to do so from the beginning. Let this be your reason for not taxing. These are the arguments of States and Kingdoms."

And this court has applied this argument in determining important cases.

In State v. Kelsey, 15 Vroom, 1, 18, it permitted usage under a statute to give its terms a meaning which the court would not have given it without such usage; and that, in contravention of a principle which the same court, in the same opinion, designates as "A salutary one, and indeed, indispensable for the protection of the public rights and interests, and as firmly rooted in the judicial decisions of this State as in those of any other jurisdiction."

And in the case of Re Drainage along Pequett River, 12 Vroom, 175, 179, this court held that while the Legislature has no inherent or constitutional power to appoint methods for the drainage of meadows, yet the right "has been so frequently exercised and acknowledged that it has become a part of the local common law."

It is true that these cases contain the argument by inversion, but it is none the less the same argument.

How much more forcible does it become when applied to test a despotic power which, if it ever existed, has never been used and, already dust and ashes, has been buried so long that the very forms and method of procedure are unfamiliar to the court which attempts to employ it.

III. My last general proposition is that, conceding, for purposes of argument, the jurisdiction in respect of publication assumed by the court below, the proceedings appealed from upon the law and the facts here presented, are so defective that they should be reversed.

1. The court had no jurisdiction in respect of a publication touching a grand jury whose functions had previously determined; nor in respect of a publication touching a sheriff who was previously functus officio.

There is no precedent in respect of either case.

By the state of the case, page 4, it appears that the publication treating of the grand jury and sheriff was on January 30, 1885. The grand jury spoken of was summoned and acted at the January Term, 1884, of the Cumberland Oyer and Terminer.

Its functions ended with that term, and it had no legal existence as a part of the court or otherwise after the expiration of that term.

The court will take judicial notice of the fact that the term of office of the sheriff, spoken of in the publication, expired in November, 1884; so that he also at the time of the publication was functus officio, and was no longer an officer of the court in any proper sense.

The proceedings and conviction therefore, so far as they concern the publication touching the grand jury and sheriff, are clearly erroneous.

2. The court below was without jurisdiction; and its proceedings, conviction and judgment are void, because no affidavit was filed as a condition precedent to its action.

Constructive contempts must be brought before the court by affidavits of persons who witnessed them; and thereupon a rule is made upon the offender to show cause why an attachment should not issue against him.

4 Bl. Com. 287; 2 Hawk. Pl. C. 222; 1 Tidd, Pr. 3, Am. ed. 88; 6 Dane, Abr. chaps. 193, 525; 7 Id. chap. 220, art. 5, 307, 308; Commonwealth v. Dandridge, 2 Va. Cas. 408; State v. Matthews, 37 N. H. 450; Crow v. State, 24 Tex. as. 12; Rapalje, Contempt, pp. 121, 122, § 98.

I have found no reported case in the United States where a rule has been granted in a matter of constructive contempt, without an affidavit previously filed.

And this condition precedent is of the essence of the jurisdiction in constructive contempt, and not a method of procedure merely; for while the courts have a general jurisdiction in respect of contempts committed in the face of the court, where the proceeding is entirely summary, and no proof other than the senses of the court is required, yet, in respect of constructive contempt, they have only a particular jurisdiction, which cannot be called into action unless prima facie evidence of the commission of the offense is formally presented to the court.

In Batchelder v. Moore, 42 Cal. 413, 414, the Supreme Court of California says:

"The power of a court to commit for contempt, though undoubted, is in its nature arbitrary; and its exercise is not to be upheld, except under the circumstances and in the manner prescribed by law. It is essential to the validity of proceedings in contempt, subjecting a party to fine and imprisonment, that they show a case in point of jurisdiction within the provisions of the law by which such proceedings are authorized, for mere presumptions and intendants are not to be indulged in their support. The statute of this State, regulating contempts and their punishment, provides that when the alleged contempt is not committed in the presence of the court, an affidavit of the facts constituting the contempt shall be presented. If there be no affidavit, there is nothing to set the power of the court in motion. And there is no distinction between the utter absence of an affidavit and the presentation of one which is defective in substance, in stating the facts constituting the alleged contempts."

It is true that the court in the foregoing opinion is discussing the Statute of California; but that statute in requiring an affidavit in constructive contempt is merely affirmative of the practice at common law; and the reasoning of the court applies with equal force to proceedings under the latter practice as to those under its own Code.

See also McConnell v. State, 46 Ind. 298.

That no affidavit, or other prima facie proof even, preceded the issue of the rule by the court below in this case conclusively appears by the state of the case, which is certified by the court itself to be full and complete.

The case on page 4 states a representation to the court that the defendant is an editor of a certain newspaper, and that at a certain date he published therein articles which are quoted upon pp. 4 and 5. At the end of the rule to show cause on page 6 of the state of the case "It is ordered that the prosecutor of the pleas present to this court the evidence upon which this rule is issued, upon the return day of this rule."

As no such evidence appears in the state of the case, the conclusion is absolute that none such was presented, either at the return of or upon the issue of the rule. Nor will the recital by the court below, of a representation made to it, supply either to that court or to this court, the absence of a representation legally made, namely: by an affidavit. The case, therefore, stood before the court below and it stands here upon the issue of a rule to show cause, reciting material facts essential to jurisdiction, of which there was no legal prima facie evidence.

Nor, in view of what has been already stated as to the presence of an affidavit being essential to the jurisdiction of the court below, and here, in proceedings for constructive contempt, does the appearance in person of the defendant upon the return day of the rule, and his filing an affidavit in denial of any intention to commit a contempt, serve to give the court jurisdiction. An appearance may cure a defect in procedure or waive a privilege; but it cannot create jurisdiction where it does not exist. No less an authority than the Supreme Court of the United States has said:

"The tendency of modern decisions everywhere is to the doctrine that the jurisdiction of a court or other tribunal, to render a judgment affecting individual rights, is always open to inquiry, when the judgment is relied on in any other proceeding."

Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168, 198. (Bk. 26, L. ed. 377, 389).

In appearing below, the defendant was under the strongest duress in a proceeding, novel as well to the court as to himself. He had the right to suppose and, as his affidavit shows, did suppose that his denial of intentional contempt would end the proceedings. It would be a strained construction of the law to hold that his appearance below, without a formal protest as to jurisdiction, would conclude him here in a new trial, covering matters of discretion as well of law as of fact.

3. I press as arguments addressed to the discretion of the court, two considerations:

First. That the article in respect of the animus of the president judge towards the defendant, upon the trial upon the indictment for assault and battery, is shown, by the state of the case, not to have originated with the defendant, but to have been simply copied into his newspaper from another, to which it was credited without comment; and that the sole object of the defendant in publishing it was an honest endeavor to show the community of his neighborhood what views were entertained on the subject by outside parties, and not with any purpose to injuriously prejudice the public mind against the court below. As to the facts stated in it, the affidavit of the defendant under the cases is conclusive; as to the intention stated, I admit that it is not necessarily and legally conclusive. But the point now is whether this court in its discretion will punish the mere reproducer of a publication. If that ground is taken, and every editor is obliged to closely scrutinize the matter clipped from other newspapers before he can print it in his own, then the long established freedom of the press will be largely circumscribed.

Second. The laches of the court below is a forcible argument against the affirmation of its conviction by this court. The publications complained of were made January 30, 1885. No rule was issued until May 11, 1885. It was made returnable on the 24th day of July, more than two months thereafter. The affidavit of the defendant was filed upon that day, and no further proceedings were taken by the court below until January 13, 1886, when the defendant was convicted.

Arbitrary and summary powers must be swift and instant in their execution, or the reason for their possession and exercise fails.

IV. In view of what has been heretofore stated, I urge further, as worthy of the gravest consideration, that the exercise of the jurisdiction of proceedings as for contempt in respect of publications is against public policy. The history of the country shows that almost every instance of its exercise has run counter to popular opinion.

In conclusion, I urge that, upon all the reasons stated, the conviction and judgment of the court below should be reversed, and the appellant here acquitted.

Dixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant had been indicted at the January Term of 1884, of the Cumberland County Oyer and Terminer, and at the January Term, 1885, had been tried on the indictment, but the jury disagreed. On January 30, 1885, he published in his newspaper an article intended to cast discredit upon the members of the grand jury that had indicted him, upon the sheriff who had summoned the jury, and upon the judge who had presided at his trial and who, in the regular course of official duty, would preside when he should again be tried. For this article the appellant was adjudged by said court to be guilty of contempt and to be fined $100; whereupon, he appealed to this court.

The appellant's counsel insists that such a publication is not a contempt of court in this State. Fully admitting that it would be regarded as a contempt of court in England, according to the views of the present day, he contends that such views had their origin subsequent to the American Revolution, and are therefore not to be considered as indicating our common law. That this position is, however, false will appear from a reference to many declarations and decisions made before our separation from the mother country, by writers and courts to whom we are wont to look for authoritative evidence of the common law.

As early as the time of Lord Clarendon, the first chancellor after the Restoration, prosecutions for contempt by abusive words uttered out of court had become so frequent that a special rule of court was adopted for their regulation. Comyn, Dig. Chancery, D. 1, note h.

In 1709 a defendant, on being served with a rule of the Queen's Bench to show cause why an information should not be filed against him, spoke of the rule in a contemptuous manner. The court sent an attachment for contempt against him, without even a rule that he show cause why it should not be issued. Anon. 1 Salk. 84.

In 1720 the same practice was pursued in the King's Bench against one Jones, who had treated the process of the court contemptuously. Rez v. Jones, 1 Str. 185.

Again, in 1724, against one who had used contemptuous words on the delivery to him of a declaration in ejectment. Rez v. Unitt, 1 Str. 567. Again, in 1787, under circumstances like those of Rez v. Jones, supra; North v. Wiggins, 1 Str. 1068.

In 1720 Pool was committed for contempt of the court of chancery, in having put an advertisement in the Daily Courant, offering a reward of £100 for legal proof of a certain marriage then in question before the court, Lord Chancellor Parker saying: "This tends to the suborning of witnesses, * * * but is a contempt of court, being a means of preventing justice in a cause now depending, * * * and as the court may so in justice it ought to punish this proceeding." Pool v. Sacherevel, 1 P. Wms. 675.

It was this jurist whom Hawkins, in the preface to his second book on the Pleas of the Crown, described as possessing the most perfect skill and experience in the common law.

About 1724 Dr. Colbatch was attached for contempt, in the King's Bench, for having written in his Jus Academicum, in allusion to the court's granting writs of mandamus and prohibition against the University of Cambridge, "that they who intend to subvert the laws and liberties of any nation commonly begin with the privileges and immunities of the Universities." Chief Justice Pratt sentenced him to be imprisoned, fined and bound over to good behavior. 3 Camp. Ch. Jus. 70.

Shortly afterwards Dr. Colbatch's adversary Dr. Bentley complained to the Kings Bench that Cambridge had taken away his degree without hearing him, because, on being served with process to appear in an action of debt before the Vice Chancellor of the University, he had said contemptuously to the beadle that the process was illegal and he would not obey it; that the Vice Chancellor was not his judge and was acting foolishly. The same Chief Justice, in reversing the action of the University, remarked: "If Dr. Bentley had said as much of our process, we would have laid him by the heels for it; he is not to arraign the justice of the proceedings out of court, before an officer who has no power to examine it." Rez v. University of Cambridge, 1 Str. 557, 565.

In 1744 the Kings Bench granted a rule for an attachment against one Redman, for threatening Murphy (the prosecutor in an information for a misdemeanor) with danger of his life, and saying he would be hanged. Rez v. Carroll, 1 Wils. 75.

About the same time Lord Hardwicke committed two printers to prison, for contempt of court in printing reflections on the parties and witnesses in a cause pending in chancery, saying: "There is nothing of more pernicious consequence than to prejudice the minds of the public against persons concerned as parties in causes, before the cause is finally heard." "One kind of contempt is scandalizing the court itself. There may be likewise a contempt of this court, in abusing parties who are concerned in causes here. There may be also a contempt of the court in prejudicing mankind against persons before the cause is heard." Roach v. Garden, 2 Atk. 469.

About 1720 Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown was issued. In it the learned sergeant enumerates among the most remarkable instances of contempts, for which any person is punishable, "contemptuous words or writing concerning the court," of which kind he says, it seems needless to put any instances, since they are generally so obvious to common understanding." 2 Hawk. P. C. chap. 22, §§ 33, 36.

Before 1740 Comyn's Digest was published, and it is therein asserted that attachment will lie in abusive usage, or words of the process, or officers of the court. Com. Dig. Chancery, D. 8.

Between 1740 and 1750 Viner's Abridgment appeared, which, under the title Contempt, states: "Sometimes a contempt arises in using words imputing scorn, reproach or domination of the court."

And finally Blackstone, in his fourth book (p. 283), published within a decade before the American Revolution, mentions among the principal instances of contempts of courts punishable summarily by attachment, those committed away from the presence of the court, by parties writing or speaking contemptuously of the court or judges acting in their judicial capacity.

In this array of authorities, running through the two generations next preceding the Declaration of Independence, is not to be forgotten Chief Justice Wilmot's opinion in Almon's Case, written in 1765, indicating the power to punish this species of contempt as one inherent in the superior courts according to the settled principles of the common law. Wilmot, Ops. 243.

These citations may be fitly closed by the testimony of Lord Erskine, uttered indeed thirty years after New Jersey had ceased to be a Colony of Great Britain, but toward the end of a life made illustrious by such devotion to the liberty of the press as not even its extreme advocates will question; he said, in Ex parte Jones, 18 Ves. 237 (1806): "It never has been or can be denied that a publication not only with an obvious tendency but with the design to obstruct the ordinary course of justice is a very high contempt."

It thus appears beyond dispute, I think, that the Superior Courts of England, before the formation of the United States, had legal power to punish summarily for any words, uttered by speech, by writing or by printing, outside of the regular course of litigation, which were designed to bring contempt upon the courts in the exercise of their judicial functions or to pervert, in a pending cause, the due administration of justice.

The appellant's counsel contends, in the next place, that this power did not pass to the Courts of New Jersey.

So far as our courts are modeled after English Courts of common law, a presumption arises that they possess all the powers which their prototypes lawfully exercised, and the burden of establishing the contrary rests upon him who asserts it. Counsel endeavors to maintain his position, upon the ground that the power now denied is contrary to the spirit of our institutions and so far as our reports show has never been exercised in this State.

The reason for deeming it contrary to the spirit of our institutions that our courts should have the same power as their predecessors, to defend themselves against abusive words, is not apparent. Only two arguments for withdrawing from them this authority can be imagined; one, that abusive words have ceased to be regarded as a means of injury; the other, that such power could no longer be safely intrusted to the courts. But neither argument is well founded, for, by adopting the common law touching slander and libel, our forefathers unequivocally asserted their opinion that injury would still flow from unbridled tongues and pens; and by conceding to the courts the power of punishing contempts generally, they recognized the trustworthiness of the judiciary in vindicating by summary process their own authority and dignity. Why then should this single species of injury be taken from the category in which it has always stood? The importance of the liberty of the press is urged upon us; we do not underestimate it, but after all, the liberty of the press is only the liberty which every man has to utter his sentiments, and can be enjoyed only in subjection to that precept both of law and of morals: Sic utere tuo ut alienum non ledas.

In a government where order is secured, not so much by force as by the respect which citizens entertain for the law and those charged with its administration, nothing which tends to preserve that respect from forfeiture on the one hand and detraction on the other can be hostile to the Commonwealth.

It is true, as stated, that there is not, in our reports, any instance of the exercise of the power to punish for mere words as a contempt, but this by no means indicates that the power has not been employed. The occasions on which it might properly be used are most likely to have arisen in those courts that try and decide causes in the immediate presence of interested parties, and therefore under circumstances more calculated to excite evil dispositions. The proceedings of these courts are not reported, nor until the Statute of 1884, under which the present appeal is taken, were they subject to review in courts whose decisions are reported. The authority of our superior tribunals over this class of contempts has never been questioned, and whenever it has been referred to in our reported cases it has been either declared or assumed to remain with us in its original vigor.

In Plommerfelt v. Zellers, 2. Halst. 31 (1838), counsel spoke of it as an undoubted power.

In State v. Doty, 8 Vroom, 403 (1868), Chief Justice Beasley mentions it as one repeatedly enforced.

In Rhinehart v. Lance, 14 Vroom, 311 (1881), where Mr. Justice Depue discussed at large the subject of contempts, there is no intimation that this branch of judicial authority has been lopped off. In our judgment the power exists, notwithstanding the apparent infrequency of its exercise. A large collection of cases on the subject, Contempt of Court, will be found in "The American Law Register" February to July, 1881.

Counsel further contends that the proceedings of the court below should be annulled because there does not seem to have been any affidavit of the facts as a foundation for the rule to show cause. This is not now a sufficient reason for reversal. No doubt the ordinary course of practice in such cases in courts of law is that an affidavit of the facts should first be presented; then that a rule should be entered requiring the alleged offender to show cause why he should not be attached for contempt; then, if good cause be not shown, that an attachment should issue, and the accused, on being brought in should be either held to bail or committed to answer interrogatories; then that interrogatories should be exhibited and answered; and thereupon, according as his answers confess or deny his guilt, he should be punished or discharged.

But the practice has not been uniform. Sometimes a rule to show cause has been allowed without an affidavit, on a mere suggestion; sometimes an attachment has issued without a rule to show cause; sometimes a punishment has been inflicted forthwith on the offender's confession when brought in by the writ, without interrogatories; and sometimes, as in McQuade v. Emmons, 9 Vroom, 397, the penalty has been imposed on the offender's admissions made under the original rule, without either writ or interrogatories; so that these various steps are manifestly not jurisdictional, except to the extent of laying before the court matters which constitute a contempt, and affording to the party accused a fair opportunity of denying or confessing their truth.

In the present case, the appellant, on the return of the rule to show cause, filed his affidavit declaring the truth of all the matters alleged in the rule as the basis for its allowance, and although the consideration of the cause was then adjourned from term to term, yet the appellant never intimated that an affidavit should have been presented before the rule was granted, or that he was entitled to have an attachment issue or interrogatories filed, or that the rule should be discharged for want thereof; and even after sentence was pronounced, he obtained leave to amend his affidavit, but did not complain of any irregularity or illegality in the proceedings. Under these circumstances the objection now made cannot be sustained.

Lastly, we are pressed with the impolicy of exercising the power to punish abusive publications as contempts.

We decline to weigh the pro and con of this argument, in performing our duty as an appellate tribunal. Although by the statute (P. L. 1884, p. 219) we are to rehear the case of the appellant, both upon the law and the facts, to give such judgment as shall seem to be lawful and just, yet we are to do this in review of a judgment already rendered in the court below, for the protection of its own dignity, peace and good order; and if in such judgment there is found, according to the law and the facts, nothing unlawful or unjust, it should be affirmed, whether in our individual opinions it was politic or impolitic to set the machinery of prosecution in motion.

We consider the judgment of the Oyer and Terminer both legal and just, and therefore it is affirmed.

Cornelius A. DURIE, Collector of Harrington Township,

v.

James H. BLAUVELT et al., Admsrs. of Elisha Ruckman, Deceased.

*Foreign administrators are not liable to be sued in their representative character in the courts of this State.

(Decided November 4, 1886.)

RULE to show cause why administrators should not be ordered to pay a tax. Rule discharged.

Argued before Reed and Dixon, JJ.

The facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. P. W. Stagg, for the rule.

Mr. Edward Wells, of New York, contra.

Dixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The tax assessed against Elisha Ruckman for the year 1864, in the Township of Harrington, Bergen County, having been removed to this court by certiorari allowed to him in 1865, was affirmed by the judgment of this court.

In 1882, Elisha Ruckman died in Rockland County, New York, of which county he was then a resident; and subsequently his will was there proved, and James H. Blauvelt and Sarah M. Dorn were appointed by the surrogate of Rockland County his administrators cum testamento annexo.

The Collector of Harrington Township, having obtained a rule that these administrators cum testamento annexo show cause why they as such administrators should not be ordered to pay the tax, now moves that it be made absolute.

The motion must be denied, for the reason that foreign administrators are not liable to be sued in their representative capacity in the courts of this State. Banta v. Moore, 2 McCart. 97; Normand's Admr. v. Groggnard, 2 C. E.

It is unnecessary to consider the suggestion that these respondents might be held as executors de son tort, further than to say that the evidence does not show that they have committed any act in this State which would impose that character upon them; nor are they now prosecuted in that character, as they must be if such be the ground of responsibility. *Ditts v. Let the rule be discharged with costs.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

Maria Louisa MULFORD et al.,
v.

Horatio J. MULFORD.

1. A will gave testator's widow certain real estate in fee, and gave the residue of the estate to the executors in trust, one half of the income to go to the widow for life and the other half to testator's son "until he should become thirty years of age." It then gave to the widow and son the use and occupation of certain specified property "during the years above limited." Held, that the widow's use and occupation was not limited to the time when the son should become thirty years of age, but was intended to be for her life; that the devisees of the income of the residuary estate are entitled thereto from the death of the testator; and that proceeds of stone taken by the executors from quarries upon testator's land, opened before his death and never abandoned, are part of such income.
2. The will provided that if the son should die before reaching the age of thirty and the widow survive him, his half of the income should go to the executors, to be disposed of as they should see fit, but made no disposition in that case of the half of the corpus, the income of which was given to the widow. Held, that as the legal title to that half was in the trustees in trust only and not beneficially, it will go to those who, at the testator's death, were his next of kin or heirs at law, according as the property is personal or real.
3. The will provided that the executors might sell any of the property, except that the use of which was given to the widow and son, and in case it could not be advantageously sold, might mortgage it so far as necessary to pay borrowed money or to keep it in repair. Held, that the power to mortgage must be confined to the contingency of the inability to sell to advantage, and then exercised only so far as necessary; and that interest on such mortgages should be paid out of the income.

4. The will gave the widow's income, after her death; the estate in the event of the son's death before reaching thirty and after the death of the widow; and half of the estate upon the death of the widow in case the son reached thirty,—to the executors, to be disposed of as they might choose. Held, that these were absolute gifts, to take effect in the respective contingencies.
5. The will requested and empowered the survivor or survivors, in case of the death of any of the executors, to appoint other executors. Held, that a person so appointed takes the trust estate, as well as the duties of executorship, in place of his predecessor.

(Decided November 4, 1886.)

BILL for construction of will and instructions to executors. On final hearing. The facts are stated in the opinion. Messrs. Potter & Nixon, for complainants.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion;

Horatio J. Mulford, late of Bridgeton in this State, died July 16, 1885. By his will dated March 8, 1884, he first directed that his executors pay all his just debts and funeral expenses. By the second section he gave to his wife in fee, in lieu of dower, a house and lot in Wenonah in this State, and a house and lot in Bridgeton, together with certain other interests, thereafter particularly specified, in his personal and real estate. By the third he devised and bequeathed, gave, granted and conveyed unto his executors all the residue and remainder of his estate real and personal, of which he should die seized and possessed, for the following uses, viz.: one half of the income of it for the use of his wife, for life, and the other half for the use of his son Horatio J. Mulford, until he should become thirty years of age, the testator's wife and son "during the years above limited" to have the use and occupation of the house and lot where the testator resided, on the northeast corner of Atlantic and Vine Streets, in Bridgeton, together with the household furniture contained therein, and also to have the use and occupation of his horses, carriages and riding equipments, and his stable and lawn at the southeast corner of those streets to within 100 feet of the line of Ludy's lot.

He directed that after the death of his wife, the income of one half of his estate should be used as his executors might choose to dispose of it; that in the event of his son's death before attaining the age of thirty years, and before the death of his wife, the income of one half of the estate should be used as his executors might choose to dispose of it; and that in the event of his son's death before arriving at the age of thirty years and after his, the testator's, wife's death, all of the estate be disposed of as his executors might choose. And he directed his executors, when his son should have attained the age of thirty years, to set off according to the best of their judgment one half of his estate, and assign, set over, grant and convey it to his son, to the sole use of his son, his heirs and assigns forever; and that should his son desire to have the house, lot, stable and lawn, which at the time of making the will were occupied by the testator, included in his half of the estate, they might be so set off to him, subject to the before mentioned privilege of the testator's wife in those premises; the remaining half of the estate after the wife's decease to be disposed of as the executors might choose.

He also provided that his executors might in their discretion sell any of his real or personal estate except that part, the occupation whereof he had given to his wife and son, either at public or private sale and invest the proceeds for the benefit of his estate, and that if for any reason the property could not be sold advantageously, they might mortgage it, so far as necessary to pay borrowed money, or to keep it in good condition and repair. He appointed his wife and his sisters his executors to carry out the provisions of the will, and added that after the death of any of his executors the survivors or survivor were requested and empowered to appoint other executors to fill any such places as might be thus made vacant by death until the will should have been wholly executed.

The bill is filed to obtain a construction of the will and instructions and directions to the executors in the discharge of their duties under it. Numerous questions are presented for decision. Such of them as it is necessary or proper to decide, in order to enable the executors understandingly and correctly to perform their duties and discharge their trusts, will be answered. The others, which are based upon a hypothetical state of facts which may never exist, it is not necessary and it would not be proper to pass upon at this time.

The gift of use and occupation to the wife in the third section is a gift for life. The will by the first section directs that all the testator's just debts and funeral expenses be paid by the executors, and then gives to the testator's wife certain real property in fee. It then gives all the residue and remainder of the estate to the executors in trust for certain uses, viz.: one half of the income of it is to go to his wife for life and the other half to the use of his son until he shall become thirty years old. He then gives to his wife and son, "during the years above limited," the use and occupation of certain specified real and personal property.

The doubt as to the extent of the duration of the wife's estate has arisen from the words just quoted, "during the years above limited." That the testator did not intend to limit the wife's use and occupation to the time when his son should attain to the age of thirty years is evident from the fact that he provides that if at that time his son shall desire that that particular real property shall be set off to him as part of his half of the estate, it shall be done not absolutely, but "subject to the privilege of the wife therein above described," referring to the gift of use and occupation to her. From that provision it is entirely clear that the testator did not intend to limit the wife's use and occupation to the time when his son should attain to the age of thirty years, but meant that she should have such use and occupation for life.

The taxes upon that property and the cost of ordinary repairs thereto should be paid by the trustees, out of the income of the estate. There is nothing in the will to indicate an intention on the part of the testator that those expenses should be paid out of the corpus of the estate. So long as, under the will, the wife and son are entitled to joint occupation of the property, each is also entitled to one half of the income of the estate. The trustees should retain and pay out of the income, before dividing it, the taxes and cost of ordinary repairs upon that property up to the time when the property is to be divided.

The widow is entitled to one half of the income of the estate for life, and she is entitled to nothing except what is given to her by the will. The $200 exemption as it is called would be in conflict with the terms and provisions of the will.

In case the widow should die before the son reached the age of thirty years, her half of the income will go to the trustees to be disposed of as they shall see fit.

If the son survive the widow and attain to the age of thirty years, one half of the corpus of the estate will go to him under the provisions of the will. The corpus of the other half will, in case the widow should predecease the son, go upon her death to the trustees, to be disposed of as they may choose.

If the son die before reaching the age of thirty years and the widow survive him, by the terms of the will his half of the income is to go to the executors to be disposed of as they shall see fit. But the testator makes no disposition in that case of the corpus of the half, the income of which is given to her. Although the legal title to that half of the corpus is in the trustees, yet it is not in them beneficially but only in trust. The general rule is that whenever it appears upon a conveyance, devise or bequest, that it was intended that the grantee, devisee or legatee, should take the legal estate only, the equitable interest, or so much of it as is left undisposed of, will result, if arising out of the settlor's realty, to himself or his heirs; if out of his personal estate, to himself, his executors or administrators. Perry, Tr. § 150.

That share of the corpus will therefore, under those circumstances, go to those who at the testator's death were his next of kin or heirs at law, according as the property is personal or real.

The income given by the will to the widow and the son is the income of the residuary estate; they are entitled to it from the death of the testator. Green v. Green, 30 N. J. Eq. 451.

The proceeds of the sale of building stone, taken by the executors from quarries upon the testator's land which were opened before his death and never abandoned, are part of such income. Gaines v. Green Pond Iron Mining Co. 33 N. J. Eq. 608.

The provision that if for any reason such of the testator's real estate as he has given the executors power to sell cannot be sold advantageously, the executors may mortgage it, so far as necessary to pay borrowed money or to keep the property in good condition and repair, has no reference to the payment of money borrowed by the testator himself, but refers to such money as the executors may find it necessary to borrow for the preservation of the estate. They are empowered to borrow money upon mortgage of the property to pay borrowed money, or to keep the property in good condition and repair.

The will provides in the first section that all of the testator's just debts and funeral expenses shall be paid by the executors; and after the specific gift to his wife he gives all the residue to the executors. He does not charge his debts or any of them upon his real property, in exoneration or in relief of his personal estate. The power to mortgage is not given in connection with any provision for or any reference to the payment of his debts, but in connection with the sale of his real estate. In view of the fact that the executors may not be able to sell advantageously the real estate which he has empowered them to sell, and hence may be compelled in order to keep it up to expend money upon it, he authorizes them to borrow such money, if necessary, and secure the payment thereof by mortgage upon the property; or to secure the payment of the expenses of keeping the property in good condition and repair by such mortgage. The provision authorizes them to raise or secure the payment of such money by mortgage of the property instead of taking it from the income of the estate as otherwise they would have been bound to do. Combes v. Cadmus, 86 N. J. Eq. 382.

It is the duty of the executors to sell that part of the real estate which they are empowered to sell, if they can do so advantageously, rather than to hold it and make expenditures upon it which are to be paid for by money borrowed upon mortgage of it, or to mortgage it to pay the expenses of keeping it in good condition and repair. The power to mortgage is not a general one but one which is to be exercised in a certain contingency, that of the inability of the executors to sell the property to good advantage; and then it is to be exercised only so far as necessary.

The interest upon such mortgages should be paid out of the income of the estate. The object in providing that the money may be raised upon mortgage is to relieve the income for the time being of the burden of large expenditures for repairs, etc., which otherwise it would have to bear. There is no evidence that the testator intended that the interest should be paid out of the corpus of the estate. The testator's indebtedness for borrowed money is to be paid in the same way as his other debts. The executors should use their discretion as to the selling that part of the real estate which they are empowered to sell. There is no absolute direction to convert the property into money, but merely authority to them to sell it if they see fit.

The gift of income, after the death of the widow, to the executors, to be used as they may choose to dispose of it, and the gift of the estate to them in the event of the son's death before he is thirty years old and after the death of the widow to be disposed of as they may choose, and the gift of half of the corpus of the estate after the death of the widow in case the son reaches the age of thirty years to be disposed of as they may choose, are all absolute gifts to take effect in the respective contingencies mentioned.

The testator requests and impowers the survivor or survivors in case of the death of any of the executors, to appoint other executors to fill any such places as may be thus made vacant by death, until the will shall have been wholly executed. The person or persons who may be thus appointed will not only take the place of the deceased executor or executors so far as the duties of executorship are concerned, but will be clothed with the trust estate in the place of his, her or their predecessor or predecessors.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK of Jersey City et al.,
v.

Charles W. KIMBALL et al.

The Wallis Iron Works, being indebted to the Phoenix Iron Company and to the First National Bank, assigned certain claims in its favor to a trustee, to collect the same and apply so much of the proceeds as might be necessary on its debt to the iron company and to pay over the balance to the Bank. The person appointed trustee, selected by the mutual consent of all parties, was, when the assignment was made, acting as attorney for the iron company in a suit by it against the iron works, for the debt on account of which the assignment was given, which suit was settled by giving the assignment. Thereafter a bill was filed by the Bank and the Iron Works, seeking to have the amount of one of the assigned claims, which the trustee was charged with having negligently failed to collect, credited on the debt to the iron company, upon the ground that on account of the relations between the trustee and the iron company, that company was liable for the loss occasioned by the trustee's negligence. Held, that the fact that the trustee was at the time of the assignment acting as attorney for the iron company imposed no obligation or liability upon it beyond what would have rested upon it had a stranger been appointed; and that, under the facts of the case, that company is no more responsible to the other parties for any negligence or default on the part of the trustee than those parties are responsible to it therefor.

(Decided November 2, 1886.)

BILL for relief. Upon order to show cause why preliminary injunction should not be issued. On bill and answer (of Kimball) and affidavits on both sides. Order and stay discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wallis & Edwards, for complainants.

Mr. Charles W. Kimball, defendant, pro se.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

The bill is filed by the First National Bank of Jersey City and the Wallis Iron Works, a corporation of this State, against Charles W. Kimball and the Phoenix Iron Company, a Pennsylvania corporation. The facts stated by the bill are as follows:

In September, 1884, the Wallis Iron Works was indebted to the Phoenix Iron Company to the amount of $12,641.52, to recover which the latter had brought suits which were then pending against the former in New York and in this State. The Wallis Iron Works had on or about the 17th of June, 1884 (in order to secure to the First National Bank of Jersey City a payment of about $18,000 which it owed to the Bank), assigned to the latter certain claims in its favor, one against John Lee of Brooklyn, N. Y., for $18,191.48, and another against Moore & Carr of Syracuse, N. Y., for $880, to be collected so far as necessary to the payment of its claim against the iron works.

By an instrument dated September 22, 1884 (it is said that it was not executed and delivered until on or about November 12, 1884) made in pursuance of an arrangement between the Bank, and the iron works and the iron company, the Bank and the iron works sold, assigned, transferred and set over to Charles W. Kimball all claims and demands of every nature and description held or owned by them against the above mentioned John Lee and Moore & Carr, and all claims and demands against W. R. & H. Haven, D. Van Orden & Co., and Austin Gibbons, together with all liens and securities held or owned by them therefor and all moneys due or to grow due thereon, in trust to collect, receive and receipt for all the moneys due or to grow due thereon, or with the assent of the iron works to compromise the claims and upon receipt of payment thereof to release and discharge the liens or other securities; he to take all lawful means for the collection of the claims; and out of the moneys received, first to pay all reasonable costs and expenses actually incurred in the collection, and then to pay in full all existing claims of the iron company against the iron works, the amount of which was thereby fixed at $12,641.52, on the 10th of September, 1883, and pay over the balance to the Bank.

Mr. Kimball, the trustee, was the attorney of the iron company in the suit brought against the iron works in this State and was nominated by Isaac L. Miller, the New York attorney of the iron company, as a proper person to be trustee, and the nomination was agreed to.

The bill states that the iron company and Kimball might, with proper diligence, have collected the entire claim against Lee (which was a debt due him from the North River Construction Company, an insolvent corporation of this State) but that by their negligence they failed to do so. When the assignment to Kimball was made a receiver of the construction company had been appointed by this court. About two months after the assignment was made Lee made, in the State of New York, where he lived, an assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors, with preferences; but the claim of the iron works was not among those which were preferred. After that assignment had been made, Kimball, having first obtained leave of this court so to do, issued an attachment against Lee in this State, upon that claim, in order thus to reach the debt due from the construction company to Lee by attaching it, notwithstanding the assignment, in the hands of the receiver who resided in this State; the intention being to maintain, under the attachment, that the assignment was, on account of the fact that it made preferences, against the policy of our laws, and therefore passed no title to the debt due from the construction company as against New Jersey creditors.

The attachment was levied, but it was discontinued because the sheriff had, without authority, altered the return to a date exceeding thirty days from the time of filing the affidavit upon which the writ was issued and had not executed the writ within the thirty days; and it was apprehended that the fact that the writ was not returned and was not executed within the thirty days would render the attachment under it void. When it was placed in the sheriff's hands the writ was returnable within the thirty days. Another writ was then issued and delivered to the sheriff who, without any directions so to do, returned it unexecuted. A third writ was issued and under it the claim was attached; but the writ was not issued until after the receiver had made a compromise with Lee's assignee, by which the latter, acting under the order of the court in New York, agreed to receive and the former agreed to pay him, fifty cents upon the dollar of the claim, in full of the demand. This court held that that agreement was a novation of the debt, and that by it the receiver had become bound to the assignee to pay the amount agreed upon, and that therefore the attachment was of no avail. Kimball v. Lee, 18 Stew. 408 [ante, 832].

The bill states that the amount collectible from Lee was $11,795, with interest from January 1, 1884, altogether, at the date of filing the bill, $13,885 or thereabouts; that Kimball has collected from Holmes Brothers, under the assignment in trust, $5,820 or thereabouts, and that those amounts are together more than enough to pay the claim of the iron company against the iron works, including the compensation of the trustee. It prays that Kimball may be decreed to account for the claims assigned to him in trust and the proceeds thereof, and that upon such accounting the Lee claim may be applied at its full face value with interest, towards the satisfaction of the debt of the iron company, and that he may be decreed to account for and transfer to the Bank all the claims assigned to him which remain uncollected, and all moneys in his hands, realized from the claims assigned to him, in excess of the amount which, with the full amount of the Lee claim and interest thereon, will pay and discharge the debt of the iron company, together with the reasonable expenses of the trust; and that he may be enjoined from paying over, assigning or making any disposition of any of the moneys or claims in his hands except to pay or deliver them to the Bank.

Kimball has answered. There are numerous affidavits appended to the bill and answer respectively in support of the allegations in each. In the very full briefs put in on each side several questions are discussed; but it is only necessary to consider one of them, and that is whether the relation which Kimball as trustee held to the iron company was such as to make the company responsible for his negligences and defaults, if there were any.

The bill alleges that the iron company, through Kimball as its attorney and trustee, undertook the sole and exclusive charge of the collection of the claims assigned to him and of each and all of them, and that neither the Bank nor the iron works had any control or voice in the matter from the time of making the assignment.

According to the answer, the iron works through its president and counsel assumed and exercised in fact more control over the proceedings in this State to enforce payment of the Lee claim than did the iron company or any person in its behalf; and Kimball swears that two suits were commenced by attachment in December, 1885, or January following, by the law firm of which the president of the iron works was a member, as attorneys, upon claims assigned to him, Kimball, by the assignment in trust; that one was the claim against W. R. & W. Haven, and the other the claim against Moore & Carr; that the before mentioned law firm have had entire control over those suits and that those suits were not begun at his request but were commenced without asking his consent. He also says that that firm were the solicitors of record in the before mentioned suit of Kimball v. Lee in this court; that the president of the iron works drew the bill and argued the motion for an injunction, and advised the appeal which was taken and which is still pending.

It appears that when the arrangement which resulted in the assignment in trust was made, Mr. Miller, who as before stated was the New York attorney for the iron company in the collection of its claim against the iron works, suggested (he swears that it was merely a suggestion) Mr. Kimball as a proper person for trustee, and that the suggestion was accepted promptly by the counsel of the Bank and the iron works. Mr. Kimball swears that after the assignment in trust was made, he could not properly have, and in fact did not have, the relation of attorney to the iron company, nor any other relation except that of trustee as clearly defined in the assignment.

The fact that the person who was appointed trustee was, when the assignment was made, the attorney at law of the iron company in the suit for the settlement whereof the arrangement which resulted in the assignment was entered into imposed no obligation or liability upon that company, beyond what would have rested upon it had one who was an entire stranger been appointed such trustee.

The theory of the bill is manifestly that the iron company is to be held to precisely the same accountability as it would have been if the assignment had been made to it. This claim is based wholly upon the proposition that the assignment to Kimball was an assignment to the iron company because when it was made he was acting for that company as its attorney at law in the collection of the debt due to it from the iron works.

The proposition cannot be maintained. Mr. Kimball was selected by mutual consent of the parties to the assignment, to be the trustee. He was trustee for all according to their interests in the subject of the trust; and he is responsible to all accordingly. He did not represent the iron company in any different way from that in which he represented the other parties; and that company is no more responsible to the other parties for his malfeasances, misfeasances, neglects or defaults, if any there were, than those parties are responsible to the iron company therefor.

The order to show cause and the ad interim stay will be discharged, with costs.

HUBBARD'S ADMR.

v.

B. G. CLARK, Assignee of Selden T. Scranton & Co. and of Selden T. Scranton.

1. A bill to enforce the vendor's lien for the purchase money of land conveyed by one since deceased is properly brought by the vendor's administrator, and the heirs at law need not be joined; and this, although the heirs had dealt with the vendee directly in reference to the purchase money.
2. Neither the widow of the vendor nor her representatives, if she be dead, although interested in the demand, need be made parties to such suit.
3. The establishment of a vendor's lien for purchase money is an equitable and not a legal remedy.
4. A vendor's lien, or lien by way of equitable mortgage because of a promise to give a mortgage to secure purchase money, held superior to the claim of an assignee representing judgment creditors of a firm of which the vendee was a member.
5. A vendor's lien for purchase money extends, on his death, to his personal representatives.

(Filed November 15, 1886.)

BILL in equity to recover a balance of purchase money on the sale of a farm. Decree for complainant advised.

The facts are stated in the conclusions of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. Rosenkrans, for complainant.

Mr. McGee, for defendants.

Bird, V. C., filed the following conclusions: The bill in this cause was filed in August, 1884, to recover $2,063.33, a balance of purchase money on the sale of a farm by H., the intestate, to S. T. S. in April, 1865, under an agreement made in May, 1864. The consideration was $8,000, of which $2,000 was paid at the execution of the agreement; and a mortgage was to have been given to secure the balance, with interest payable in installments of $2,000 each, on April 1, 1865, 1866 and 1867. But no mortgage was given. S. T. S. went into possession as owner and made an agreement with H., his vendor, that he should continue to occupy the farm for a fixed money rent. S. T. S. did not pay the installment of $2,000 April 1, 1865; nor did he make any payment until May, 1866, when he paid $184. In June, 1866, he paid $1,000.

H. died July 6, 1867, and July 15, letters of administration were issued to the complainant.

H. was in possession at the time of his death. He left a widow and six children, who continued in possession. With these S. T. S. made an agreement by which they were to pay a certain rent, but which rent was to be applied in payment to them of the purchase money still due. With this the administrator had nothing to do. The widow and children continued in such possession, making appropriation of the rent as indicated, until September 5, 1878, when Selden T. Scranton & Co. made an assignment under the Act for the benefit of creditors, to B. G. Clark, one of the defendants.

On the 10th of same month S. T. S. made an assignment of his own personal assets for the benefit of his creditors. The farm conveyed by H. to S. T. S. is named in both assignments among the list of assets. It is admitted that while said farm was purchased by S. T. S. and the deed taken in his own name he, in fact, purchased it for the firm and the payments made were made with the firm's money. After these assignments the widow and one or more of the children of H. continued in possession, until August, 1884, when the assignee had advertised the farm for sale. He advertised both as assignee of S. T. S. & Co. and as assignee of S. T. S.

The complainant, as administrator of H., filed his bill to restrain this sale and, as stated, to have the amount still due declared to be a lien and to compel its payment. The claims proved against S. T. S. & Co. were over $400,000 and antedated the assignment, and there is not sufficient assets to pay them. The claims proved against S. T. S. personally will more than swallow up all his personal assets.

First, it is said that the bill is defective because the children of H., as heirs at law, are not parties. This view is pressed on the ground that the administrator did not claim the consideration money as personal estate, but allowed the children to treat with the vendee in reference thereto directly. This view cannot be sustained. The land was not only agreed to be conveyed, which of itself works a conversion, but was actually conveyed, so that at law an action could have been maintained for the consideration. The fact that a mortgage was to have been given to secure the balance cannot work a reconversion. Had such mortgage been executed and delivered, it would have been a personal asset and gone to the administrator.

Second, it is urged that the widow of H. having died before the filing of the bill, and having been entitled to one third of the amount of the purchase money, still unpaid at the time of her husband's death and which at her death was still unpaid, the amount, so due to her, devolves upon her next of kin, whom the complainant has brought no one in to represent. This is true as to her rights and death, but not as to legal consequences.

The death of Mrs. H. worked no change as to the method of devolution. After her death, as well as before, the administrator was entitled to all the personal estate of the decedent. When he brings his suit to recover a demand, whatever its character, he never makes any of the next of kin parties. The death of one who survives the first decedent does not confer any greater right on his or her next of kin; so that if a child of H. dies leaving children, such children would not be made a party by the administrator of B. in a suit to foreclose a mortgage, or to recover on a bond or note or book account. I believe this is without exception. This being so, had the widow of H. been living at the time of filing the bill, she would not have been either a necessary or a proper party; and, as a consequence, neither her representative nor her next of kin need be brought in.

Third, it is urged that the claim of the next of kin of H. and of his widow, since deceased, is barred by the Statute of Limitations. This cannot be, since S. T. S. treated with the next of kin and widow, respecting this unpaid purchase money until the year 1878 when the assignments were made, and from time to time made payments to said next of kin as they came of age. The assignments were made in September, 1878, and the bill was filed in August, 1884: Independently of the vendor's lien, therefore, the statute had not begun to run. The bill was filed within twenty years from the time of the execution and delivery of the deed.

Fourth, the claim that the complainant has an adequate remedy at law is quite untenable. The object of this suit is to preserve and establish the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money. I believe that this is always done in equity, and this seems to be the spirit of the cases. Payne v. Wilson, 74 N. Y. 348; Re Howe, 1 Paige, 125; Jones, Mort. § 163.

Fifth, while it is admitted that as between the assignee of S. T. S. and the next of kin the lien may be good unless barred by laches, it is insisted that it is different as between the assignee of S. T. S. & Co. and the next of kin. It is said that as such assignee he represents judgment creditors and that they are entitled to priority. But it will be noticed that in this case they are judgment creditors of the company and that the title to the land was in S. T. S. Another consideration of great weight is that the assignee and all who claim under him had ample notice; for all the facts necessary to perfect such notice were set forth in the deeds of assignment. Besides, the counsel of the respective parties seem to have had full information on the subject. I think the vendor's lien, or lien by way of equitable mortgage because of the agreement to give one, is still entitled to its superiority. See the cases above cited and Jones, Mort. § 202.

Sixth, I can find no fact or circumstance in the case to justify the defendants in pressing the doctrine of laches. Time was given for the benefit of the vendee alone, and for the court to charge the other party with laches would indeed be uprooting everything.

Seventh, learned counsel pressed with apparent confidence, as good law, the assertion that the lien died with the vendor. It extends to his personal representatives. Story, Eq. § 1227.

I think these considerations show that the bill is well filed; that the proper parties are before the court, and that the balance due is a lien on the land. I believe there is no dispute as to the amount. I will advise a decree to the effect that if the amount due and the taxed costs be not paid within thirty days after a service of a copy of the decree, in that case an execution shall issue.

v.

Pauline C. CAMPBELL et al.

1. A will gave a life estate to testator's wife, and then provided that at her death and after his son A. attained majority, the property should be divided between testator's children E., T. and A., equally. A subsequent clause provided that in case testator's wife died, and A. did not live to majority, the whole estate should be held in trust for E. and T. until a certain date, and then be divided between them. The next clause provided that in case either of testator's children should die leaving issue, such issue should receive the share devised to the child so dying. The will also provided that T. should have use of testator's interest in business, so long as the estate was undivided; and should pay interest on the appraised value thereof. T. died before testator's wife, leaving issue. Held,

(a) That the word "either" was used in the sense of "any"; that testator's children took a contingent and not a vested interest, and that therefore T. having died before the period fixed for division of the estate arrived, his share belonged to his children.

(b) That, under the circumstances, T.'s children are subject to the same equities to which he would have been had he lived to the time fixed for division, and that therefore their share is to be charged with interest on the value of testator's interest in business.

(Decided October 26, 1886.)

BILL for partition. On final hearing upon pleadings and stipulation of counsel.

The facts and questions raised are set out in the opinion.

Mr. C. T. Glen, for complainant.

Mr. P. W. Cross, for heirs of Theodore R.

LaFoy:

The interest of Theodore R. LaFoy in the estate of J. B. M. LaFoy did not vest in him until after the death of his mother Helena LaFoy.

Baldwin v. Taylor, 10 Stew. 78.

If a legacy given to one at the death of a person named is given to another in case such legatee should die, this is held to refer to death in the life of the person at whose death it is given. Such legacy is held to vest at the death of the testator, subject to be divested on the happening of the event, that is, dying in the life of the person named.

Beatty's Admr. v. Montgomery's Exrs. 6 C. E. Green, 324-327; Hawk. Wills, 254; Williamson v. Chamberlain, 2 Stock. 873.

Mr. Howard W. Hayes, for the widow and heirs of David A. Hayes, deceased:

The sixth clause is substitutionary; and the rule is that a clause of substitution is to be referred to the death of the testator.

N. J.

3 Jarm. Wills (R. & T. ed.), 640; Goodall v. McLean, 2 Bradf. 809.

It is a rule that when death is treated as a contingent event, and the context shows nothing, the time of death is to be regarded as the contingent event, and the contingency in time is made to be the death of the testator.

Barrell v. Barrell, 11 Stew. 60.

If, however, the contingent estate is limited after a life estate, the English rule is that the contingency is death during the lifetime of the life tenant. In the present case there is no need of the court supplying a contingency, as "die leaving issue" is a contingency in itself.

Being substitutionary takes the clause out of the English rule. The English rule does not apply here.

Runyon, Chancellor, delivered the following opinion:

Jean B. Manzagot dit LaFoy, late of Newark, deceased, by his will made in 1848, after directing that his debts and funeral charges be paid, devised and bequeathed to his wife the use of all of his estate, real and personal, for life. He then provided that in case his wife should die before his son Adolphus should arrive at the age of twenty-one years, his executors should appropriate all income arising from his estate, or so much thereof as might be necessary for the purpose, to the support and education of Adolphus until he should attain to his majority. He then, by the fourth section of the will, provided that after the death of his wife, and after Adolphus should have attained to the age of twenty-one years, all his estate should be equally divided between his, the testator's three children, Evelina, Theodore and Adolphus.

By the fifth section he provided that in case his wife should die and Adolphus should not live until he should be twenty-one years of age, all his estate should go to his executors (to whom he thereby gave it accordingly) in trust for Evelina and Theodore, to be held by them undivided and unappropriated until the 4th of March, 1858, when they were to divide it between those two children.

By the sixth section he provided that in case either of his children should die leaving lawful issue, such issue should receive the share of his estate devised to such child so dying.

By the seventh section he ordered that after his decease his interest in the business carried on by Theodore should be appraised by one or more independent persons, and that Theodore should have the use of it so long as the testator's estate should remain undivided between his children, on Theodore's paying to the testator's wife during her life, and after her decease to his executors, the lawful interest on the amount of the appraised value of such interest in the business; and he also provided that in case Theodore should at any time wish to pay all or any part of that appraised value, such payments should be appropriated to pay off the mortgages upon the testator's houses in Fair Street, in Newark, the property of which partition is sought in this suit.

The testator died in 1848. His widow died in 1863. Theodore died in or about 1859, leaving a widow and children, Evelina, who married Peter Paul N. D'Alvigny, died in 1849. She left two children. Adolphus is still living. The complainant is his wife and owns his share of the real property. It was conveyed to her in 1876. In or about 1856 David A. Hayes (now deceased) bought the interest of Theodore in that property at sheriff's sale, under judgments and executions against the latter; and it was conveyed to him accordingly in that year. The interest of the testator in the business before referred to was appraised at $411.99. Theodore had the use of it and paid interest upon it up to May 9, 1856, but no interest has been paid thereon since then. The principal has not been paid nor has any part of it.

Two questions are presented for decision: first, whether the estate of Theodore in the property was vested or contingent; and second, whether the value of the testator's before mentioned interest in Theodore's business and the interest thereon since May 9, 1856, are a charge upon the share of the testator's estate given by the will to Theodore.

If Theodore had a vested indefeasible interest in the property of the testator, his children have now no interest in the property of which partition is sought in this suit; for his interest therein was sold under judgments against him and executions thereon; and it is now owned by the widow and heirs at law of Mr. Hayes, who died intestate. By the will the testator gives a life estate to his widow, and then provides that at her death and after his son Adolphus shall have attained to his majority, the property shall be divided between his, the testator's three children, Evelina, Theodore and Adolphus, share and share alike. It is obvious that standing alone, this latter provision is a gift of a remainder in fee to the children in the real property, and an absolute gift in remainder of the personal estate.

But the provision of the sixth section affects and qualifies the gift. By that provision the children of any child dying before the period of distribution are substituted for the parent; so that the gift to the parents in the fourth section is made defeasible by the sixth.

It is urged that the use of the word "either" in the sixth section indicates that the testator intended that the provisions of that section should have reference to those of the fifth only, and that he intended that there should be substitution of children for parents only under the circumstances mentioned in the fifth section. But such a construction would be too narrow and restricted. The word "either" is used in the sense of "any." The object of the testator was to keep his estate undivided, for the benefit of his family, until his wife's death; and beyond that period until March 4, 1858, if she and Adolphus should both die before the latter should have attained to the age of twenty-one years; and in case the widow should die before Adolphus should have attained to his majority, and he should live to attain to it, then the estate was to remain undivided until he should have become of age.

The testator's intention was that the estate should be preserved as a whole until the time fixed for division, and that when division should take place it should go to his family, to his children; but if they or any of them should be dead, leaving children, their children should take in their stead, and that so the property should be kept for the family until the time of division. The provisions under consideration are similar to those which were construed in Baldwin v. Taylor, 10 Stew. 78; S. C. 11 Stew. 687. The share in question belongs to Theodore's children.

As to the second question: the money which the testator directed his executors to leave in the hands of Theodore was not indeed charged by the will upon the share given to the latter; but had Theodore lived to participate in the division, his share would have been chargeable with the debt and the interest thereon from the time of the death of the widow. And although his interest in the testator's estate was defeasible upon his dying, leaving children, before the period of distribution, and although he did not live until that time and his children take by virtue of the provisions of the will, the share is in equity chargeable with the debt. The testator gives the shares of his children to their children in case of the death of the former, by way of substitution, merely; his object being, as before stated, to make sure that the property could go to his family at the time of division. Under the circumstances, Theodore's children are subject to the same equities to which he would have been subject had he lived to the time of division. Denise v. Denise, 10 Stew. 163.

As in justice and equity the $411.99 and the unpaid interest thereon since the death of the widow would have been chargeable against the share if it were coming to him, and he would have been required to take the share subject to the payment thereof, so they taking the share in his stead must in like manner take it upon the same equitable condition. The share is not subject to the payment of the interest which was given by the will to the widow; for that interest belonged to her and not to the estate and if it was not collected the loss was hers.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

SUPREME COURT.

Columbus THAW, Appl.,

v.

Maria RITCHIE.

1. By virtue of the Act of Maryland of 1798, chap. 101, subchap. 12, § 10, the Orphans' Court of this District was empowered in 1848 to order a sale by a guardian of a part of his ward's real estate for the latter's maintenance and education.
2. The above mentioned Act was not repealed by the Act of Congress of March 3, 1843.
3. When there is no moment that the remainderman in fee would not have an immediate right to the estate on the death of the life tenant, it is a vested remainder.
4. A devise of a life estate and then a devise over in fee to two persons in equal parts, with a devise of the share of him dying first to the survivor, creates a vested remainder in fee; the devise to the survivor being simply an executory devise over of a fee after a fee.
5. A devise over in fee to the life tenant in case she survives the two remaindermen is also such an executory devise.
6. The objection to the sale of an infant's estate in remainder, because of the uncertainty of its value, is removed when the life tenant joins in the sale.
7. There is nothing in the Act of 1798 which excludes future interests from being sold equally with estates in possession.
8. Nor does it exclude the sale of trust estates where the trust is purely personal to the infant; for the trust would cease at the moment of the transfer of their title, and the purchaser would take the legal title by operation of the Statute of Uses.
9. No particular form of application, or allegation, or proof, is prescribed as necessary to give the court jurisdiction under the Act of 1798. It is sufficient that it is satisfied, in however informal a manner, that the sale is advantageous to the ward, with reference to his maintenance and education; and there need be no record entered of the evidence upon which it decides that fact.
10. A purchaser under such a decree is not bound to look beyond the decree.
11. The "approval" of the decree of the orphans' court, provided by the Act of 1798, to be made by the chancellor, is a revisory and not an appellate proceeding; and as the statute provides no formalities by which the chancellor is to take cognizance of the proceedings in the orphans' court, that is to be adjusted by the practice of the court.
12. One not a party to a deed and who does not claim under it is not estopped by its recitals.

18. Where a bill of exceptions sets out two rulings of the court, but the exception taken is so ambiguous that it cannot be ascertained which of the rulings was excepted to, the court will disregard the bill altogether.

(Decided October 11, 1886.)

APPEAL from a judgment in favor of defendant in an action of ejectment. Affirmed. On rehearing. The former decision, reported 1 Cent. Rep. 838, reversed.

The action was brought to recover an undivided moiety in two lots of ground which the plaintiff claimed in fee simple under the will of his father. The defendant claimed title under a sale of the plaintiff's interest by his guardian, which sale was made by virtue of an order of the orphans' court January 21, 1848, and approval thereof by the equity court. Defendant claimed that this order and sale passed a valid title under the Act of Maryland of 1798, chap. 101, subchap. 12, § 10, giving jurisdiction to the orphans' court in certain cases. The jurisdiction of that court to entertain the application of the guardian and to order the sale was the principal point in dispute.

The case was originally heard by two justices and a decision rendered, holding that the orphans' court was without jurisdiction to order the sale. See 1 Cent. Rep. 838.

Afterwards this motion for a rehearing before a full bench was granted.

Further facts are set forth in the opinion.

Messrs. F. P. Stanton and S. R. Bond, for appellant.

Messrs. Appleby & Edmonston, for respondent.

Mr. Justice Cox delivered the opinion of the court:

The question of paramount importance in the case is how far the orphans' court is empowered, by the Act of Assembly of Maryland of 1798, chap. 101, subchap. 12, § 10, to order a sale by a guardian, of his ward's real estate, on account of the ward's maintenance and education.

This statute was continued in force as the law of this District by the Act of Congress entitled "An Act Concerning the District of Columbia, Approved February 27, 1801."

It will assist us in the interpretation of the Act to consider the state of the law of Maryland on this subject at the date of its passage.

There were, at that time, several Acts in force, under which proceedings could be instituted affecting the title of infants to their real estate.

By the Act of Assembly of 1785, chap. 72, § 12, the chancellor was empowered to direct a sale of lands in which an infant had a joint interest or interest in common with any other person or persons, on its appearing that it would be for the advantage of the infant as well as of the others, he taking care that the infant's share in the proceeds be paid over to him.

But the object of this Act was simply partition. It was as much in the interest of the adult co-owner as of the minor, and enabled the former to sell his property, which he could not do without the aid of the law, on account of the disability of his cotenant. But it contained no provision as to the management and application of the minor's share, and did not apply at all to property held by him in severalty. Indeed, on the next day after this Act was passed, the Act known as chapter 80 of the same session was passed, which did undertake to direct the application of the minor's estate, and which limited the consumption of the principal to the personal estate.

So, under the Act of Descents of 1786, chap. 45, if descended lands could not be partitioned between the heirs, they might be sold by commissioners under an order of the county court, if the land all lay in the same county; from which order an appeal might be taken to the chancellor. If the lands lay in different counties, the chancellor might directly decree the sale. In this case, the sale was ordered without reference to the interests of any infant heir, but because of the impossibility of partition.

In virtue of its inherent jurisdiction over the subject of partition, the court of chancery has exercised original concurrent jurisdiction with the county courts, in the cases provided for by this statute.

There were other Acts providing for the sale or conveyance of property in which infants were interested, for the benefit of creditors of the ancestor, or in pursuance of contracts made by him.

But the above mentioned statutes constitute all the legislation of Maryland before the Act of 1798, which authorized the sale of infants' property, in the interests of the parties entitled.

It will be seen that it is limited to cases of ownership by the infant jointly or in common with others, and that it does not contemplate any disposition of the minor's estate beyond its conversion into money. Certainly, no authority could be claimed, under the Acts referred to, to apply the principal of the estate to maintenance or education.

The Court of Appeals of Maryland, in several cases of comparatively recent date, have expressed the opinion that the court of chancery had an inherent power to decree the sale of an infant's real estate, independently of statutes authorizing it.

The first case in which this occurred was that of Dorsey v. Gilbert, 11 Gill & J. 87, decided in 1839. A private Act had been passed authorizing the chancellor to decree the sale of an infant's realty. The chancellor held the law to be unconstitutional. The court of appeals reversed his decision and sustained the law. In the course of the opinion it says: "It was an undoubted power of the court of chancery, before any of our legislative Acts authorizing the sale of infant's estates, to convert the real estate of an infant into money; and many cases may be found where the guardians of infants, under particular circumstances, have been authorized to make this conversion. 2 Story, Eq. 585, 586, 587. The court of chancery, in the exercise of this jurisdiction, acted under a delegated authority from the King, who, as parens patriæ, had jurisdiction over the persons and estates of infants."

The court of appeals did not assume to act under this extraordinary power in that particular case, because there was a special statute to authorize the sale; and its decision was simply to uphold that statute as valid. The proposition above announced was not necessary to the decision of the case, and may be considered a dictum merely; yet it was followed by similar dicta in Downin v. Sprecher, 35 Md. 474; Long v. Long, 62 Md. 38; and a still more recent case of Taylor v. Peabody Heights Co., reported in the Central Reporter, vol. 8, No. 18, p. 867.

These expressions of opinion are not authoritative for us; and in passing I take occasion to say that in my judgment they are clearly erroneous.

The power seems to be asserted for the chancellor, on the ground that it had been exercised by the Court of Chancery of England; and the only authority cited for this is Story's Equity Jurisprudence.

The court was evidently misled by the general language of Story, asserting that a guardian will sometimes be allowed to convert personalty into realty and realty into personalty. Upon an examination of the cases referred to by Story, it will be found that they are principally cases in which the money of a ward was laid out in the purchase of land. In some of them it appeared that timber had been sold and the proceeds invested for the ward or applied to incumbrances. And these last are the only illustrations given of the conversion of realty into personalty. The guardian has also been allowed to lease his ward's land. But not a case is cited in which the chancellor decreed a sale of the infant's freehold estate. On the contrary, Lord Hardwicke said, in Taylor v. Philips, 2 Ves. 23:

"There is no instance of this court's binding the inheritance of an infant by any discretionary act of the court. As to personal things, as in the composition of debts, it has been done, but never as to the inheritance, for that would be taking on the court a legislative authority, doing that which is properly the subject of a private bill."

It would seem, then, that the only ground for the proposition of the court of appeals fails. But it is not so important what may have been thought by that learned court at the late dates of the cases referred to. The important question is: What was understood to be the law at the time when the Act of 1798 was passed? because we are to read that statute in the light of existing law.

At that time, no court in Maryland had asserted this power of sale; and there is no reported case either before or after that date in which either the chancellor or any county court, sitting as a court of equity, has ever decreed the sale of an infant's freehold in virtue of this extraordinary power of the parens patriæ, or in other cases than those provided for by statute.

On the contrary, as late as 1828 Chancellor Bland, in the Williams Case, 3 Bland, 186, reviewed this whole subject and examined all the English authorities at length, and said: "Nor have I been able to find any case in the English books in which the court has undertaken to change the nature of an infant's inheritance by selling the land itself and investing the proceeds for his benefit; or in which the court has sanctioned any such sale made by the guardian or trustee of an infant."

And again; after referring to sales made for partition or for payment of mortgage debts, he says: "And therefore it is that the English Court of Chancery has never, except in the cases above mentioned, undertaken to dispose of an infant's land or inheritance in real estate, and that, although many cases have arisen in which the income of an infant's estate has been found to be entirely insufficient for his support, yet it has rarely occurred that the court has broken in upon the capital of even his personal estate for the purpose of maintenance, though it has frequently done so for his education and putting him out in life."

If any Maryland authority existed before this date, for the power more recently asserted by the court of appeals, Chancellor Bland would surely have known it and referred to it.

It could hardly be, then, that any such opinion prevailed in Maryland thirty years before the date of his opinion.

But even were it otherwise, it is to be observed that the proposition asserted by the court of appeals does not go far enough to be available for this discussion. It declares the power of chancery to decree a conversion, but no more. It does not assert the power to do that on account of the maintenance and education of the ward, and to apply the proceeds to those objects. And the very ground on which the special Act on which the case of Dorsey v. Gilbert was based was justified as constitutional, was that while it was only an enlargement of the existing power of the court of chancery "The property of the infant is not (by it) in any manner impaired or lessened, but a change in its character alone effected."

We may safely assume, then, that before the Act of 1798 there was no authority in any court in Maryland to decree a sale of an infant's realty for maintenance or education, or for any object except those provided for in the statutes referred to.

If he possessed personality, the orphans' court might allow his guardian to apply a tenth part of it annually for his education, under authority of the Act of 1785, chap. 80.

But if he was an orphan, having no legal claim for support upon anyone, and his whole patrimony consisted of unproductive realty, his condition was lamentable. However refined his associations may have been, and however capable he might be of receiving a liberal and professional education, his only recourse for a support was to be bound out as an apprentice, under the Act of 1715, chap. 89, unless some charitable person would assume his maintenance and education. His real estate, however ample, was unavailable for those objects, unless, indeed, he would go in debt for necessities, and leave his creditors to their common-law remedies against his property.

In this condition of affairs, the Act of 1798, chap. 101, was enacted "for amending and reducing into system the laws and regulations concerning last wills and testaments, the duties of executors, administrators and guardians, and the rights of orphans and other representatives of deceased persons," the twelfth subchapter, section 10 of which says:

"And once in each year, or oftener if required, a guardian shall settle an account of his trust with the orphans' court; and the said court shall ascertain, at discretion, the amount of the sum to be annually expended in the maintenance and education of the orphan, regard being had to the future situation, prospects and destination of the ward; and the said court, if it shall deem it advantageous to the ward, may allow the guardian to exceed the income of the estate and to make use of his principal and to sell part of the same, under its order; Provided, Nevertheless, that no part of the real estate shall, on account of such maintenance or education, be diminished without the approbation of the court of chancery, or general court, as well as of the orphans' court."

It will be observed that the power conferred is not, in terms, limited to personal estate. The income of the estate may be exceeded and part of the principal may be sold.

It will not be disputed that the terms "estate" and "principal" are comprehensive enough to embrace everything, real and personal owned by the infant. Is there anything in the context or in the subject matter to limit their sense, in connection with the power of sale conferred?

Section 5 provides that on the guardian's executing his bond, the court shall have power to order the land, distributive share or other property of the ward, to be delivered to the guardian.

Section 6 directs the guardian to have the real estate appraised and the annual value thereof estimated.

Section 7 forbids waste but allows the wood to be cut down under order of the court, for the ward's education and maintenance.

Section 8 directs the guardian to lease out the real estate, or allows him to undertake it on his own account and be answerable for the annual value, to be every third year ascertained.

Section 9 directs the guardian to account for the profit and increase of the estate or annual value as aforesaid.

Thus the first of these sections grouped together the real and personal estate. Sections 6, 7, 8 and 9 refer entirely to the real estate. Section 9 speaks of it as the estate and then follows immediately section 10, the one under consideration, in which permission is given to exceed the income of the estate (the precise word which in the preceding section referred to realty) and to sell part of the principal. As the preceding four sections had reference solely to real estate and the last described it generally as the estate, it is difficult to understand why the same word in this section should not embrace the realty.

The power to sell the personality (10 per cent of it annually) already existed under the Act of 1785, chap. 80. If it was intended by the Act of 1798 merely to re-enact this, or to extend it to all the personality, why was the phraseology changed and the word personal omitted?

If it does not appear from the foregoing considerations that it was omitted de industria, and the power of sale was extended to the realty as an amendment to the existing law, it is made demonstrably clear by the proviso to section 10.

The function of a proviso in a statute is to qualify or restrain the enacting clause.

The enacting clause here confers a power to order sale of part of the principal of the infant's estate, on account of his maintenance or education. The qualification is that the real estate shall not be diminished on account of the maintenance or education, without the approbation of the court of chancery, etc. Diminished how? Clearly, it means by the exercise of the power of sale conferred in the preceding clause, i. e., the realty shall not be diminished by such sale without, etc. Why add this qualification unless without it the orphans' court would have the unrestrained power of selling, by virtue of the enacting clause.

Again; what do the words "as well as of the orphans' court" at the close of the section mean, if not that the orphans' court is to allow a diminution of the realty by its order of sale, first; and that the approbation of the other court is to be had as well?

The proviso then clearly assumes that the previous clause conferred the power to order a sale of the realty, and was designed as a check upon its exercise.

There is no question of implied or incidental powers.

The question is whether the power to allow the guardian to exceed the income of the estate and to sell a part of the principal does not mean, if the estate consists of realty, as in this case, a power to exceed the income of the realty and to sell part of that for the maintenance and education of the ward. The context is resorted to, not to infer powers not expressed but to throw light on the express grant, if it needs any elucidation.

More properly, it may be said that the proviso is referred to as irreconcilable with the position that the expressed grant means less than its terms naturally import and ought to be narrowed and restrained by construction.

The conclusion seems to me inevitable that the statute conferred upon the court the power to order a sale of part of the minor's real estate, for his education and maintenance.

Allusion has been made to the nonexistence of any practice under this section of the statute in Maryland, and to the absence of any adjudicated case sanctioning such a practice.

The Act of Assembly of Maryland of May 8, 1816, would account for the nonexistence of the practice in that State since that date. The Act provides for sales of infant's property by decree of the chancellor, or of the several county courts of the State sitting as courts of equity. The eighth section enacts that "No part of the principal arising from the sale of any real estate by virtue of the law shall be applied toward the maintenance or education of any infant, unless the chancellor or the county court, as the case may be, shall consider it necessary for the education or maintenance of the minors."

This, by implication, gives to the chancellor or county court the power to order the application of the principal to the minor's maintenance or education. As this Act was very comprehensive in its provisions, and could be administered by any of the county courts sitting in equity, it is quite likely that it superseded the antecedent legislation, in the practice of the courts, and occasion did not arise for direct judicial decision of the question now before us.

But whatever expression of opinion we find in the Maryland courts or other authorities is in favor of the interpretation we have given to the statute.

In the Williams Case, decided in 1828, which was a case under the Act of Maryland of 1816, Chancellor Bland, as already stated, discussed the whole subject of the power of the court of chancery to decree the sale of realty owned by infants. He also reviewed the legislation of Maryland on the subject, including the Act of 1798 now under consideration. In his report of the case, published in 1841, he adds, in a note to this part of his opinion [3 Bland, 200] a reference to the Goltier Case, decided by Chancellor Kilty in 1810.

In that case, the father of certain minors petitioned the orphans' court, setting forth that his children had inherited an undivided interest in certain real estate; that the other heirs had contracted to sell the property; that he believed it would enable him to educate and support the children more advantageously if he should sell and convey on behalf of the children also, and asked that he be authorized to make the conveyance. The orphans' court passed an order authorizing it, and Chancellor Kilty afterwards approved it, expressly, under the power vested in him by the Act of 1798, chap. 101, etc.

This case is extracted from the chancery proceedings. It shows that before 1816, the Act of 1798 was understood by at least one orphans' court and the then chancellor, as we have heretofore understood it, and it may be considered as evidence that our practice existed in Maryland at that time. It is a circumstance, too, not without interest, that Chancellor Kilty had been the Chief Justice of the Circuit Court of the District up to the year 1806, about five years before the Goltier Case was decided.

This case is cited by Chancellor Bland as already stated, in a note to his review of the Maryland Statutes, without comment, and it is to be assumed that he refers to it as an authoritative exposition of the law.

In the same note, he refers to the case of Brodeur v. Thompson, 2 Harris & G. 120, decided in 1828 also.

That was an action for the value of certain improvements constructed on the defendant's real estate by authority of his guardian, who had contracted to apply part of the ward's principal to payment for them, and that with the sanction of the orphans' court.

The question was whether the orphans' court had authority to allow the guardian to exceed the income and apply part of the principal to any other object than the maintenance and education of the ward.

The court of appeals held not, and said: "By the ninth section of that law (the Act of 1785) the orphans' courts are invested with the authority to allow the guardian to apply a part of the personal estate, not exceeding a tenth part thereof, to the education of his ward. The Act of 1798 only enlarged this authority by extending the expenditure to any part or the whole of the personal estate, if necessary. The better education of the ward is the object of both laws, and the general expressions used in the tenth section are to be construed with reference to this object. * * * That the Legislature did not mean to extend the expenditure of the principal to any other objects than those personal to the ward is plain from the language of the tenth section, in the closing part of it: 'No part of the real estate shall, on account of such maintenance or education' be diminished without, etc. * * * Clearly indicating, by the relative terms, such maintenance or education, the object of expenditure authorized in the first part of the same section. Should an application of the personal estate not suffice to maintain and educate suitably to the future destination of the ward, then such maintenance and education may also induce an application of a part of the real estate, with the approbation of the court of chancery, or general court, as well as the orphans' court."

This seems to be a clear recognition of the powers of the orphans' court to decree the sale of the realty, and it was evidently so understood by Chancellor Bland when he cited this case in the same note with the Goltier Case before referred to.

So, in the case of Hatton v. Weems, 12 Gill & J. 88, decided in 1841, which was a suit brought by a cestui que trust against the trustee of an estate, for an account, the court referred to the analogous case of a guardian, and said: "According to our laws, a guardian cannot encroach on the capital of his ward's estate without the order of the orphans' court; nor can the real estate be diminished but by the approbation of the court of chancery."

Although not so pointed as the other case, this seems also to recognize the order of the orphans' court, with the approbation of the court of chancery, as competent to transfer the realty of the ward.

Mr. Alexander, in his well known and authoritative work on the Chancery Practice of Maryland, published in 1839 or 1840, says: "The court of chancery has a general control over the persons of infants in regard to their guardianship, maintenance and marriage. But it is seldom that an occasion is presented for the exercise of these powers. The orphans' court may appoint a guardian to an infant who has acquired an estate in any manner and who is destitute of a testamentary or natural guardian. The power to appoint a guardian with authority to take possession of the estate has very naturally drawn to itself the power of appropriating the estate to the maintenance of the infant. The only case in which the interposition of chancery seems to be necessary is where a sale of a part of the infant's real estate is required for the purposes of maintenance and education." For this, he refers to section 10 of the Act of 1798, subchap. 12.

He, then, clearly understood the diminution of the ward's real estate, referred to in the Act of 1798, to mean a sale of it, through the concurrent action of the orphans' court and chancery court.

We have, then, the chancellor, the court of appeals and the text writers of Maryland, down to a late date, recognizing, as a thing of course, the authority of the orphans' court to decree a sale of realty, and not an intimation of opinion against it from any quarter.

But if it had been otherwise, since the cession of the District of Columbia, it must be remembered that this statute came to us about two years after its enactment, as the law of this jurisdiction, without any interpretation by the highest court of Maryland, and the Circuit Court of this District had as complete authority to interpret it for this District as the Court of Appeals of Maryland had for that State; indeed, as much so as if it had been, originally, an Act passed by Congress for this District.

In the exercise of this authority, the circuit court, and, since its abolition, this court, its successor, have always interpreted the Act of D. C.

1798 as conferring a power on the orphans' court to decree the sale of an infant's realty under the circumstances mentioned in section 10, subchapter 12 of the Act; and it was assumed without discussion, in the general term, as late as 1874, in the case of Manell's Appeal.

The practice of decreeing such sales has prevailed through a period sixty or seventy years in extent; large amounts of property have changed hands through such sales, and many titles depend upon their validity. If anything can be said to be a rule of property in this District, our interpretation of the statute must be so considered.

This being the case, even if we doubted its propriety, would we be justified in reversing it, with the effect of unsettling titles and affecting values to an extent that cannot now be appreciated?

In the case of Doolittle's Lessee v. Bryan, 14 How. 568 [55 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 543], the court said: "In the present case it is said the land was sold in 1829; the purchaser paid his money and obtained his deed on the faith of a judgment of the court that the sale was regular, and has held the land under this title ever since. Hundreds of similar cases may probably be found where the same objections to the sale exist. Under such circumstances, a court should be even astute in avoiding a construction which may be productive of much litigation and insecurity of titles."

In the case of Smith v. Black, 115 U. S. 808 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 398], the mere probability that a decision of the old circuit court as to the power of a trustee to sell through an agent had been followed as a rule of property, was persuasive with the supreme court against sanctioning a departure from it. How much stronger the present case, where we know that many titles rest upon the rule of property which is now assailed.

An important feature of the present case is that we are not sitting on appeal from an orphans' court decree of sale, in which case, even, we ought to hesitate to pronounce an opinion subversive of the past and settled rule of title; but we are called upon, in a collateral proceeding, to overthrow rights acquired over forty years ago, under a decree never reversed or even appealed from, but passed at a time when its legality was assumed in the prevailing construction of the law.

The language of the supreme court in Douglas v. Pike Co. 101 U. S. 677 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 968], is quite pertinent to such a case. It was an action on certain county bonds, issued and bought after their legality had been affirmed by the state court, but which subsequently the same court held to be illegal. The court says: "The true rule is to give a change of judicial construction, in respect to a statute, the same effect in its operation on contracts and existing contract rights that would be given to a legislative amendment; that is to say, make it prospective but not retroactive. After a statute has been settled by judicial construction, the construction becomes, so far as contract rights acquired under it are concerned, as much a part of the statute as the text itself; and a change of decision is, to all intents and purposes, the same in its effect on contracts as an amendment of the law by means of a legislative enactment."

Therefore, although they ordinarily followed the interpretation of its statute by the highest court of a State, they refused in that case to give it the effect of overthrowing a former rule of decision under which rights had been acquired.

If this District were a State, no doubt the supreme court would apply this rule by upholding our former construction of the statute as far as it affected the present case, however we might have changed our views of the law since.

And although in the exercise of its appellate power in this District, the supreme court would act upon its own judgment and not feel bound to follow ours, in the interpretation of our local statutes it can hardly be doubted that the sentiments above expressed would lead to the same results.

The next question is whether the Act of 1798, subchap. 12, § 10, is repealed by the Act of Congress of March 3, 1843, entitled, "An Act to Provide in Certain Cases for the Sale of the Real Estate of Infants within the District of Columbia."

There is no such repeal, unless by implication. Repeals by implication are not favored by the courts.

In the absence of any repealing clause, it is necessary to the implication of a repeal that the objects of the two statutes are the same. If they are not, both statutes will stand, though they refer to the same subject.

And it is further necessary to such repeal that there be a repugnancy between the statutes, or that one be plainly intended as a substitute for the other. U. S. v. Tynen, 11 Wall, 88 [78 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 153]; U. S. v. Claflin, 97 U. S. 546 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 1082].

The Act of 1843 provides for the sale of the whole or any part of the infant's real estate, whenever it appears that the interest of the infant manifestly requires it. The object, therefore, is to promote the infant's interest generally. When the sale is made the proceeds are to be vested and applied (i. e., invested and applied) in the purchase of other real property, or invested and applied in such other manner as the court may think best. And these proceeds, if the infant dies under age, are to be considered real estate, and pass, as such, to the person who would have been entitled if no such sale had been made.

The prominent object of the Act evidently is a change of investment for the infant's benefit.

And another object seems to be to preserve the fund for his heir at law, in case of his death under age. As the infant could not make a valid devise, the property, then, upon his death under age, would necessarily descend to his heir. But a conversion of it into personality would deprive the heir of it, but for the particular provision of the Act. There is no express authority to apply the proceeds otherwise than by vesting or investing them. They are to be vested and applied in a purchase of other realty, or in some other manner.

There is no authority to consume the principal. It is argued that such authority is implied by the words "so much thereof (i. e., of the proceeds of sale) as may remain at his death, shall be considered real estate," etc., etc. But this evidently means so much thereof as may remain in the shape of personality because it was needless to say that of real estate; and that would apply to what was not reinvested in other real estate. It is not necessary to read it as of what remains after a part of the principal has been consumed. After directing that the proceeds might be reinvested in realty, this clause had, for its object, to impress the character of realty on all that might remain in the form of personality for the benefit of the heir. It would be singular if a power to consume the principal was left to be inferred from a clause like this, which has manifestly a different object in view, and does not necessarily convey such implication.

Somewhat singular consequences would follow such a construction. Whether a ward's realty shall be sold for his maintenance and education must depend upon his needs in those respects. It is natural to expect that the court charged with the duty of determining that question should also have authority to decree the sale.

The Act of 1798 expressly directs the orphans' court to ascertain the amount to be annually expended in the maintenance and education of the orphan, and authorizes it to apply a part of the principal of the estate to those objects. If this authority, as to the sale of the real estate, is cut off by the Act of 1843, the power of the court to fix the allowance at anything beyond the personality and the income is necessarily destroyed, because it is in the discretion of the equity court whether the realty shall be sold or not. The power would then have to be devolved on the equity court to determine the allowance of the ward. Could it have been intended to transfer to it this duty which is so exclusively appropriate to the orphans' court? Or could it have been intended to leave with the orphans' court the power to determine the ward's allowance for maintenance and education, beyond the income of the estate, and yet require a separate and original, instead of an appellate and revisory proceeding, in the equity court, to give the orders of the former effect?

All this difficulty makes it very improbable that Congress intended to transfer the administration of the ward's property (in other words, the wardship of the infant) to the equity court, by the Act of 1843.

In the case of an exactly similar Act in Virginia, we have the authority of Rinker v. Streit, 38 Gratt. 637, that it conveys no authority to apply the principal of the ward's estate to his maintenance and education. If this be correct, as we are inclined to think it is, then the object contemplated by the Act of 1798 could not be attained under the Act of 1843; and the two Acts must be held to have entirely different objects, and to be entirely incompatible with each other; and, therefore, both must stand, according to the rule before stated.

But even if we can find, in the Act of 1843, an implied power to sell for the express purpose of applying the proceeds to the maintenance and education of the ward, under the general authority to vest and apply for his benefit, it would not follow that the Act is inconsistent with the Act of 1798, and therefore repeals it. It would only follow that while the orphans court could only direct a sale of part of the realty for the single object of maintaining and educating, the equity court could decree a sale of the whole of it for the promotion of the ward's interest in any way. There is no inconsistency in conferring on one court a jurisdiction which may include what already exists in another, without intending to disturb the latter, but leaving their jurisdiction, to a limited extent, concurrent.

The later law may be intended as a substitute for the former, although not positively inconsistent with it. But it must appear plainly to be so intended. And how can that be predicated of the Act of 1843, when the supposed power to the equity court, intended to supersede that of the orphans' court, is not expressed, and can only be made out at all by doubtful implication?

We have seen that the Court of Appeals of Maryland, long after the Act of Maryland of 1816 was passed, recognized this power of selling a ward's realty as still residing in the orphans' court, although by the effect of that Act the proceeds of sale might be applied to maintenance and education, and although, too, the more usual practice in that State probably was to proceed under that Act to secure such application.

If the Act of 1816 in Maryland did not work a repeal of the Act of 1798, a fortiori did not our Act of 1843.

In the case of U. S. v. Tynen, 11 Wall. [78 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 153] cited on the part of the plaintiff, the supreme court found an absolute contradiction and repugnance between the two Acts under consideration, so that they could not stand together.

In the case of U. S. v. Claffin, 97 U. S. 546 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 1082], the second Act expressly repealed all Acts which either conflicted with or were supplied by the provisions of that Act, and the supreme court held that the second Act did supply the provisions of the first, and was plainly intended as a substitute for it.

We do not think, then, that the Act of 1843 repealed that of 1798.

Such are the general considerations which lead us to hold that at the time of the proceeding in the orphans' court which was offered in evidence at the trial, that court had jurisdiction, on a proper showing, to order the sale of a part of the real estate of a ward for his maintenance and education.

Another question, however, is made, going to the jurisdiction in this particular case, which grows out of the nature of the estate owned by the wards.

It is said that they owned only a remainder, and that a contingent one; and the jurisdiction is denied in such a case, though it may exist as to estates in possession.

What estate, then, had the Thaw children under the will of their father?

After giving a life estate to the wife, he devised as follows, viz.: "I give and bequeath to my two children above named, Columbia and Columbus, in equal parts, to their heirs and assigns forever, all my estate, real and personal, that shall remain at and after the death of their mother, my said wife Eliza; or if either of them shall not survive their mother, then I will that the surviving one shall have the whole.

"Item. If both of my said children shall die before their mother, then, on the demise of the last survivor of them, I give and bequeath to my beloved wife Eliza, to her heirs and assigns forever, for her own proper benefit, all my estate of every description."

A remainder is vested "when there is a person in being who would have an immediate right to the possession of the lands upon the ceasing of the intermediate or precedent estate."

"It is the present capacity of taking effect in possession, if the possession were to become vacant, that distinguishes a vested from a contingent remainder." 4 Kent, Com. 194, 195.

But there was no moment after the death of Thaw when each of his children would not have had an immediate right to the possession of a moiety of the property, upon the death of their mother. The remainder of each had always a present capacity of taking effect in possession if the possession became vacant by the mother's death. It was therefore a vested remainder. Inasmuch as the devise to each child in remainder was in fee, the devise over of his or her share in case of his or her death before the mother, to the surviving child, was simply an executory devise over of a fee after a fee. Such also was the devise to the mother and her heirs in case she survived both children.

But the children had more than a vested remainder.

The first devise is to the mother, "to hold and enjoy during her natural life, in trust for the equal benefit and maintenance of herself and of my daughter Columbia and of my son Columbus, the two children above named; and if either of them shall die before arriving at the age of majority, then she is to hold the whole property as above for the equal benefit of herself and the survivor of the two above named children; or if both of the said children shall die before their mother, my said wife, then she, my said wife Eliza, shall hold the said property during her natural life for her own sole use and benefit; and in no case shall she, my beloved wife Eliza, be deprived of the use of any part thereof during her natural life for the maintenance of herself and the two children aforesaid, while they or either of them shall live, or of herself, if she shall survive them both."

It will be observed that no active duties are required of the trustee, unless that is implied in the use of the word "maintenance."

But in a case where a tract of land was conveyed to a father in fee, to hold in trust for children then alive, and to be born of his wife, to be equally divided, etc., and until the division to be occupied and used entirely and specially for the maintenance and support of the children, it was held that the legal estate vested in the children. McNish v. Guerard, 4 Strob. Eq. 66.

The court said: "I do not perceive in these words evidence that it must have been the intention of the grantor that the land was to be occupied or the rents received and disbursed by the trustee for the maintenance of the children. * * * A very strong persuasion certainly arises, from the fact that the children were infants and that the deed was made to their father with a direction for their support, that it was meant this support should be administered through him. But on the other hand, if the statute carried the legal estate to the children, all this could be and must necessarily be attended to by guardians, etc."

So that it is at least doubtful whether the children did not take a joint legal estate with their mother during her life.

But whether this be so or not, it is certain that they had the entire beneficial interest in the property, present and future, subject to their mother's equal participation with them during her life.

There might be serious objections to the sale of a mere remainder, because of the uncertainty of its value and the risk of sacrifice; but such objection would not apply to an estate like the above, where the mother unites in the sale of her interest, and thus the whole title passes and the full value is realized.

But there is nothing in the Act of 1798 to limit the terms real estate or principal to estates in possession, or to exclude future interests from being sold equally with those in possession; and in the case of statutes of other States resembling ours, the contrary has been expressly decided. Baxter v. Baxter, 62 Maine, 548; Cooper v. Hepburn, 15 Gratt. 568.

It has been argued that the Act of Congress of 1856, R. S. D. C. § 969, et seq., provides for the sale of remainders and reversions in real estate, and thereby assumes that there was no existing provision on the subject.

The Act in question provides for a sale of property limited for life, with contingent remainder over to issue of the tenant for life, who may be living at his death. It is the case of contingent remainders to uncertain persons who cannot be known until the expiration of the life estate. Of course, no such person could be before the orphans' court asking, through a guardian, for the sale of his interest, during the continuance of the life estate, an entirely different case from the present.

It is supposed that section 10 of subchapter 12 of the Act of 1798 prohibits the sale of trust estates. But we do not understand it as having any such meaning. The clause relied on is the last of the subchapter, and it is: "That nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to affect the general superintending power exercised by the court of chancery with respect to trusts."

There are five sections between this and the one giving the power of sale, so that it cannot have any special reference to the latter. It is a proviso relating to everything in the Act. It qualifies all of it. If it prevents a sale of equitable estates, it equally prevents the appointment of a guardian or the control of the natural or testamentary guardian wherever the ward's estate consists of equitable property. Such certainly could not have been the intention. The idea could only have been to reserve to the chancery court its usual power of calling a trustee to account and enforcing the performance of his duties, which could be done in concurrence with the special powers of the orphans' court with respect to guardians.

Apart from the statute, however, a question may be made as to the power of the orphans' court to decree a sale of an equitable estate, when it cannot decree a conveyance by the trustee, so as to give a complete title to the purchaser.

I see no more reason to doubt the power of the court in this respect than to doubt its power to sell a remainder because it cannot compel the life tenant to join in the sale, or its power to decree a sale of an undivided interest, as was done in the Gottier Case, because the cotenants could not be compelled to join in the sale or in a partition. In the last case, the purchaser could not get the full benefit of his purchase without a partition, voluntary or enforced by suit in equity. And so, the purchaser of an equitable estate would be entitled to demand a deed from the trustee and to enforce compliance by a suit in equity.

But no such question can arise in the present case, in which the guardian is the trustee and the very party seeking a sale.

Indeed, as it is clear that the trust in this case was purely personal to the children, it would cease, of itself, as an active trust, at the moment of the transfer of their title; and the legal title would be transferred to the purchaser, by operation of the Statute of Uses.

We think there was nothing in the nature of the estate to exclude the jurisdiction of the court to decree a sale.

The next question will be: What facts were necessary to give the court jurisdiction for this purpose?

Upon examining the statute, we find no other jurisdictional facts necessary than the ownership of the property by a minor and the existence of a guardian.

"Whenever land shall descend on or be devised to a male under the age of twenty-one years, or to a female under sixteen * * * and such male or female shall not have a natural guardian or guardian appointed by last will, agreeably to the statute, the orphans' court of the county where the land lies, etc., shall have power to appoint a guardian, etc. And the court shall also have power, on the application of any friend of the infant, etc., to call on any guardian under the statute aforesaid, or natural guardian, to give bond, etc."

On the execution of the bond, the court may require the land, etc., of the ward to be delivered to him; may exact certain duties of him as to management and accounting; may, at its discretion, fix the yearly allowance of the ward for maintenance and education, and if it shall deem it advantageous to the ward may allow the income to be exceeded, and order a sale of part of the principal.

It is not even made necessary to allege that the income is insufficient for his support. It may be sufficient to maintain and educate according to a certain scale of living; and yet the court may, in its discretion, make a larger allowance and authorize a sale. The insufficiency of the income is an argument addressed to the sound discretion of the court. But if such insufficiency be a necessary fact, it appeared very explicitly in this case.

No particular form of application or allegation or proof is prescribed as necessary to give the court jurisdiction.

The reference to the general court, too, excludes the idea of an original proceeding in the higher court, because that court, having only common-law jurisdiction had no form of proceeding for the sale of realty, except the sale under common-law execution.

If it be true that the action of the chancellor is revisory only, then the ordinary formalities of an original suit in equity are not required.

The common law of the courts only knows of the removal of proceedings from inferior to higher courts, by appeal, writ of error or certiorari, for the purpose of reversal, but nothing of a removal for approval, and supplies no formula for the latter, which is a statutory proceeding.

The statute prescribes no formalities by which the chancellor is to take cognizance of the proceedings in the orphans' court, but it leaves that to be adjusted by the rules or practice of the courts.

And now as to the facts:

However imperfect the files and records of the orphans' and circuit courts were, we have no doubt that the evidence supplied from them was properly admitted at the trial. The evidence in the record shows that the two infants before mentioned, Columbus and Columbia Thaw, derived title to the property in controversy under the will of their father; that Eliza V. Thaw, their mother, bonded as their guardian on the 22d of March, 1844; that on the 29th of that month she filed her petition, showing that she had paid all the debts of her husband; that the property left by him was insufficient to support her and the children; that a part of it consisted of two vacant lots (the property in controversy), and praying that it be sold to relieve the immediate wants of the petitioner and for the support and education of the children; that a decree for such sale was passed on the same day, which was afterwards approved in the circuit court on the 12th of October following; that a sale was made which was approved by the circuit court on the 21st day of January, 1848, and a conveyance made by Mrs. Thaw in pursuance of it on the 17th of March, 1848.

As far as concerns the interest of the infants in the property, the court had before it everything which was necessary to give it jurisdiction to decree a sale.

It is true that the guardian, in her application, confused somewhat her own interests with those of the wards, and alleged the insufficiency of the property to support herself and the children as a ground for selling, and asked the sale as well to relieve her own immediate wants as for the support of the children.

But it is fair to read this part of the application as referring to her own undivided interest for life in the property. It is not to be read as an application to sell the estate of the children for her support. It is also true that the court had no jurisdiction over the wife's interest in the property and could not pass title to it by its decree. But if the wife chose to unite in the sale and convey her interest, which she must be held to have done, we see no reason why the court could not decree a sale of the share of the infants, as was done in the case of Baxter v. Baxter, 62 Maine, 540, in which the court said: "As after the decease of the father the whole estate is in the children, a sale of the right of the children, with a conveyance from the father, would vest the whole estate in the purchaser."

D. C.

And if there was error in the form of the decree because it embraced the widow's interest also, it did not affect its efficacy as to the interest of the infants but was a harmless and inoperative error, not to be noticed collaterally.

The only question that could arise would be as to the proper apportionment of the proceeds between the mother and the wards. But this question could only arise after the sale and would not affect the transfer of title.

Holding these views, it follows that one must hold that the court below correctly admitted the evidence as to the sale and conveyance under the authority of the orphans' court, which is the evidence set out in the first three bills of exceptions.

The fourth bill of exceptions related to the admission in evidence of a deed of partition between the plaintiff and his sister, in which he recites that his mother, after disposing of the real estate acquired by his father's will and investing the proceeds in other real estate, died intestate, etc.

Prima facie this would seem to be an admission of the sale of the property in controversy by the mother, and an investment of the proceeds in property then to be divided. As such, we see no error in receiving it; but it was in no sense an estoppel and was open to explanation, which was given in the rebutting evidence.

The fifth bill of exceptions relates to the refusal of the court to grant five instructions, all of which, according to the views before expressed, were erroneous and were rightly refused.

The last bill of exceptions is peculiar. It shows that two instructions were asked on behalf of the defendant, both of which were granted against the plaintiff's objection; and at the same time the justice stated that there was no substantial disagreement between the parties as to the facts, and that he held that the plaintiff could not prevail against the title which the defendant furnished, and instructed the jury to find for the defendant, to which the plaintiff excepted. It does not appear whether the exception was to the granting of the instructions prayed, or to the statement that there was no disagreement as to facts, or the instruction that the plaintiff could not prevail against the title furnished by the defendant, or the final peremptory instruction to find for defendant.

We are not bound to notice this exception, and there is less occasion for it because after the previous ruling below, which we have sustained, it could do no harm if technically erroneous.

The motion for a new trial is overruled.

Hagner, J., dissenting.

Re ESTATE OF David McINTIRE, Deceased.

1. The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in special term, sitting as an orphans' court, has all the jurisdiction that the orphans' court at any time possessed by virtue of the statutes existing anterior to the adoption of the Revised Statutes of the District.

2. Lapse of time and laches (in the case at bar a delay of fourteen months) are not a bar to the filing of a caveat to test the validity of a will.

(Decided November 8, 1886.)

A PPEAL from an order of the Orphans' Court. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James M. Johnston, for petitioner:

As to the objection that the alleged order of probate is res judicata: it is positively denied by the petitioner that he had notice, actual or otherwise, of the proceedings instituted for the purpose of probating said will, until after the probate thereof.

Even if the legal notice had been given, the order admitting the will to probate was void, because the register of wills who signed it had no power to do so. He can only admit a will to probate during the recess of the court.

Act 1798, chap. 101, subchap. 2, § 6; Dennis, Pr. 28, § 6.

As to what constitutes a recess of the court, see Dorsey, Test. Law, p. 44, § 14. Also R. S. D. C. §§ 755, 757, 980; and 16 Stat. at L. § 4, p. 160; Act 1777, chap. 8, § 2; and chap. 9, §§ 4, 5.

Even admitting notice, such notice, whether by publication, personal citation or otherwise, will not bar petitioner of his right to contest the validity of said alleged will, even assuming the probate thereof to have been regular and legal. It is not res judicata and binds no one, unless such probate be had after contest. An order for probate, when without contest, is in effect only an interlocutory order.

See Act 1798, chap. 101, subchap. 2, § 18; Price v. Moore, 21 Md. 373, 374; Mason v. Poulson, 40 Md. 361, 362, 363; Lery v. Lery, 28 Md. 25, 30, 31; Compton v. Barnes, 4 Gill, 56, 57; Pegg v. Warford, 4 Md. 393, 394.

It is admitted by respondent's answer that such probate was taken without contest. The record of this case distinctly shows that there has been no contest, within the meaning of the statute.

Price v. Moore and other cases, supra.

When it is desired to attack a will which has been admitted to probate without contest, the course is by a "plenary proceeding" under the statute. This proceeding is a plenary proceeding under the Act of 1798, chap. 101, subchap. 15, §§ 16, 17; the same having been required by the petitioner, the regular citation issued and served upon the parties, and a consent order having been passed requiring them to answer, as shown by the proceedings in this case, in pursuance of which respondents all appeared and answered.

These Acts are more than sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the Act referred to.

Pegg v. Warford, 4 Md. 396; Peters v. Peters, 20 Md. 178; Barroll v. Reading, 5 Harr. & J. 175.

Being a plenary proceeding, the issues are demandable as a matter of right, and the court is not at liberty to refuse them.

Pegg v. Warford, Peters v. Peters and Barroll v. Reading, supra.

The second reason set up by respondents why the issues should not be granted is that petitioner is estopped by his knowledge of the proceedings in equity cause No. 9380, and in the orphans' court, and by his laches.

A mere knowledge of the proceedings on the part of the petitioner, together with his silence and nonaction, can create no estoppel against his right to contest the matter subsequently.

Ketchum v. Duncan, 96 U. S. 666 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 869); Philadelphia, W. & B. R. R. Co. v. DuBois, 12 Wall. 64 (79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 265).

Not even an express ratification of the genuineness of a will and the acceptance of legacies thereunder will bar a contest of such will by the one so ratifying the same, or accepting legacies thereunder, if the probate thereof was without contest.

Clagett v. Hawkins, 11 Md. 388.

Although no sufficient excuse was made for the delay in instituting his proceeding, no lapse of time can bar petitioner's rights in the premises.

Clagett v. Hawkins, 11 Md. 387; O'Neill v. Smith, 83 Md. 574.

The testamentary laws of this District clearly require the court to direct issues, if it has jurisdiction of the case for any purpose. The proposition of appellant is that this court, holding a special term for orphans' court business, has no jurisdiction of the case, and no power to hold such a special term. The jurisdiction in such cases was formerly exercised by the Orphans' Court for the County of Washington, but that court was abolished by Act of Congress of June 21, 1870.

Sec. 5, 16 Stat. at L. p. 161.

All the jurisdiction of that court was, by the same Act, conferred upon this court, holding a special term for orphans' court business.

Id. § 4; Keyser v. Breitbarth, 2 Mackey, 332.

It is contended by appellant that section 4 of that Act is not now in force, because, by section 1296, R. S. D. C. p. 140, it is provided that all the Acts of Congress, passed prior to December 1, 1873, any part of which is embraced in the revision, are repealed, and that parts of said Act of June 21, 1870, are embraced in said revision, but not the said section 4 of said Act.

Whether section 1296, R. S. D. C. repealed section 4 of the Act of June 21, 1870, is a judicial and not a legislative question. The language of the Act is not conclusive; and whether it really operates as a repeal is to be determined by judicial interpretation, under the ordinary rules of construction.

U. S. v. Claffin, 97 U. S. 548, 549 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 1032).

It is submitted that, by a proper construction of the statutes, it will appear, 1, that there has been no repeal of the law giving jurisdiction to this court; 2, that there is express enactment sustaining it.

Section 1296, R. S. D. C. provides that the revision "shall be subject to and governed by the provisions of chapter 74 of the Revised Statutes, U. S. entitled Repeal Provisions."

That chapter provides, inter alia, that the incorporation into the revision of a part of any Act containing provisions of a private, temporary or local character, shall not repeal or in any way affect such private, temporary or local provisions in such Act, but that such provisions shall remain in full force.

R. S. U. S. § 5596, p. 1085.

It is manifest that section 4 of the Act of June 21, 1870, was of a local character, and it is within the protection of the section of the Revised Statute above referred to.

Further, section 980 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia recognizes the jurisdiction by providing for the record of the decrees and orders of the court holding this special term.

But assuming the revision to have the effect of a repeal, there is express legislation sustaining the jurisdiction. Section 89 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia provides that the Judicial Courts of the District remain as organized on the 21st day of February, 1871. The organization then existing, so far as orphans' court business is concerned, was under the Act of June 21, 1870. In addition to this, the legislative recognition of the jurisdiction of the court in section 980 would suffice to sustain it,—as a legislative recognition, under such circumstances, is equivalent to express enactment.

Pease v. Peck, 18 How. 596, 597 (59 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 518).

Mr. S. S. Henkle, for respondent, appellant:

The will was probated April 12, 1884. Decrees of probate as to wills of personalty are final decrees and can only be reviewed on appeal.

See Dennis, Pr. p. 28, § 4; Warford v. Colvin, 14 Md. 532; Negro John v. Morton, 8 Gill & J. 391; Raborg v. Hammond, 2 Harr. & G. 50; Barroll v. Reading, 5 Harr. & J. 175; Harris v. Pue, 39 Md. 538; Offutt v. Gott, 2 Gill & J. 385; Cecil v. Cecil, 19 Md. 78.

The petition in this case was filed under the thirteenth section of subchapter 2 of the Act of 1798, chap. 101, on pp. 29, 30, Dennis, which relates to probate made under the twelfth section, and does not apply to this case. In this case the will was fully proven and five out of the six next of kin were present and they all had notice.

The decree of probate was a final decree and could only be revoked for fraud or deceit in obtaining it.

In Cain v. Warford, 8 Md. 454, the court decided that the object of the sixteenth section is to advise the court of the real facts in the case; and where there is no dispute, but simply a question of law, the court is not bound to order plenary proceedings.

See also Smith v. Young, 5 Gill, 204.

The petitioner is concluded by laches. The will was probated April 12, 1884. The account was filed by the admr. c. t. a. for final settlement in May, 1885; during all this time petitioner had full opportunity for knowledge, and had knowledge.

This court has no jurisdiction in orphans' court business, save where it has been conferred by the Revised Statutes of 1873.

The jurisdiction of this court was derived solely from the fourth section of the Act of Congress of June 21, 1870, 16 Stat. at L. 161.

Both in England and Maryland the jurisdiction has always been distinct and separate from the courts of general jurisdiction.

The fourth section is wholly omitted from the revision. Section 1296, p. 149, Revised Statutes, repeals all laws passed prior to 1873, any portion of which is contained in the revision; and the section applicable thereto shall be in force in lieu thereof. Section 1 of the Act of 1870 is section 758 of the Revised Statutes, p. 90.

The orphans' court can exercise no jurisdiction not expressly conferred.

Dennis, Pr. § 20, p. 107.

There is no jurisdiction to contest wills. That is purely statutory. The Act of February 27, 1801, 2 Stat. at L. 108, § 12, p. 107, provided for appointment of judge of orphans' court and appeal to the circuit court.

Mr. Justice Merrick delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an appeal from an order of the orphans' court, directing issues upon a caveat to the will of David McIntire, deceased.

McIntire had died early in April, 1884, and on the 8th of April, a few days after his death, a will was propounded in the orphans' court and was admitted to probate in common form.

Letters of administration were granted and certain proceedings taken, for the purpose of settling up the estate. At the end of about fifteen months the sole surviving brother of the decedent filed his petition in the orphans' court caveating the will and asking for plenary proceedings for the purpose of testing the validity of the will.

In that state of case the administrator of the decedent filed his answer, setting up that the brother had been guilty of laches, by allowing the administration to proceed for fourteen months after full knowledge on his part and that those laches were a complete bar to the application for a caveat and the determination of the question of the will in solemn form.

The probate court took a different view and ordered issues to go for the purpose of establishing whether or not the supposed paper was in truth the will of the decedent. From that order the administrator appeals, and he raises two questions in this court, very momentous indeed if there were any substance in either of them.

The first question he raises is that by reason of the terms of the codification or revision of the laws of the District, the probate court was shorn of the vast mass of its powers, because in the revision, at section 980, chapter 27 of the Revised Statutes of the District, the section providing for the register of wills leaves out all that part of the Act of the 21st of June, 1870, which added the Probate Court to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, except certain provisions with regard to the register of wills and certain other provisions specially provided in other parts of the Code touching the proceedings of executors, and touching the proceedings of guardian and ward.

Now it would be a very serious thing, if there were any foundation to it, to have the probate court entirely stricken down and to have no tribunal vested with the particular functions which belong to the administration of the affairs of decedents.

The vice of the argument of the counsel consists in reasoning from the particular up to the general, instead of reasoning from the general down to the particular. If we look at section 89, every possible difficulty will be removed, which would enter the mind of a lawyer by reason of the omission from sections 929 and 980 of the entire provisions of the Act of June 1, 1870, which had brought the orphans' court into and made it a part of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

Section 89 is in these words:

"The Judicial Courts of the District shall remain as organized on the 21st day of February, 1871, until abolished or changed by Congress."

On the 21st day of February, 1871, the Act of June 21, 1870, in its entirety, was in force with all its provisions, giving all the antecedent jurisdiction of the orphans' court to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. When in that state of the case, in 1874 the new revision or enactment is "That the Judicial Courts of the District shall remain as organized on the 21st day of February, 1871," that is an adoption into the revision of 1874, of all the faculties which belong to the court as of that time; and it dispensed therefore with the necessity of repeating at sections 929 and 980 the detail of the jurisdiction which had been conferred by the Act of June 21, 1870, and the only object which the reviser could have had in repeating in section 929 and 980 any part of the Act of June, 1870, after that sweeping provision was this: that if it had stopped with the terms I have used, "The judicial courts shall remain as organized on the 21st day of February, 1871," it might have been inferred that there was some purpose to abolish the special powers of the register of wills, and they might have been considered as absorbed in the functions belonging to the Clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia; and it was for the purpose of keeping alive and removing all doubt as to the integrity of the office of register of wills that sections 929 and 980 were put in the Revised Statutes as they appear now, but not with any view at all of taking away any of the powers of the orphans' court exerted by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia at one of its special terms on February 21, 1871.

The objection therefore to the jurisdiction must fall entirely, and we must consider the question as settled and fully at rest, that the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in special term, has all the powers and all the faculties that the orphans' court at any time possessed by virtue of the statutes existing anterior to this codification.

The second objection is that the party has lost his remedy by laches. That is equally as untenable as the first. The thirteenth section of the second subchapter of the Act of 1798 provides that where a will has been admitted to probate in common form it may be open to contest by any party interested; and it gives in that section no limitation of time to the contest. It leaves the law upon that subject and as to limitation, as it stood before.

In point of fact there was no occasion for putting that provision into the statute at all, except out of the abundant caution taken by the draftsman of that law, to exclude any possible conclusion which might have been drawn from the other section of the law which says that the orphans' court shall exercise no incidental power and which is not expressly given by the statute itself; and inasmuch as the power to take probate in common form had been previously given, if the statute had remained silent about the power to review it upon a caveat in solemn form, the argument might have been drawn that the orphans' court had not that power which previously had belonged to all the civil and ecclesiastical courts having jurisdiction over the subject of wills. It was for this purpose alone that expression was given in that form to the power of the orphans' court to review a common probate by having a proper plenary proceeding for the purpose.

The capacity to review a probate was never limited in the ecclesiastical courts at any time. It has always been the doctrine of the ecclesiastical courts that a will was so sacred, a thing so touching the consciences of men, that it was to be carefully guarded; and whenever it appeared, under any circumstances, that a particular matter had been the object of testamentary disposition, the ecclesiastical courts took care to see that testamentary disposition fully carried out and preserved. Hence, there was no such thing known in the ecclesiastical courts as the Statute of Limitations, touching the establishment of a will or the revision of a supposed will which had once been in part established or adopted by the ecclesiastical court. To show that this has been the recognized law and the uniform practice, both in this District and in the State of Maryland, it is only necessary to refer to two decisions of the court of appeals.

I refer to the case of Clagett v. Hawkins, to be found in 11 Md. 381; I read a single passage:

"The proposition that no lapse of time will exclude the inquiry as to whether certain papers constitute the will of a party is supported by almost any number of authorities; that of Finucane v. Gayfere, 1 Eccl. Rep. 425 [8 Phill. 405] will suffice for this case."

And in 83 Maryland, 569, the case of O'Neill v. Smith, which, by the way, was a case where there had been a nuncupative will established and probated by the orphans' court and full administration had occurred and the estate had been settled under that nuncupative will after the end of nearly two years, the nuncupative will was assailed by caveat and it was overthrown. Now if there were any case where laches ought to have been applicable it would be in the case of a nuncupative will which rests, as we know, only in the memory of witnesses and never is put in writing, except after death, by the orphans' court, upon the statement of witnesses; and if they should happen to die there would be no possible means of determining whether or not that were the true will of the party.

But even in a case of that sort the courts have held that lapse of time was not an impediment to the revocation and overthrow of a will. At page 574, the court says:

"The only remaining question is whether the appellants, by reason of any delay or laches on their part, have lost their right to assail this will, without intending to admit that mere lapse of time would operate as a bar in any case, we are of opinion that the appellants are not precluded by any supposed delay from contesting the validity of this will."

In the light of these authorities and the reasonings which I have given, it appears to the court that the plea of laches cannot prevail in this or in any similar case. This disposes of all the questions.

The appeal is therefore not sustained, and the case is sent back to the orphans' court for further proceedings in conformity to the action already taken in that tribunal.

v.

Elizabeth BUSEY, Exrx. *

A number of persons desiring to form a stock company signed a subscription list, headed as follows: "We, the undersigned, hereby subscribe the amount and the number of shares opposite our names, to the stock of the National Express Co., and bind ourselves, our heirs, etc., to pay said amount in such installments as may be called for by said company, and to pay 1 per cent at the time of subscription. Held,

(a.) That the company was not the promisee, it not being in existence at the time of the subscription;

(b.) That the subscriptions were mutual promises by the subscribers to each other to pay to the corporation when it should come into existence, the amounts subscribed, and each subscription was a consideration for the others;

(c.) That while a promise cannot be made to a person not in existence, it may be made to a living person, to pay money to another person, natural or artificial, when he or it comes into existence, and is within that class of cases in which a promise made to one for the benefit of another can be enforced by the latter;

(d.) That in this case the corporation is the payee, or third party, and the subscriptions are choses in action due to it and may be enforced by suit;

(e.) That such a suit, if brought in this District, should be in the name of the corporation, or, if the debt has been assigned, in its name to the use of the assignee;

(f.) That whether a suit is to be brought in the name of the assignor to the use of the assignee or in the name of the assignee alone is a question of process to be controlled solely by the lex fori, whatever may be the lex loci in that respect.

(Decided October 25, 1886.)

ACTION to recover an assessment made upon stock subscription. Submitted on agreed statement of facts, and certified to be heard in the General Term in the first instance. Judgment for defendant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. W. Garnett and Leigh Robinson, for plaintiff.

Mr. C. M. Mathews, for defendant:

The plaintiff cannot sue within the District of Columbia. His cause of action is a chose in action of which he is assignee and for which he cannot sue at law in his own name. The individual liability of a stockholder is the result of an agreement or contractual relation formed between the shareholders and creditors of a corporation, and like all other claims founded on contract is a chose in action and not a chose in possession.

2 Wait, Act. 230, 250; Sheldon v. Sill, 8 How. 441 (49 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 1147); Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co. 22 How. 387 (63 U. S. bk. 16, L. ed. 351); 2 Wall. 10, 22 (69 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 776, 779); Carroll v. Green, 92 U. S. 509 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 788); Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 636 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 867); Hatch v. Dana, 101 U. S. 211 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 886); Flash v. Conn, 109 U. S. 877 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 969); Norris v. Wrenschall, 34 Md. 500; Corning v. McCullough, 1 N. Y. 55.

Such chose, being only a right to receive or recover a debt or money or damages for breach of contract, cannot be recovered without action, and assignment does not give an assignee the right to sue in his own name in a forum where the common law prevails.

The common-law restriction as to assignments of choses in action and suits in the name of the assignee, obtains in this jurisdiction.

Ferry v. Barry, 1 Cranch, C. C. 205.

In this case, Glenn, by the decree of December 14, 1880, claims to sue, as substituted trustee, in the place of the trustee under the deed of trust of September 20, 1866, under which the sums due for unpaid stock had been assigned, but cannot sue in his own name.

Ingersoll v. Cooper, 5 Blackf. 427.

Glenn has recovered only in jurisdictions where the right of an assignee to sue in his own name is accorded by statute. This could only have been avoided by a promise of the debtor subsequent to the assignment.

Tiernan v. Jackson, 5 Pet. 597 (30 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 241).

No such promise is shown in this case. If Glenn be not a substituted trustee or assignee of a chose in action, but a receiver of the Richmond Court, he cannot sue in this District. The lex fori must in such cases prevail; not to interfere with the rights of property, but to regulate remedies.

Morawetz, Private Corp. § 611; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519 (38 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 274); Blane v. Drummond, 1 Brock. 62; Harper v. Butler, 2 Pet. 239 (27 U. In Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 334 (58 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 164) the court says: "Our industry has been tasked unsuccessfully, to find a case in which a receiver has been permitted to sue in a foreign jurisdiction for the property of the debtor."

This case went up on appeal from the late circuit court of the District of Columbia and is a leading case.

See also Relf v. Rundle, 108 U. S. 225 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 339).

Mr. Justice Cox delivered the opinion of the court:

The opinion of the court in this case will apply in a number of other cases in which the same party is plaintiff.

The facts appear to be about these: On the 12th of December, 1865, the National Express and Transportation Company was chartered under the laws of Virginia, and organized and went into operation. It made some assessments upon its stockholders, amounting altogether to 20 per cent of their subscriptions. It was, however, unsuccessful in business, and in August, 1866, the following year, a bill was filed in the Circuit Court of the United States at Richmond, by Josiah Reynolds, a stockholder, alleging fraud and mismanagement, and praying that the company be enjoined from a further prosecution of its business, and asking for a receiver, etc.

Nothing seems to have been done under this bill until after a long delay. But the next month, September 20, 1866, the company executed a deed of assignment, conveying to three trustees all its property of every description, including moneys payable to the company, whether on calls or assessments on stock of the company, notes, bills, etc.

The following month, October 4, 1866, there was a petition filed in the Circuit Court of the United States, in the cause already referred to, for the appointment of a receiver; and on the 31st of December 1866, a receiver was appointed.

The deed of assignment from the Express Company undertook to transfer all its assets, including the subscriptions of stockholders, but it did not undertake to give the trustees any authority to make calls upon the stockholders, and it has been held that this was a franchise and authority specially vested in the president and directors of the company, not capable of being assigned to trustees, so that the trustees were not able to derive any assets from that source. The small amount of property owned by the company was seized upon by creditors, so that the trustees found nothing really available towards the discharge of the debts.

So the matter stood for five years, when, on the 4th of December, 1871, a general creditors' bill was filed in the Chancery Court of the City of Richmond, against the company and the trustees, under the deed of assignment, setting forth that the trustees had done nothing in the execution of the trust, that the unpaid subscriptions were included in the assignment, but were not payable until a call should be made by the president and directors, and these had omitted to make such call, and praying that the court would appoint a new trustee, and would itself call on the stockholders to pay, etc.

To this bill the trustees named in the deed of assignment, the company itself and its president and directors were made parties. But service of process was not made upon the defendants and nothing was done under this bill for a period of nine years.

On the 14th of August, 1879, an amended bill was filed and then for the first time, as it is claimed, service of process was had upon the company. Some of the parties voluntarily appeared; some answers were filed and some defaults taken.

This bill gave a history of the company and it alleged among other things that, by the true construction of the deed of trust, 80 per cent of the subscriptions to the capital stock which had not been called for by the company passed to the said trustees but without any power to sue for or collect such subscriptions so uncalled for; and it further charges that even if said company were now to levy additional assessments upon its stock it is doubtful whether suit could be brought for them by the trustees under said deed.

The bill prays for an account, that the court will decree the assignment by the company to be valid and will itself make a call or assessment upon its stockholders and appoint a proper person charged with the duty of collecting and disbursing the proceeds of such assessments.

The case was referred to the auditor and he reported a very large amount of indebtedness to a great number of persons.

On the 10th of December, 1880, upon a motion made in the United States Circuit Court, the receiver appointed in the Reynolds Case was discharged, and the bill in that case was finally dismissed. Four days afterwards, that is on the 14th of December, a decree was rendered by the Chancery Court of Richmond. That court sustained the validity of the assignment by the company to the trustees; it removed those trustees from their trust and substituted this plaintiff, John Glenn, in their place and ordered the original trustees to convey and assign to him all property of every description that had been vested in them by deed of assignment. The decree then went on further and ordered that a call or assessment be made on the stockholders, of 30 per cent of their subscriptions, and directed them to pay the amount to the plaintiff, who was also directed to receive and collect the same by suit or otherwise. In pursuance of that decree, the trustee proceeded to institute a large number of suits in different jurisdictions, and among them were the suits which we are now disposing of.

In the declaration in this suit, the averment is that the defendant's testator was a subscriber to the capital stock and undertook and promised to pay the said company, for each and every share so subscribed, the sum of $100, etc. Then it goes on to set up the assignment made by the express company to the trustees, and avers that the defendant's testator assented and agreed to said deed of trust and thereby became bound, and undertook and promised to pay said trustees for each and every share of stock above stated subscribed for by him, a balance of over $100 on each share of stock, etc. Then it goes on to recite also the decree in the Richmond Court and the substitution of the plaintiff for the original trustees.

The declaration was demurred to. Of course this admitted all the facts stated in it, and the demurrer was overruled. The cause was then brought to issue by filing a general issue and several other special pleas, and comes here to be decided in the first instance upon an agreed statement of facts. The ground of the defendant's alleged liability is a stock subscription signed by her testator in the following form, viz.:

"We, the undersigned, hereby subscribe the amount and the number of shares opposite our names to the stock of the National Express Company, and bind ourselves, our heirs, etc., to pay said amount in such installments as may be called for by said company, and to pay 1 per cent at the time of subscription."

It will be observed that no promisee is named in the instrument. The corporation is not in existence at the time of the subscription. It is only after this is complete that the subscribers become a corporation. A promise cannot be made directly to a person, natural or artificial, not in existence; and therefore the corporation cannot be considered the promisee.

The nature of these subscriptions may be said to be that they are mutual promises by the subscribers to each other, to pay the amounts subscribed; and each subscription is the consideration for the others. But to whom is the payment to be made? The payee is not expressed and the payment is certainly not to be made to the other subscribers.

In the absence of any designation the payee must be understood to be the corporation when it comes into existence. Although a promise cannot be made to a person not in existence, there is no reason why a promise may not be made to a living person to pay money to another person, natural or artificial, when he or it comes into existence. This is one of those cases in which a promise made to one person for the benefit of a third can be enforced by suit by the latter. In fact in the case of a stock subscription it would be impracticable to enforce it in any other way.

The Statutes of Virginia evidently contemplate the subscription as a debt due to the company. It is provided that on every subscription for shares in any joint stock company (not otherwise provided for) there shall be paid at the time of subscribing, to the commissioners appointed to receive subscriptions, $2 on each share, and the residue thereof as required by the president and directors. See 2 R. C. p. 212, § 1.

And immediately after the election of president and directors, the money so paid is to be paid by the commissioners who may have received the same, to such person or in such manner as they may require, that is the president and directors; and in case of failure so to pay, the company may recover the same against the commissioners by warrant or action or motion in lieu of an action. And if the money which the stockholder has to pay on his shares be not paid as required by the president and directors "it may be recovered by warrant, action or motion as aforesaid," that is by the company, in the same way in which the money is to be recovered from the commissioners; or, the shares may be sold at auction, etc., and if the sale does not produce enough "the company may recover against such stockholder whatever may remain unpaid," etc. The declaration in in this case also avers that this was a promise to pay to the company; and the agreed statement of facts also makes the company the payee.

In some jurisdictions it is held that a subscription does not give a cause of action, but that a default simply involves a forfeiture of the stock. This legislation makes the subscription an actionable agreement and gives the right of action exclusively to the company.

Views as to the nature of a stock subscription somewhat variant from the foregoing, but leading to the same result, have been expressed in the Massachusetts Supreme Court.

In the cases of Thompson v. Page, 1 Met. 565, and Ives v. Sterling, 6 Met. 310, the subscriptions were in terms made payable to such persons as might be thereafter authorized by the corporation to receive them; and the persons so authorized were sustained in actions brought by them.

In Athol Music Hall Co. v. Carey, 116 Mass. 471, the subscription contract was by the subscribers to and with each other, to associate themselves into a corporation and to pay to the treasurer of said corporation the amount set against their respective names, etc. The action for the unpaid subscription was brought by the corporation. The court said:

"In agreements of this nature, entered into before the organization is formed, or the agent constituted to receive the amounts subscribed, the difficulty is to ascertain the promisee, in whose name alone suit can be brought. The promise of each subscriber, 'to and with each other,' is not a contract capable of being enforced, or intended to operate literally as a contract to be enforced between each subscriber and each other who may have signed previously, or who should sign afterwards, nor between each subscriber and all the others collectively as individuals. The undertaking is inchoate and incomplete as a contract until the contemplated organization is effected, or the mutual agent constituted to represent the association of individual rights in accepting and acting upon the propositions offered by the several subscriptions. When thus accepted, the promise may be construed to have legal effect according to its purpose and intent, and the practical necessity of the case; to wit: as a contract with the common representative of the several associates * * *

"In this agreement the treasurer of the corporation to be established is expressly made payee. The corporation is the aggregate of the several individuals entering into the agreement, one of whose terms was that they should thus associate and confer their individual rights upon the corporation. We are of opinion that the corporation, and the corporation alone, is the proper party to bring an action upon such an agreement. The corresponding agreements of the other subscribers, the organization of the corporation, and the allotment to the defendant of the shares for which he subscribed, furnish sufficient consideration for his promise to take and pay for those shares. Although his promise was originally voluntary, * * * yet having been accepted and acted on by the party authorized so to do before he attempted to retract it, he has lost the right to revoke. His proposition has become an accepted mutual contract, and is binding upon him as well as upon the corporation."

We may assume, then, that although the subscribers are the promisees, the payee is the corporation, and it has the same relation to the subscriber as if the promise had been made to the corporation after its legal existence was complete.

This then is simply a debt to the corporation, a chose in action. And the plaintiff, Glenn, is confronted at the outset by the defendant's objection that his debt could not be assigned by the corporation so as to give to any assignee the right to sue the defendant in his own name.

Undoubtedly the common law is so.

The express company could not have made a specific assignment of this subscription with that effect; nor is the legal result changed by embracing this unpaid subscription in a general assignment of all the assets of the company. It is still, quoad this debt, simply an assignment of a chose in action. Whatever effect is given by statute to an assignment by operation of law, as in bankruptcy, it still remains true that a voluntary assignment, whether general or specific, of a chose in action, can transfer only the equitable interest in it, so as to enable the assignee to sue in the name of the assignor for his use.

How the force of this objection is felt by the plaintiff's counsel is indicated by the ingenious reasoning employed to obviate it.

It is said that this undertaking of the stockholder is not a consummated contract until a certain condition happens, viz.: the call on him for payment by the president and directors; that when that call took place in the present case the debt had become the property of another, to wit: the trustee; and therefore when it became a complete indebtedness it was due to the trustee.

But this assumes the whole question. Whether complete or incomplete, the indebtedness was nothing more than a chose in action; and the very question is how and to what extent it became the property of the assignee, and to this question apply all the considerations just enunciated.

But besides it is an error to speak of the contract as not consummated and complete before the money was payable. At least from the moment when the corporation came into being, the subscription was a complete contract. The payment, it is true, was not to be made until called for, but it was none the less a promise to pay to the company when called upon; and the call for payment could make no change in the parties to the contract.

Perhaps the most ingenious argument is derived from the admitted rule that an assignment of a chose in action, with the right of action on it, may be made if the debtor assents to it and promises to pay to the assignee.

It is attempted to apply this rule to the present case by arguing that every stockholder is presumed to assent to every disposition of the corporate property made by the corporation.

It is not pretended that the defendant's testator ever specifically assented to the assignment of his indebtedness; but reliance is placed only on the general authority which the law implies from the stockholders to their common agent, the corporation, to use the property of the concern in the conduct and settlement of its business, which, it is claimed, would include the power to assign it in payment of debts.

But this does not advance us a step. Whether the power thus to deal with the property be said to be given by the law or to rest upon an implied assent or authority of the stockholders, it cannot amount to more than an authority to deal with the property in such manner as the subject matter will admit of; in other words, to make such assignments as the nature of the property will allow, which, in the case of choses in action, would be merely equitable.

In the case of choses in action, consisting of debts due by strangers, the stockholders could not authorize any other assignment of them than the law permits, as before explained. In the case of debts due by the stockholders themselves, why should a different presumption exist or a different rule apply?

The stockholder occupies a double relation to the company. Qua debtor, he has not promised to pay to the company's order or to its assignee, but to the company only. Qua stockholder, he cannot be held to have given more than the general authority to the corporation to deal with its property, which I have already mentioned and which is consistent with the rules of law as to choses in action.

If we go further than this, we must hold that the mere fact of being a stockholder in a corporation makes his indebtedness a negotiable one, even against the terms of his agreement with the company and the intention of the parties. Thus, if a stockholder borrowed money from the company on his sealed bond, the argument would be that as his bond is a part of the assets of the company and he has generally and impliedly assented to the assignment or negotiation of its property, as it may think best, ergo his bond may be negotiated like a promissory note.

But this reasoning would not stop at corporations. It would apply equally to partnerships. Each member of a partnership is the agent of all, and all the others are the agents of each, and all or each would have authority to settle debts by the assignment of property of the firm.

If, then, one becomes indebted to the firm on an open account, the firm, on the principles before mentioned, could assign or negotiate the debt, and so give the assignee a right of action in his own name. In such action the plaintiff, after stating the original indebtedness and its assignment, which would make a demurrable case, would only have to supplement it by an averment that the debtor was a member of the firm who made the assignment, and his case would be complete. It is hardly necessary to say that this would be a novelty in the law of contracts and actions and pleadings, for which not a semblance of authority could be found.

The decree in the Chancery Court of Richmond cannot affect the question. We have no doubt of the right of the corporation to make a general assignment of all its assets, which would include an equitable assignment of its choses in action, to trustees, for the benefit of creditors, without the concurrence of the stockholders. Nor do we doubt the authority of any court, having obtained jurisdiction over the corporation, to require it to do what it might do voluntarily, to decree a transfer of its assets to a trustee or to remove a trustee and appoint a new one and vest in him all the title which the corporation may have given to a former one, without having the stockholders before them. Nor do we doubt the power of the court to do what the president and directors omitted to do, to wit: to make a formal call and assessment on the stockholders on account of their unpaid subscriptions for the benefit of creditors, the result of all which would be that the substituted trustee would have the right and it would be his duty to call on the stockholders for the assessment and, on their refusal to pay, to institute suit against them in the name of the corporation.

This was, substantially, what the Chancery Court of Richmond ordered the plaintiff to do, that is: "To collect and receive the said call and assessment and to take such prompt steps to that end, by suit or otherwise, and in such jurisdictions, as he may be advised."

It is not altogether clear that the court meant to decree that he was entitled to sue in his own name, or to order him to do so.

If the court is to be so understood, we do not hesitate to say that the decree is void, as to the stockholders, in this respect, for want of jurisdiction, because they were not parties to the suit.

Undoubtedly in its relations to third persons, the corporation represents the stockholders; and it is not necessary to make the latter parties to a suit, in order to obtain a decree or judgment against the corporation which may be enforced against the tangible corporate property.

But where rights are to be determined as between the corporation and the stockholder, where the latter may have an adversary interest, and his property may be affected, it is evident.

dent that no decree can bind him in a suit to which he is not personally, instead of by representation, made a party.

For example: his indebtedness to the corporation could not be garnished by a creditor, by a proceeding in the common-law courts or its equivalent in an equity court, without serving process on him.

And, while a court might compel the corporation to make such a transfer of his debt as it might make voluntarily without his concurrence, no court could, by force of its own decree alone, convert his indebtedness to the corporation into an indebtedness to someone else, without even notifying him. If it could do this, it would have little difficulty in going a step further and making a money decree against him, without giving him his day in court.

We have been referred to a number of cases in which suits similar to the present have been sustained in the state and federal courts.

But the present question does not seem to be discussed in any of the opinions rendered except in Glenn v. Scott, in the Circuit Court for the Western District of Virginia. In that case the declaration averred the assignment of the subscriptions of the defendant stockholder to the trustees, and that the defendant had assented to it; just as in this case.

The case came before the court on a demurrer to the declaration which admitted the plaintiff's case, as the present case did in the the court below; and the court could do nothing else than render judgment against the defendant. Judge Bond also held the case to be within the Code of Virginia of 1873, which, in this respect, only repeats the Code of 1849, and provides that:

"The assignee of any bond, note or writing not negotiable, may maintain an action thereon in his own name which the original obligee or payee might have brought."

If, however, it is attempted to apply that law to the present case, it is seen that a conflict of laws arises. By our law, which is the common law, no such action can be maintained, and the question is whether the Virginia Code or our common law is to determine the right to sue.

If the Code determines the contract right of the parties and operates upon the title, it must prevail if this is to be considered a Virginia contract. If it goes only to the remedy, the lex fori must prevail. We are relieved from any trouble upon this question by the decisions of the court of last resort of Virginia upon the effect of her Code.

The following cases were decided in 1857, when the Code of 1849 was still in force and was the law governing the subscriptions in this case.

In Davis v. Miller, 14 Gratt. 13, the court said:

"The Code declares that 'The assignee of any bond, note or writing not negotiable may maintain any action thereon in his own name which the original obligee or payee might have brought.' This section is the same in effect with 1 Revised Code, chap. 126, § 5. It applies only to writings not negotiable, and its only effect is to authorize the assignee of such writings to sue at law in his own name. The legal title still remains in the assignor, in whose name the suit at law may be brought."

The case of Clarksons v. Doddridge, 14 Gratt. 42, was an action by certain commissioners in chancery on a bond for purchase money for property sold by them. The plea was that by a subsequent decree other commissioners had been appointed in their place, so that the bond had been, by the action of the court, assigned to the latter, and the question was whether the action ought not to be brought by them. The court said:

"Was the action properly brought in the names of the commissioners to whom the bonds were payable? Or ought it to have been brought in the names of the new and substituted commissioners?"

"It is a general rule that an action on a contract must be brought in the name of the party in whom the legal interest in such contract is vested. The Legislature alone has power to make an exception to this rule. An exception is made by the Code, chap. 144, § 14, par. 583, which authorizes the assignee of any bond, note or writing not negotiable to maintain thereupon any action in his own name which the original obligee or payee might have brought. The assignee acquires only an equitable right with a capacity expressly given him by statute to assert it at law in his own name. But the legal title still remaining in the obligee or payee, a right of action is incident thereto; and the assignee may, at his election, sue at law in his own name or in that of the obligee or payee for his benefit. Garland v. Richeson, 4 Rand. 266.

"Another exception seems to be made by the Code, chap. 116, § 2, par. 500.

"It is also a general rule that the legal interest in an obligation for the payment of money is vested in the obligee or his personal representative. The exceptions to this rule also must be derived from the statute law, and are few in number. An exception arises in England under the Statute of Bankruptcy, which expressly vests the bankrupt's right of property and of action in his assignees, who may therefore maintain in their own name an action on a bond payable to the bankrupt. A bond payable to a corporation aggregate is not an exception to the rule, though an action thereon must be brought in the name of the corporation, and not of the persons composing it when the bond is executed, or their personal representatives. The corporation itself, and not the persons composing it, is the obligee; and the case therefore falls within the rule, and not the exceptions. A different rule is said to be applicable to a bond payable to a person, who is a corporation sole; in which case an action at law upon the bond must after his death be brought in the name of his personal representative, and not of his successor. There is a strong instance of this kind in a case very recently decided by the Court of Queen's Bench, in which it was held that a bond given to the ordinary by an administrator, under the Statute of Distributions, passes, on the ordinary's death, to his personal representative, and not to his successor. Howley v. Knight, 14 Adolph. & Ell. 240; 68 Eng. C. L. 238.

"In the case under consideration the bonds are payable to Miller and Doddridge, the old commissioners, in whom, therefore, by the very terms of the bonds, and according to the general rule of law before stated, the legal interest in and right of action on the bonds were vested. There is no law in existence which divests this legal interest and right of action. The court of chancery, it is true, was authorized by law to substitute new in place of old commissioners. But the effect of such substitution was not to transfer the legal interest in the bonds from the old to the new commissioners. It only authorized the new commissioners, upon giving the security required by law, to collect the bonds, and to bring suit, if necessary, for the recovery thereof in the names of the old commissioners. The right of the new commissioners to receive the money does not imply a right to bring an action therefor in their own names. A person may have a right to receive money, without any corresponding right to bring an action for it in his own name. This happens whenever a chose in action (not negotiable by the law merchant, and not coming under the provisions in the Code, chap. 144, § 14) is assigned. The assignee has a right to receive the money but not to bring an action therefor in his own name. He has, however, an ample remedy.

"He has a right to bring an action at law in the name of his assignor; and he will be regarded, even by a court of law, as the substantial plaintiff in the action. The court will protect his rights and will not permit the nominal plaintiff to receive the money, nor to release the debt, nor to dismiss the action. The same principle applies to this case.

"The circuit court was, therefore, right in saying that the present commissioners have a right to sue upon the bonds in the name of Miller and Doddridge, the obligees."

Judge Bond must have taken the same view, since he rests his opinion on the Code of 1873, which was adopted seven years after these subscriptions were made. He could hardly have held that to operate retrospectively on the contract, while it clearly could on the remedy.

Apart from the Code of Virginia, it is admitted that the equitable title to a chose in action can be assigned so that the assignee may institute a suit at common law in the assignor's name for his use. According to the decisions just referred to, the Code makes no change in the title, but superadds to the remedy just mentioned a right of action by the assignee, in his own name.

This, then, clearly relates to the remedy only; and the rule applies which Dr. Wharton lays down in his Conflict of Laws, § 785, as follows, viz.:

"Whether an assignee can sue in his own name is sometimes a technical question and sometimes one that is essential. When it is technical (i. e. when the point is merely whether the suit is to be brought by A to the use of B, or by B immediately, there being no dispute that the title as between the two is virtually in B) then the lex fori is to decide. It is a mere matter of process. If allowed by the lex fori the assignee may sue in his own name although forbidden by the foreign law to which the obligation is subject. If forbidden by the lex fori, the assignee cannot sue in his own name, though permitted to do so by the foreign law to which the obligation is subject. See also, to the same effect, Story, Conf. L. §§ 298, 332, 473."

And so here we assume that the plaintiff is entitled to sue for the unpaid subscriptions to the extent called for, and the question is whether he shall sue in his own name or in that of the corporation to his use. By the law of this District he must do the latter, and that is the law of this case.

We have not deemed it necessary to express an opinion upon any of the other questions in the case, but judgment must be entered for the defendant.

Christian RUPPERT

v.

George A. HASKE et al.

A mistake in the description of a recorded deed will not be corrected by a court of equity, to the prejudice of the rights of bona fide judgment creditors of the grantee having a lien upon the property.

(Decided November 1, 1886.)

CASE certified from the Court of Equity to be heard at General Term in the first instance.

This was a proceeding upon a bill by the assignee of certain notes secured by deed of trust, to reform and correct a deed of trust for error alleged to have been made therein through the mutual mistake of the grantor and grantee.

The bill was filed January 6, 1885; and after setting out the several judgments obtained by several of the codefendants against the defendant, George A. Haske, it alleged that on September 6, 1871, one Nancy Kilafoyle was seised of the west thirty feet front by the depth thereof of lot four in square 844, and being so seised contracted to sell and did sell to one Bedelia Haske, now deceased, the east fourteen feet eight and one half inches front of the said thirty feet front of said lot; but that by deed dated on said day and duly recorded January 30, 1872, she conveyed to said Bedelia Haske the west fourteen feet, eight and one half inches front of said thirty feet, and that at the same time she delivered to the said Bedelia Haske, and the said Bedelia Haske accepted possession of the said east fourteen feet, eight and one half inches of said thirty feet and the house and improvements thereon.

It also alleges that prior to the first of May, 1873, the said Bedelia Haske applied to the German American Savings Bank for a loan upon said eastern portion of said thirty feet, and an examination of the title then made revealed the fact that the conveyance to Mrs. Haske embraced the western instead of the eastern portion thereof; that for the purpose of correcting this mistake the said Kilafoyle and Haske on or about the 17th of May, 1873, exchanged deeds of conveyance with each other, whereby the said Kilafoyle conveyed to said Haske the said eastern portion of said land, and the said Haske reconveyed to the said Kilafoyle the said western portion thereof, and the said deeds were duly recorded; that having corrected said error the said Bedelia Haske and her husband, the judgment defendant, George A. Haske, obtained from said bank the sum of $1,500 upon a note dated May 5, 1873, and executed a deed of trust to secure the said note; that it was agreed between all the parties to said transaction that the said eastern portion of said thirty feet of said lot should be included in said deed, but that by error of the scrivener the said western portion was described in said deed of trust; the said trust being recorded in liber, etc.

The bill further alleged that at that time the said Kilafoyle owned and had possession of, and claimed as sole owner, the said western portion of said land, and the said Haske the said eastern portion; that the error was due to the commencement at the wrong point of beginning, the rest of the description being correct; that the said eastern portion was then in the possession of said Haske and claimed solely by her, and that the said money was actually advanced upon the faith that said eastern portion was embraced in the deed of trust.

It also alleges that subsequently the complainant, at the request of Bedelia Haske and George A. Haske, purchased the said note from the receiver of said bank, the then owner thereof, for its full face value and interest to date, without any knowledge or notice of any misdescription in the deed of trust, and after the said eastern portion of said property had been pointed out to him by said Haske as the property actually embraced in said deed of trust; and that at the same time complainant entered into an agreement with the said Bedelia and George A. Haske, extending the time of payment of said note for two years, with the privilege of a further extension for an additional two years and a reduction of interest from 10 to 8 per cent.

That on May 22, 1880, Bedelia Haske, by deed duly recorded, conveyed all her estate to Bernard A. Haske, in trust for the defendant George A. Haske, without any valuable consideration. Shortly thereafter Bedelia Haske died intestate.

That on April 8, 1879, the defendants Selzer and Miller secured a judgment against the defendant George A. Haske, and on February 23, 1884, they filed a bill against said George and others, to subject the said western portion of said lot to sale to satisfy their judgment; and obtained a decree for the sale of the same; that on December 2, 1884, the trustee under the decree in said cause undertook to sell said western portion of said lot, and only discovered, at the sale, the error in the deed of trust; that neither the complainant nor any of the other parties in interest had, until that time, any knowledge of the error; that thereupon, on December 12, 1884, the said defendants Selzer and Miller filed another bill against said George A. Haske, alleging that he was the equitable owner of the said eastern part of said lot, and praying for a sale of the same to satisfy their judgment.

That said judgment creditors had, prior to the institution of said suit, full notice of the errors thereinbefore referred to, and that complainant had an equitable mortgage on the said eastern portion of said lot, and a paramount right to the same over those of said judgment creditors and all other persons. The bill then prayed that the deed of trust be reformed so as to include the east fourteen feet eight and one half inches of said west thirty feet of said lot, instead of said west fourteen feet, eight and one half inches thereof, or that complainant be decreed to have an equitable mortgage on the same; that a trustee might be appointed to sell the same in satisfaction of complainant's debt; that the defendants be enjoined from proceeding against the same, and that the defendants Selzer and Miller might be enjoined from prosecuting their suit in equity, or in any way endeavoring to assert a lien, by reason of their judgment, upon said land prior to the equitable claim and equitable mortgage of the complainant.

Decrees pro confesso were taken against all the defendants except Selzer and Miller, who filed their joint answer, in which they substantially denied all the material averments of the bill, and claimed the right, as judgment creditors, to subject the said lot to the satisfaction of their judgment.

Testimony being taken the cause was calendared for hearing, and was then by the justice holding the special term, certified to the general term, to be there heard in the first instance.

Mr. James M. Johnston, for complainant:

It is submitted that the evidence shows distinctly and indisputably that the intention of the contracting parties was to convey the eastern portion of lot 4, instead of the western portion. The evidence clearly establishes a mistake of fact which is one to be relieved in equity.

The only opposition to the reformation of the deed comes from judgment creditors. The claims of a judgment creditor do not rise as high as those of a purchaser. The lien of the judgment creditor is subject to every lien that could have been maintained against the judgment defendant.

2 White & T. L. Cas. pp. 44, 89-92, and cases cited; Brown v. Pierce, 7 Wall. 217, 218 (74 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 134); Skidmore v. Pittsburg, etc. R. R. Co. 112 U. S. 38, 86 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 626); Baker v. Morton, 12 Wall. 150, 158 (79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 262).

The only remaining question is whether the complainant's right to reform his deed is affected by the Act of April 29, 1878 (20 Stat. at L. p. 40), which provides that deeds of trust, etc., shall take effect and be valid as to creditors, from the date of record only.

Whatever effect may be given to that Act, in a proper case, it is submitted that the "creditors" protected by the Act are the creditors of a grantor and not those of a grantee. Such was the construction given the Kentucky Statute, which uses the broad term "any creditors," by the Supreme Court.

Mr. Justice Merrick delivered the opinion of the court:

The object of this proceeding is to rectify a mistake in a certain deed of trust made by George A. Haske and wife, to secure a certain debt, which by assignment came afterwards into the ownership of Christian Ruppert, the complainant.

After the deed of trust had been made and had thus rested for several years, it appeared that there had been a mistake made in the description of the property. By an error in the recitals of the scrivener he had conveyed the west half of a certain lot instead of the east half of it. Subsequently the deed of conveyance of the property was corrected as between the original parties, but the deed of trust was not corrected; and afterwards (after the correction) the grantee in it, Bedelia Haske, conveyed the property in trust for the benefit of her husband, George A. Haske.

While the property was thus in the possession of George A. Haske as cestui que trust under a complete and vested title, certain judgments were obtained against George A. Haske, and afterwards, the judgment creditors, for the purpose of perfecting the lien upon the equitable estate, filed their bill in equity to subject that real estate to the payment of the judgments; and in that state of case the beneficiaries under the deed of trust filed their bill to correct the description in the deed, so as to override the perfected, equitable lien which had been obtained in the manner I have indicated by the judgment creditors of the cestui que trust and grantee in the corrected deed.

The question now before the court therefore is whether under these circumstances a correction can be made in the deed, as between grantor and grantee, so as to oust the perfected equitable lien obtained by the judgment creditors of the cestui que trust, the grantee or beneficiary under the deed of trust.

Notwithstanding the provisions of the Recording Acts of the States, it at one time had come to be a pervading idea that an equitable title in a party who had had a mistake made in his legal rights would override the lien of a judgment creditor. But of recent years a more correct view has been taken of the obligation resting upon all parties to take notice of and be bound by the record titles of the country. And courts the most eminent have regretted that there has ever been a departure from the requirements of the record law so as to let in an equity of an unwritten kind to oust the title and deprive parties who have given credit to others upon the faith of the record titles.

But however that may be, we have recently had legislation which explicitly declares that the record title as it stands shall be binding in in favor of the creditors and subsequent purchasers of notes so as to exclude these latent equities in behalf of the party, which of course would be perfect as between the original parties. And such has been the special provision of the Act of 1878 in this District, and upon that Act this court has explicitly decided in the case of Bank v. Hitz, reported in 1 Mackey, 125, that the rights of creditors are saved and they cannot be invaded by virtue of the provision of that law which says that an unrecorded title shall not prevail against the creditors or bona fide purchasers.

To the same effect have been the statutory provisions in several of the States and the judgments of the highest courts of the land in conformity with those statutes, upholding the policy and maintaining the integrity of the terms of the statute. Amongst others may be mentioned the case in 11 How. 140 [52 U. S. bk. 13, L. ed. 684], of McCoy v. Rhodes, and the other case of Taylor v. Doe, in 13 How. 298 [54 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 149].

These decisions render it, in our judgment, no longer an open question in this court, and make it imperative upon us to say that the equity to reform a deed under these circumstances cannot prevail against a bona fide judgment creditor who has a legal lien, or in case of an equitable estate has taken the necessary steps to perfect his equitable lien on such estate.

"Against any creditor" is the language of the Statute of 1878; and being bound by that decision and that recognized policy, we are constrained to say that the application to reform the deed as against the present judgment creditors cannot prevail in this court. So far as the rights, if there be any, the legitimate rights, of the grantee are concerned, after the satisfaction of the judgment creditors, of course the reformation will be granted to that extent.

The decree will be made in conformity with this opinion.

UNITED STATES

v.

William A. PHILLIPS et al.

On a judgment of the criminal court sustaining a demurrer to an indictment, the United States has no right of appeal to the general term.

(Decided October 26, 1886.)

MOTION to dismiss an appeal taken by the United States from a judgment of the Criminal Court, sustaining a demurrer to an indictment for conspiracy. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. H. Wells, for defendants, for the motion:

The jurisdiction of this court on appeal is purely statutory. Section 772 defines the extent thereof:

This court has repeatedly construed the meaning of that statute, and has uniformly held that no order was appealable which merely affected the merits, "but it must be a judgment determining the controversy."

Phillips v. Negley, 2 Mackey, 236.

No order, judgment or decree is appealable which, if not set aside or reversed, will not put an end to the suit or controversy.

Id. 254, citing: Parsons v. Parker, 3 McCa. 9; Adams v. Adams, 2 McCa. 276; Bryan v. Sanderson, 3 McCa. 402; Philp v. Gardner and U. S. v. Wood, 1 McCa. 185, 241; Connor v. Peugh's Lessee, 18 How. 895 (59 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 432); Wyle v. Coze, 14 How. 1 (55 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 301).

Parsons v. Parker, cited above, held that the overruling or sustaining a demurrer was not a final, appealable judgment, especially if the right to amend was given.

The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on the same subject are equally uniform and emphatic.

See Mayberry v. Thompson, 5 How. 121 (46 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 78); Mordecai v. Lindsay, Beebe v. Russell and Furrelly v. Woodfolk, 19 How. 199, 283, 288 (60 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 624, 668, 670); U. S. v. Fossett, 2 How. 445 (62 U. S. bk. 16, L. ed. 185); Barton v. Forsyth, 5 Wall. 190 (72 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 545).

A decree is final which leaves "nothing to be litigated between the parties."

Withenbury v. U. S. 5 Wall. 819 (72 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 613).

In Butterfield v. Usher, 91 U. S. 246 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 818), the court said: "Our jurisdiction upon appeal is statutory only. If some Act of Congress does not authorize a case to be brought here, we cannot take jurisdiction of it. The decree (of the Supreme Court, D. C.) here appealed from, disposed finally of a motion made in the case, but not of the case itself." It was therefore held not appealable.

In Harrington v. Holler, 111 U. S. 796 (See Bk. 28, L. ed. 602), it was held that the dismissal of an appeal was not a final decision. "The use of the term 'final decision' does not enlarge the scope of the jurisdiction of this court (on appeal). It is a substitute for the words 'final judgments and decrees,' and means the same thing."

Bostwick v. Brinkerhoff, 106 U. S. 3 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 73), was the case of a demurrer sustained below and overruled in the court of appeals. The supreme court said: "The rule is well settled and of long standing that a judgment or decree to be final (under the appeal statutes) must terminate the litigation between the parties on the merits of the case." "If the judgment is not one which disposes of the whole case on its merits, it is not final."

De Armas' Heirs v. U. S. 6 How. 103 (47 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 861), decides that a judgment sustaining a demurrer to a petition for the confirmation of a land claim, but taking no further order on the petition, is not a final judgment from which an appeal will lie.

A judgment sustaining a demurrer to an indictment is not a bar to a new indictment or a trial thereon.

1 Whart. Cr. Law. § 528; U. S. v. Watkins, 8 Cranch. C. C. 441; State v. Dresser, 54 Maine 569; U. S. v. Neversen, 1 Mackey, 152; Commonwealth v. Cook, 6 Serg. & R. 577; 1 Bish Cr. Law. § 856; U. S. v. Bigelow, 3 Mackey, 393; People v. Goodwin, 18 Johns. 188; 4 Wash.

C. C. 402; U. S. v. Perce, 9 Wheat. 579 (22 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 185).

Color for a claim to the right of appeal on the part of the Government is given by the decision in State v. Buchanan, 5 Har. & J. 329, decided in 1821. That case decided that a writ of error would lie to the judgment of a court sustaining a demurrer to an indictment; but the decision was rested on the authority of Hale's Pleas of the Crown, which in turn founded that supposed right on the assumption that a judgment or demurrer put the party in jeopardy, so that if again indicted he could plead that judgment as a former acquittal. Such, however, as we have already seen, is not and has not been the law for the last century at least.

It will be found that in almost all of the States the right of appeal is denied to the State in criminal cases, except where granted by special statute. It is denied in the following and other States:

New York: People v. Adams, 8 Denio, 190, 191; People v. Corning, 2 N. Y. 9; Illinois: People v. Dill, 1 Scam. 257; People v. Glodo, 12 Ill. App. 848; Virginia: Commonwealth v. Harrison, 2 Va. Cas. 202; Georgia: State v. Jones, 7 Ga. 422; Iowa: State v. Johnson, 2 Clarke, 549; Florida: Sargeant v. Russ, 20 Fla. 438; State v. Burns, 18 Fla. 185; Kansas: State v. Phillips, 38 Kans. 100.

Statutes now exist giving the right of appeal to the State, under varying circumstances, in New York, Arkansas, Tennessee, Alabama, North Carolina, Missouri, Louisiana, California, Nebraska, Kentucky, Maryland and other States, but I have not found that it has been held in any State, except Maryland, that this right of appeal exists in behalf of the State independent of statute.

See 3 Whart. Cr. L. § 3215.

Mr. A. S. Worthington, for the United States, contra:

The right to this appeal is given by statute. The whole law regulating appeals to this court in general term is contained in section 772, R. S. D. C.

This section is brought from section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1863, 12 Stat. at L. 763.

It will be remembered that in Ex parte Bradley, 7 Wall. 364 (74 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 214), it was in 1869 held that the Criminal Court of this District was a different court from the Supreme Court of the District, and not a special term of that court; and that to meet the difficulty thus created Congress enacted in 1870 that which is now section 753, R. S. D. C.

And section 759 provides that "the special term held as the criminal court, shall be holden," etc.

It is clear, therefore, that the right of appeal given by section 772 to any party aggrieved by any order or judgment made or pronounced at any special term, applies to the orders and judgments of the special term holding a criminal court.

It is not a matter of doubt that the United States is a party to the proceeding; and it would seem to be obvious that it is aggrieved when it is denied the right to be heard in its own tribunal.

Analogous to this question is that as to the right of appeal in habeas corpus proceedings.

Section 763, R. S. U. S. provides that from the final decision upon an application for a writ of habeas corpus "an appeal may be taken to the circuit court." In the case of Taylor, 3 Mac Arthur, 426, this court sustained the Government's right of appeal, the court saying:

"The language giving appeal is general, and we think it would be straining the meaning of the legislation to confine it to one side."

Clearly, section 772 must be held to mean that the United States shall have the right of appeal as well as the defendant; and if that right is to be denied, it must be because Congress had no power to confer it.

Is the statute constitutional? The only clause of the Constitution that can affect this question is that part of article 5 of the Amendments, providing:

"Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb."

It seems idle to cite authorities to show that jeopardy does not begin until a jury has been charged with the case; but see,

Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. 517; 1 Bish. Cr. Law, 1014.

The Maryland case of State v. Buchanan, 5 Harris & J. 817, was an indictment for conspiracy. A demurrer to the indictment had been sustained by the county court and the defendants discharged. The State had obtained a writ of error. After a very thorough discussion the court of appeals sustained the right of the State to the writ of error, reversed the judgment of the county court, and awarded a writ of procedendo directing "a new trial of the prosecution."

At that time, in Maryland, even the defendant was not entitled to a bill of exceptions in a criminal case.

See Queen v. State, 5 Harris & J. 282.

The decision in State v. Buchanan, therefore, put the State on an equality with the defendant in the matter of the right of appeal.

In this District, almost immediately after the session, Congress created a court called the "Circuit Court of the District of Columbia," which had all the powers vested in the Circuit Courts of the United States.

Act of February 27, 1801, 2 Stat. at L. 105.

From that time until 1838 the circuit court had exclusive jurisdiction in both civil and criminal cases in the District.

Id. p. 106, § 5.

There was no appeal or writ of error in any case, except to or from the Supreme Court of the United States. The right of appeal exercised as a matter of course in criminal cases by the State of Maryland about this time, the United States appears to have continued to avail itself of, after the passage of the Act of 1801 above cited.

In 1 Cranch, 252 (5 U. S. bk. 2, L. ed. 98), will be found the case of U. S. v. Simms, a criminal case, in which the Government, in 1803, sued out a writ of error to obtain a revision of a judgment in favor of the defendant in the Circuit Court of the District, and which was argued and decided (against the United States) without any question being made by counsel or the court as to the right of the Government to take up the case.

Again; in 1805 the United States, in a case in which the Circuit Court of the District had sustained a demurrer to an indictment, sued out a writ of error to the supreme court.

U. S. v. More, 3 Cranch, 159 (7 U. S. bk. 2, L. ed. 397).

In that case neither the court nor counsel suggested any distinction between the right of the government and of the defendant to have a criminal case reviewed in the supreme court; but the court, sua sponte, suggested a doubt as to whether its appellate jurisdiction extended to criminal cases at all. The point having been argued the court held that it had no appellate jurisdiction whatever in criminal cases.

In consequence of this ruling, from 1805 to 1838 there was no appeal in this District in a criminal case by either party. Before 1805 both parties appealed; from 1805 to 1838 neither party could appeal; all the time there was perfect equality.

By the Act of July 7, 1838, the "Criminal Court of the District of Columbia" was created. 5 Stat. at L. 306.

That Act provided for a writ of error to the circuit court in any criminal case wherein final judgment shall have been pronounced "convicting any person of any crime or misdemeanor." Thus the statute by its very terms prevented the Government from appealing, because appeals were not to be allowed when the judgment was in favor of the defendant.

This continued to be the state of the law until March 3, 1863, when this court was created. 12 Stat. at L. 762.

The fifth section of that Act, as already stated, contained the provision as to appeals which is now incorporated in section 772 of the Revised Statutes of the District. It gave any person aggrieved by a judgment at any special term the right to appeal to the general term.

But, as already stated, the supreme court decided in Ex parte Bradley that the criminal court, although held by a Judge of the Supreme Court of the District, was not a special term. Hence the Act of 1838 still regulated appeals from the criminal court, and the United States could not appeal, because no statute authorized it to do so.

Finally, by the Act of June 21, 1870, 16 Stat. at L. 160, the criminal court was declared to be a special term of this court; and thereafter the law on this subject remained as it is now.

It is said that no appeal has been taken by the United States in a criminal case in this District since the Act of 1870. This may be the case. It is a right not to be exercised merely because it exists. In State v. Buchanan, supra, the court, while deciding in favor of the right of the State to appeal, says: "It is, perhaps, a right that should be seldom exercised."

Suppose the case to be, then, that the United States has not attempted to appeal in a criminal case in this District for sixteen years. On what ground and by what analogy can that fact be said to control the construction of the statute giving it the right to appeal? I leave it to the defendant's counsel to answer the question. In the habeas corpus case of Taylor, already cited, the Act giving the right of appeal was ended. C.

acted in 1842, and the United States in fact take an appeal until 1870.

The rule in other courts of the United States. The decision in U. S. v. More, upon the ground that the Act gave a writ of error to the Circuit Court limited it to cases "where in dispute" should exceed the value which did not, as the court says, in all cases, because in these cases is the guilt or innocence of the defendant, the law granting appeals and writs arising in the Circuit Court of the United States, now and ever since 1789, is a general provision.

The right to a review in the United States in cases in which the value of the property in dispute exceeds the value of the lars.

Judiciary Act, § 22, 1 Stat. at L. 692.

There are a few exceptions to the rule that none of them applies to criminal cases. R. S. 699.

And so it has always been held that a criminal case cannot be taken to the circuit court by either party.

Ex parte Kearney, 7 Wheat. 15, L. ed. 391; Forsythe v. U. S., 5 U. S. bk. 13, L. ed. 262; Ex parte Taylor, 110 U. S. 651 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 27).

Such cases occasionally go to the circuit court on a certificate of division below; but they can get there in no other way.

Ex parte Gordon, 1 Black, 50, L. ed. 134.

The only exception to this is in U. S. v. More, which was taken to the circuit court by the defendant upon a writ of error to a special class of cases, and in general words that writs of error might be taken to the supreme court.

Act of February 22, 1847, § 129.

In Forsythe's Case the appeal was taken by the defendant. His right to appeal, the court said:

"Congress * * * intended to give the parties to the suit or process a right to a revision by this court of the judgments or decrees rendered by judges therein * * * whether in criminal or civil jurisdiction."

In all the other courts of the United States, in respect of the rights of the parties in criminal cases reviewed, and there always has been a right to appeal between the defendant and the government.

The rule in the state courts. The rule in the state courts is the same. It is proposed to go at length into the question on this subject. Enough to demonstrate that there is no suggestion of the Government from a judgment putting an end to the case.

Of course the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States has in its Constitution against double jeopardy; and this under consideration is precisely the States that it is in the United States.

The law of Maryland has already been considered.

In New York, as in Maryland, the State for many years took appeals in criminal cases (when there had not been an acquittal by a jury) without its right to do so being doubted. And in New York, as in Maryland, the question was finally made; but in New York it was held that the practice was wrong.

People v. Corning, 2 N. Y. 9.

This decision was made by the court of appeals in 1848. It was based upon the fact that by the New York Statute the right to bring a writ of error in a criminal case was given to the accused, and was not given to the people. About the same time the same question was before the "Court for the Correction of Errors" in New York, and was decided the other way.

DeBov v. People, 2 N. Y. 10, note a.

In 1852 the Legislature of New York amended the law so as to give the State the right to have judgments in criminal cases reviewed, except when the defendant had been acquitted by a jury.

Laws of 1852, p. 76. See People v. Comstock, 8 Wend. 549.

And this continues to be the law of New York to the present day.

In Indiana the State for many years had appealed at its pleasure in criminal cases; but the decision in New York in People v. Corning induced lawyers in Indiana to endeavor to put a stop to the practice. The effort was unsuccessful. A comparison of the New York case and the Indiana decisions is instructive.

State v. Daily, 6 Ind. 9. See also State v. Bartlett, 9 Ind. 569.

In Pennsylvania the State seems to have exercised the right of appeal in criminal cases from the beginning without question.

Commonwealth v. Taylor, 5 Binn. 277; Commonwealth v. McKisson, 8 Serg. & R. 420. See Commonwealth v. Capp, 48 Pa. 53.

In 1828 the Legislature in Virginia empowered the State to bring a writ of error in a certain class of criminal cases; and this right it continued to avail itself of down at least to 1858.

Scott's Case, 10 Gratt. 754.

In North Carolina, without any statute, but under a constitutional provision giving the supreme court of the State "jurisdiction to review on appeal any decision of the courts below, upon any matter of law or legal inference," it has been settled by a long line of decisions that the State may not appeal in a criminal case when the defendant has been acquitted by a jury; but that it shall have that right where judgment has been given for the defendant: 1, upon a special verdict; 2, upon a demurrer; 3, upon a motion to quash; and 4, upon a motion in arrest.

State v. Lane, 78 N. C. 547; State v. Padgett, 82 N. C. 544; State v. Moore, 84 N. C. 724.

In Missouri by statute the State has the right of appeal in criminal cases 1, where the indictment is quashed; 2, where it is held insufficient on demurrer; and 3, where the judgment thereon is arrested.

State v. Copeland, 65 Mo. 497.

In Kentucky in 1839, the State appealed from a judgment sustaining a demurrer to an indictment, and had the judgment reversed. In 1879 it again appealed from a similar judgment. In neither case did it occur to anyone that the State had not the right to appeal.

Commonwealth v. Anthony, 2 Met. 399; Commonwealth v. Cain, 14 Bush. 529.

In Tennessee the State, without objection, appealed from a judgment quashing a presentment, and had the judgment reversed.

State v. Tolls, 13 Tenn. 363.

In Wisconsin it was held in 1848 that the statutes of that State allowed the State an appeal in criminal cases where there had been no verdict.

U. S. v. Satter, 1 Pinney, 278.

In 1864, however, it was decided that the right did not exist; but the court expressed the opinion that the Legislature should amend the law so as to confer the power of appeal upon the State in such cases.

State v. Kemp, 17 Wis. 690.

Mr. Chief Justice Carter delivered the opinion of the court:

This case while one of importance is confined within very brief limits. The question is whether the United States has the right of appeal to this court when a judgment has been rendered by the criminal court sustaining a demurrer to an indictment.

The Constitution provides that no man shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. In the case of U. S. v. Bigelow [3 Mackey, 898], we held, after a deliberate and exhaustive discussion, that a man has only been in jeopardy when he has had a trial and verdict in his case.

The question, therefore, whether the defendant has been put in jeopardy by the hearing of this demurrer in the court below has been practically determined by us in the negative, and we are left disembarassed upon that point to discuss and consider the question of the Government's right of appeal from a judgment against it on the demurrer.

This question is to be determined solely by an interpretation of the statute; for it is a settled doctrine that the right of appeal rests with the Legislature alone. If the statute is silent on the subject, it leaves the complaining party unrelieved, since the grant of appeal in terms to one party necessarily by the expression of that grant confers no such right upon the other.

Counsel for the United States accept this proposition and very frankly say that if the right does not exist by statute, it does not exist at all. But it is insisted that the statute gives that right, although, acting under a misconception of its meaning, the right has never been exercised heretofore.

The statute under which this right of appeal is claimed is section 772 of the Revised Statutes of this District, and is a part of the Act organizing this court. It reads as follows:

"Any party aggrieved by any order, judgment or decree made or pronounced at any special term, may, if the same involves the merits of the action or proceeding, appeal therefrom to the general term of the supreme court; and upon such appeal the general term shall review such order, judgment or decree, and affirm, reverse or modify the same as shall be just."

"Any party" of course means all parties; which includes, if it refers to criminal cases, not only the defendant but the United States; for the United States is as much a party as the accused. If, therefore, this section applies to the Criminal Court of this District, there can be no doubt of the Government's right of appeal.

Unfortunately, however, for this argument, the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the criminal court formed no part of this court at the time of the enactment of this statute, but was a distinct and independent court. That being the case it cannot be considered to have been included by the legislative language or intention when the statute organizing this court and regulating appeals from its several special terms to the general term was enacted.

And this will more plainly appear by reference to a statute enacted at a subsequent period, by which the criminal court was made a co-ordinate branch of this court. That Act, which was passed June 21, 1870, and is embodied in section 758 of the Revised Statutes of the District, declares:

"The several general terms and special terms of the circuit court, district courts and criminal courts, authorized by law, are declared to be, severally, terms of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia; and the judgments * * * of the * * * criminal courts * * * shall be deemed judgments * * * of the Supreme Court; but nothing contained in this section shall affect the right of appeal as provided by law."

It is argued by the Government that these words refer to the right of appeal as declared by section 772 of the Organic Act.

That is quite true, as far as it goes; but it refers to more. The difficulty lies in a misconception of the purview of that section. There was not, as we have seen, and there could not have been, any intention to include the Criminal Court in this provision of the Organic Act. As the law then stood the defendant in the criminal court was given the right of appeal, a right which was denied to the prosecution. Congress by the Act of 1870 merely left the right of appeal as it found it; and in our opinion we would not be leaving the law where it has been left by Congress, if we applied the provisions of section 772 to the criminal court, and thereby gave the right of appeal to the United States. That is all there is to this question.

The appeal must be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

1. As a general rule a tax deed is not even prima facie evidence of title. It is incumbent upon whoever asserts title under it to prove affirmatively that all the preliminaries to the sale which the law prescribes were complied with.
2. But when this is done, the title passed by the deed expunges all previous titles and puts in the grantee an absolute, complete and perfect title in fee simple to the property, discharged of all preexisting equities and by whomsoever only such limited right as may be specially by statute.

3. Hence, a tax deed made of a sale, for the unpaid tax of a certain year, passes the property to the purchaser discharged of all taxes remaining due at the time of the sale.

(Decided November 1,

BILL in equity to restrain the tax, certified to be heard in Term in the first instance. Injunctio.

The facts are stated in the opinion of Mr. A. L. Merriman, for the plaintiff. The conveyance by tax deed enacted conveys a fee simple § 165.

It consequently conveys to title or interest which the grantor had at the time of sale. A deed is a species of conveyance of comprehensive character, and preclusion in the grantor of any interest. Kent says, in speaking of conveyance (4 Kent, Com. 48) cleared away all defeasible estates, destroyed contingent and barred powers, and barred all future right and possibility of land and vested an estate of feeoffee."

The District of Columbia has the land in question by deed deeded a fee, cannot set up in opposition interest by way of taxes, or other at the date of sale, for "No man is allowed to dispute his own solemn deed." Goodtitle v. Bailey, 2 Cowper 1. In State v. Cole, Cam. & No. court held that a sale of land for one year released the land from at the date of sale.

See also Preston v. Van Gosen, 250; 22 Wis. 225-229, 75.

The doctrine of estoppel applies to all corporations, equally with individuals. Pendleton Co. v. Amy, 13 W. S. Bk. 20, L. ed. 579) and case Mr. Henry E. Davis, for the plaintiff.

The tax deed by its very terms is to satisfaction of a specific lien for taxes, which lien was held, not by a purchaser of the whole tenor of the deed and the of the Act under which it was clusive of the absence of all other land from all taxes due at the time of sale. The tax deed, in any event, releases the land from the particular count of default of the particular count of which the sale was made.

This court has already disposition in the case of Wall v. District of Columbia, No. —, and until reversed by the Court of the United States the case will obtain in this jurisdiction.

In State v. Cole, Cam. & No. the provisions of the law governing the sale of land was to be resorted to for title.

taxes, only when there was no visible personal property of the person liable on which to distraint. The liability for taxes was personal, and the resort to the land was in the nature of an execution for an unpaid debt.

In Preston v. Van Gorder, 31 Iowa, 250, the court emphasizes the following provisions of the Iowa law: "On the first Monday of October in each year the county treasurer is required to offer at public sale * * * all lands, etc., on which taxes of any description for the preceding year or years shall have been delinquent and remain due and unpaid; and such sale shall be made for and in payment of the total amount of taxes, interest, and costs due and unpaid on such real property."

(Rev. 1860, § 763).

By section 784 the deed to be given on such sale "shall vest in the purchaser all the right, title, interest and estate of the former owner in and to the land conveyed, and also all the right, title, interest and claim of the State and county thereto."

In Wisconsin the law (Laws of 1859, chap. 22) distinctly provides that the sale shall be of so much of the land "as shall be sufficient to pay the taxes, interest and charges thereon" (§ 6); and inasmuch as this clearly contemplates a clearing of all taxes due to the time of sale, the Supreme Court of that State (in Sayles v. Davis, 22 Wis. 230) very properly says of the section (25) providing that the deed of sale "shall vest in the grantee an absolute estate in fee simple in such land, subject, however, to all unpaid taxes and charges," that the words "subject, however, to all unpaid taxes and charges" "have reference only to such unpaid taxes and charges as may have accrued subsequently to the sale on which the deed is issued."

Mr. Justice Cox delivered the opinion of the court:

I am requested to announce the opinion of the court in the case of John Brewer against District of Columbia, M. J. Laughlin and Wm. H. Thumbert.

An Act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia of June 25, 1873, relating to the collection of arrearages of taxes, contained among others the following provisions, stated in brief:

"That it shall be the duty of the Collector of Taxes of the District of Columbia, on or about the first day of July, 1873, to issue certificates of all taxes on real estate which shall then be unpaid and in arrears, and in like manner, on or about the first day of July in each succeeding year * * * which shall be a preferred lien * * * ; that in all cases of the issue of certificates, as herein provided, it shall be the privilege of the owners of any certificates, from and after the expiration of one year from the date thereof, to demand, in writing, by indorsement on the same, that the collector shall enforce the payment of the lien; and it shall be the duty of said officer to advertise for ten days in some one daily newspaper in the District of Columbia, and sell at public auction," etc.

In pursuance of that authority, a certificate of taxes due upon square 98 was issued, for the taxes due for the year ending June 30, 1872, which was transferred to a third person, whether by way of collateral or by way of absolute sale does not appear, so far as I remember. At all events, in 1876, at the instance, as it is presumed, of the holder of the certificate, the property was exposed to sale, and was sold, on the third of January, 1876, to Albert G. Hall, and a deed passed to him; and this title, by sundry mesne conveyances, came to the complainant in 1884.

On the second of September, 1884, the property was again advertised for sale by the collector of taxes, to satisfy a number of taxes due before the first sale. One of these was a special tax levied under the late Corporation of Washington for a foot way laid in front of the pavement, and the other taxes consisted of the annual taxes for 1873, 1874 and 1875. So that after selling once, in 1876, for one year's tax, that is to say, for 1872, the collector undertook to sell again for the taxes for 1873, 1874 and 1875, which had already accrued at the time of the first sale.

The plaintiff prayed an injunction against these subsequent proceedings, claiming that by the first sale the existing liens for taxes were extinguished. The District, on the other hand, claimed, as does also the holder of one of the tax certificates, that the sale was made simply to satisfy a single tax, i. e. for the year 1872, leaving all others unsettled and all other liens unaffected.

If the tax collector had a right to sell for all taxes in arrears before the last sale, then the complainant claims that one of those taxes, being the special tax for the footway laid in front of the property, was illegal on other grounds, namely: because of a failure to comply with sundry requirements of the law.

Now, as a general rule, we all understand that a tax deed is not even prima facie evidence of title. It is incumbent on the holder who asserts title under it to prove affirmatively that all the preliminaries to the sale which the law prescribes were complied with.

But supposing this has been done, and the law to have been complied with, then the general theory of the tax title is well expressed in the opinion of Judge Caldwell of the Supreme Court of Ohio, at page 621 of Blackwell on Tax Titles, which reads as follows:

"A tax title, from its very nature, has nothing to do with the previous chain of title; does not in any way connect itself with it. It is a breaking up of all previous titles. The party holding such title, in proving it, goes no further than his tax deeds; the former title can be of no service to him, nor can it prejudice him. It was well said by counsel in argument on this point, that a tax sale operated on the property, not on the title. In an ordinary case, it matters not how many different interests may be connected with the title, what may be the particular interest of the party in whose name the property may be listed for taxation, it may be a mere equitable right; if the land be regularly sold for taxes, the property, accompanied with a legal title, goes to the purchaser, no matter how many estates, legal or equitable, may be connected with it. And in case the person in whose name it was listed, who had but an equitable title to the land at the time of the tax sale, gets a conveyance from the person holding the legal title, he cannot avail himself of it. The land has gone, and another title has intervened."

All the legislation of Congress in this District on the subject of tax sales seems to be entirely in conformity with this general theory. Going back to the Charter of 1820, of the City of Washington, we find that after providing for a sale for taxes in arrears, it contains this proviso:

"That minors, mortgagees, or others having equitable interests in real property, which property shall be sold for taxes as aforesaid, shall be allowed one year after such minor's coming to or being of full age, or after such mortgagees or others having equitable interests obtaining possession of or a decree for the sale of such property, to redeem the property so sold from the purchaser or purchasers, his, her or their heirs or assigns, on paying the amount of purchase money so paid therefor, with 10 per centum interest thereon as aforesaid, and all the taxes that have been paid thereon by the purchaser or his assigns between the day of sale and the period of such redemption, with 10 per centum interest on the amount of such taxes, and also the full value of the improvements which may have been made or erected on such property by the purchaser or his assigns while the same was in his, her or their possession."

There is also a general provision that the owner of the property sold may, within two years after the sale, redeem the title by paying the purchase money, etc.

Now, of course if such sale passed nothing but the owner's title to the lot and did not affect any incumbrances, liens or collateral interests in the property, it would not be necessary to reserve any right of redemption to parties holding interests of that kind.

The very fact of reserving this right of redemption implies that without it the tax title would be a complete extinction and expunging of all pre-existing titles, and would pass the property as from an original source of title. And the terms of the reservation, being limited to a certain time, exclude any further indulgence than is expressed in the reservation itself. If any of these parties provided for fail to redeem within the time expressed in the law, it is too late; too late because the law manifestly was intended to have the operation which I have described, that is, of passing an absolute, complete and perfect title, subject only to a limited right of redemption as expressed in the law.

This charter was amended in particulars that are entirely unrelated to the present question, by the Acts both of 1824 and 1848. With that exception things remained in this condition until the charter of the city was abolished and the District Government was established in 1871. Then in pursuance of its general power of legislation, the Legislative Assembly of this District passed a general law called: "An Act prescribing the duties of certain officers for the District of Columbia, and fixing their compensation," directing that upon the failure of parties to pay the taxes, the collector shall institute proceedings for their collection, and directing that, after the sale, if the property shall not be redeemed by the owner thereof within one year from the day of sale by the payment of the amount, etc., a deed therefor, countersigned by the Secretary of the District of Columbia, and having affixed the seal of the District, shall be given by the Governor to the purchaser at the tax sale, which deed shall be deemed and held to be a good and perfect title in fee simple to any property bought at any such sale. The old Act of 1820 described the title of 1820 as "a good and valid title," and we see what that good and valid title meant, by referring to the proviso which followed. It meant a perfect title subject to the right of redemption given by the law.

This goes even further. It gives "a good and perfect title in fee simple." It is difficult to see how a title can be a perfect title in fee simple, when it is subject to pre-existing liens, or is liable at any time to be displaced by their enforcement.

But it is made plainer what the meaning of the Act of 1820 is, by the proviso in favor of minors, mortgagees or others having equitable interests, and the same considerations heretofore noticed will apply to this Act, viz.: that the land sold is subject to redemption only within a limited time by those having a right to redeem as they are enumerated in the proviso.

In neither Act was any right given to the District of Columbia or to the old Corporation of Washington, to make any correction of the tax list after the sale had been made, or to reassess upon the property taxes omitted by accident or design from its original list—the list before the sale, and it never occurred to anybody that such a right existed.

A title once passed was held to be a perfect title, as against the District and against all the world, with the exception that I have mentioned: the limited right to redeem.

Then in 1873 there was passed this Act which is the subject of our special consideration. In order to save time in the collection of taxes, instead of imposing a duty upon the collector, of selling property for the purpose of realizing taxes for the District, the Governor was authorized to raise money upon them immediately; the cost of the delay in the collection to fall upon the purchaser of the certificates or the lender of money upon the certificates as collateral. And after providing, as I have already stated, that the Governor might, by a sale of the taxes, or a temporary loan based upon them, anticipate the collection of the taxes, it goes on and provides what I have already stated: that the holder of the certificates may demand, and the collector shall enforce, the payment of the lien, and then it shall be the duty of the officer to advertise for ten days in some one daily newspaper, and to sell at public auction, for cash, to the highest bidder, any and all pieces of property against which certificates may have been issued and for the sale of which demand shall have been made, and out of the proceeds of sale pay, first, the expenses of the sale and then the commission, and second, the amount of the tax certificates with interest thereon, and third, the remainder, if any, to be deposited in the Treasury of the District and held subject to the draft of the owner, etc.

Now it is claimed that under this law the collector is called upon to sell for the satisfaction of this lien, because the holder of the lien demands that the collector shall enforce the payment of the lien; and it is inferred from that that it is not intended that any other lien, or any lien for additional taxes, shall be enforced.

But that really is not the question. The question is: In the enforcement of the lien what title passes by the sale? If this lien only is enforced and none other disturbed or any other interests affected by the sale, of course it is unnecessary to provide any right of redemption in favor of parties having other interests in the property, for they would remain unimpaired and could be asserted at any time.

But this law contained the same right of redemption, only in a more limited degree, as the other Acts. It provides "That minors and mortgagees shall have the right to redeem the property for a period of six months after obtaining majority, or maturity of mortgage, by payment of purchase money, cost of improvements," etc.

The same considerations I have already adduced will apply to this. This limited right to redeem excludes any idea of a further right, any right to interfere with the integrity of the tax title; and it assumes that without this equity of redemption the tax title will be a perfect title and will prevail against all existing interests of that kind; that they are expunged and cut up by the roots.

As it originally was expressed, this Act was more forcible than any of the others. It provides that the deed "shall convey a good and perfect title to the property sold, and shall be conclusive evidence of the same in any court of law or equity in the District of Columbia."

That was a very harsh provision, because it not only relieved the holder of the tax title from affirmatively proving the preliminary steps necessary to the validity of his title, but actually precluded the owner of the lot from disputing the validity of the sale. Therefore, the next day an Act was passed amending that provision in this particular. It provided that in place of the words "good and perfect title" there should be substituted the words "prima facie title," and in place of the words "conclusive evidence" there should be substituted the words "prima facie evidence."

But the object of this, evidently, was simply to give back to the owner of the lot the privilege of contesting the validity of the deed to the property of which he was deprived by the sale. It was not a change in the character of the title when conveyed, provided the title was conveyed strictly in accordance with the law.

But it is said, if that is the construction of this Act, we must necessarily impute to the Legislative Assembly of the District a kind of legislation which almost necessarily results in a loss of part of the public taxes. For instance, it is said that under the Act of 1871 the collector of taxes is obliged to sell for taxes due to the District at a certain time of the year; but a holder of one of these certificates can demand payment at any time of the year and can call on the collector to sell in ten days. So that the periods fixed for the sale of taxes due to the District and those fixed by the certificate holder may be different periods, and therefore, as the two kinds of taxes cannot be embraced in the same sale, there can be but one sale, and the other tax is gone.

This difficulty seems to us more imaginary than real. The law does not authorize the holder of the certificate to require a sale in ten days. He is entitled, by indorsement on the certificate, to claim or demand that the collector shall enforce the payment of the lien, and it shall be the duty of the officer to advertise for ten days.

The ten days refers to the length of time of advertising, but no time is fixed for the commencement of the advertising at all; so that it must be left to some extent to his reasonable discretion. And that is further proved from the closing part of the paragraph, which directs him to include as many lots in the same sale as may be subject to similar liens, on the demand of different parties.

Of course those demands may be made at different times and he must necessarily delay as to one more than the other; and therefore there is no time fixed by law within which he is required to commence to advertise. He is simply to advertise for ten days, and I presume would be at liberty to advertise for a longer period; there is nothing to prevent that.

Now, if at the time of the demand made by the holder of a certificate there is no tax due to the District, no difficulty arises in the enforcement of the lien. And even if a tax is due to the District, practically no inconvenience would follow. The collector is authorized almost immediately after the tax falls due to collect it. He must require the owner of the property to pay within ninety days; and if he fails, then on one month's notice he can collect the tax; so that only a moderate delay in a compliance with the demands of the certificate holder would bring the period of sale for the two taxes together, and it would hardly happen that the right of the collector to sell for general taxes due to the District would not be synchronous with the right of the certificate holder to demand the enforcement of his lien.

After this there were several Acts of Congress passed which seem to reach a case of this kind and which would relieve it of even the supposed difficulty I have spoken of. In 1874, on the 20th of June, the law which was passed abolishing the District Government entirely contained this enactment:

"It shall be the duty of the collector of taxes to prepare a complete list of all taxes and property upon which the same are assessed in arrears on the first day of March, i. e. the first of March, 1875, and then ten days afterwards publish them and proceed to collect," etc. It is claimed that this does not refer to any taxes except those directly due to the District. And yet it is comprehensive enough to embrace all taxes covered by these certificates.

The indebtedness which these certificates cover does not cease to be an indebtedness for taxes. It is quite different from the consequences of a sale for taxes. If a sale once takes place, the tax is extinguished; the owner of the property owes nothing but has a right to pay redemption money to the holder of the tax certificate to redeem the property. But these certificates are given for taxes. They do not cease to be taxes because the certificates are assigned absolutely or by way of sale. On the contrary, they are expressly for annual taxes which are to be collected, as taxes, by the collector of taxes; and they are just as much arrears of taxes as those that remain unpaid to the District Government itself. I am not able to see why they are not included in the general provision that all taxes which are in arrears shall be listed and the property advertised for sale and the property sold with that exception.

Now these Acts comprehend all the tax that was covered by this certificate. It was the duty of the collector to sell for that and the other taxes due to the District at the period mentioned in this Act, which was before the date of the actual sale, to satisfy this one certificate.

That Act was repeated in 1875. That would bring the sale to March, 1876. Some time in the end of December, 1875, probably, the collector received notice to sell for satisfaction of this lien, and he might have postponed it until March and embraced both of the taxes within the same sale.

Several other complications have been suggested as the probable consequences of this interpretation. They do not grow out of the present case and we are hardly called upon to solve them. For instance, it is said that he might issue his certificates for one year's taxes, which the holder could not call upon him to enforce for one year, and then at the end of that year he might issue a certificate for another tax which would run a year. Then the first holder might call for a sale, and the collector would have to sell for his tax and could not sell for the other and must necessarily lose it.

Taking the laws all together, it seems to us that whenever a collector was called upon to sell it became his duty to sell for taxes; and this complication would not really result.

But even if these consequences would follow, it is not the fault of the parties who bought at this sale. It is the fault of the Legislature which enacted this inconsiderate legislation; but at the same time, the very language of the law gave to the purchaser a good and valid title, which seems to us to extinguish all pre-existing liens or titles of every description.

It is unnecessary, in this review of the case, to consider the question of how far the special tax of 1870 was a legal one or not.

We think the claimant is entitled to the relief prayed for.

George E. KIRK

v.

COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS and Secretary of the Interior.

It appearing from the bill that an application for a patent was filed in the Patent Office, in 1874, and definitively refused by decision of the Commissioner in 1875; that no appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court of the District was taken, but that various efforts for the review and reversal of said decision were made from time to time; that in 1885 another application was filed in the Patent Office, which was again rejected for the same cause; that from this last refusal no appeal was taken, but in 1886 a bill in equity under section 4915, R. S. was filed in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the Secretary of the Interior being joined with the Commissioner of Patents as a party defendant—on demurrer to the bill it was held:

(a) That an applicant for patent is not, in an ex parte case, entitled to redress by bill in equity, until he has exhausted the remedy by appeal provided in section 4911, R. S.;

(b) That this application for patent was constructively abandoned in 1877, under section 4895, R. S., because the various efforts to procure a reversal of the decision of 1875, and the application filed in 1885, were irregular and illegal proceedings, not contemplated by said section;

(c) That the Secretary of the Interior may not be made a party defendant to the bill.

(Decided October 18, 1886.)

ON demurrer to bill in equity under Revised Statutes, § 4915. Demurrer sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ellis & Johns and R. H. Steele, for complainant.

Mr. D. A. McKnight, for defendants.

Mr. Justice Merrick delivered the opinion of the court:

The case of Kirk v. Commissioner of Patents et al. has been submitted upon briefs upon a demurrer to the bill, certified from the special term to be heard here in the first instance.

The bill was filed against the Commissioner of Patents and the Secretary of the Interior, for the purpose of obtaining a patent for certain claimed improvements in an invention alleged to have been made by one Samuel Strong, the complainant's assignor, which patent had been refused by the Commissioner of Patents in the year 1874, and finally refused, as it appears, in the year 1875.

It was an ex parte application; and at various intervals from that time down to the year 1885 there were irregular applications to successive commissioners to review the action of the preceding commissioner; and finally there was another application of the same sort made by Samuel Strong in the year 1885, which application is upon its face said to be made "continuous." What the meaning of that is it is difficult to understand. But however that may be, the impediments that are in the way of the complainant, for relief in the mode he has chosen, are insurmountable.

In the first place it is quite apparent that according to the scheme of the patent law there are two classes of cases to which different remedies are applicable, so far as the final action of the commissioner is concerned: there are, first, the cases called "cases of interference," where the action of the Commissioner is final; and, second, the cases of ex parte applications, where his action is not final, but where an appeal lies to the Supreme Bench of the District of Columbia by virtue of section 4911, Revised Statutes.

After these respective remedies have been exhausted, the patent law, in its supreme indulgence to the claims of inventors, by section 4915 of the Revised Statutes, allows a further proceeding by way of bill in equity.

Now it is manifest upon the reading of the entire statute (and especially section 4915, which thus gives the further redress) that the party must have exhausted, before he applies for that ultimate redress, each of the successive stages for the perfection of his application which are provided by law. So far as the interference is concerned, the previous stages have been exhausted by the final refusal of the Commissioner; but so far as the ex parte application is concerned, his redress is not exhausted until after he has taken an appeal from the decision of the Commissioner. Then only arises to him the right which has arisen already in the interference case upon the decision of the Commissioner to apply to a court of equity for relief by an original bill, according to the terms of the said section.

Now in this particular case, Strong's application, which was filed in 1874, was refused as far back as 1875—definitively refused. He did not appeal to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia sitting in banc; neither has he appealed to that tribunal from any of the successive refusals of the disconnected applications which he afterwards made. His assignee, therefore, stands without remedy for the grievance of which he complains by his bill in equity.

But further than this, he is entirely without any claim of redress, for the reason that there was a definitive refusal of the application by the Commissioner of Patents as far back as 1875. It was clearly his duty, or that of his assignor, within the terms of the patent law, to have taken some one of those steps which the law provides for him to take within two years thereafter; otherwise his application must be construed to have been abandoned under section 4894, R. S. which is in these words:

"All applications for patents shall be completed and prepared for examination within two years after the filing of the application; and in default thereof, or upon failure of the applicant to prosecute the same within two years after any action therein, of which notice shall have been given to the applicant, they shall be regarded as abandoned by the parties thereto, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Patents that such delay was unavoidable."

Now, we construe the definitive refusal of the Commissioner of Patents as far back as 1874 or 1875 to be the final action of the Patent Office; and these subsequent irregular proceedings which have been taken from time to time, crowned by the application of 1885, which is said in the peculiar phraseology of the bill to be a "continuous" application, are not actions taken in the Patent Office or in the court, in the sense of the section to which I have adverted. The action designated there must be some legal action, some proper and appropriate action within the terms of the law for the preservation, maintenance and obtention of the right.

Now here, after the definitive action of 1875, there have been from time to time certain irregular, illegal and unlicensed forms of application for the reversal of that action before the Commissioner of Patents, bringing the matter down to the year 1885 (almost the entire period for which the party would have been entitled to a patent exhausted), and yet the assignee wants now, by application of the remedy by bill in equity, to revive and have efficacy given to this patent application as far back as the year 1877. The court is of opinion that there is nothing in the law, there is nothing in the policy of the law, there is nothing in the principles of justice which would justify any such application of the provisions of section 4915.

There are other objections to the bill raised by the demurrer, concerning certain matters of form, which need not be adverted to further than to notice one: that is, that in no predicament (were the complainant properly in the court, by bill in equity, to press his demand) would it be proper to make the Secretary of the Interior a party to such a bill.

It has long since been adjudicated, and the recent decision in Hoe v. Butterworth, 3 Mackey, 229, touched emphatically on that subject, that the Secretary of the Interior has nothing whatsoever to do with the granting or refusal of a patent. While he is the presiding officer over the discipline of the Patent Office, he has no judicial function, so to speak, with regard to the granting of a patent. That belongs to the Commissioner of Patents. There is no appeal to the Secretary of the Interior in that regard; and therefore, he having no control over the granting of a patent, further than to have his name affixed to the letters patent as a matter of form, he is in no sense by proper form of proceeding a party to such a bill in equity.

The demurrer must be sustained and the bill dismissed, with costs.

PENNSYLVANIA.
SUPREME COURT.

Margaret E. MOSEBY'S APPEAL.

Under the facts of this case, held, that a judgment, which was marked satisfied on the record, was not entitled to participate in the distribution of a fund produced by a sheriff's sale, notwithstanding the parol evidence in the case.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

APPPEAL from a definitive decree of the Common Pleas of Fulton County, distributing the proceeds of a sheriff's sale of real estate. Affirmed.

The following facts appeared before John P. Sipes, auditor to distribute the fund:

On June 6, 1886, the Sheriff of Fulton County sold at public sale a tract of land as the real estate of W. L. Moseby, for $2,000, which is the fund in court for distribution. This tract was conveyed December 3, 1883, by W. L. Moseby and wife to Mrs. Sarah J. Fillman, wife of Jacob Fillman, and was reconveyed by the said Sarah J. Fillman and Jacob Fillman to the said W. L. Moseby, by deed dated March 16, 1885.

At the time of the sheriff's sale there were five judgments which were claimed to be liens against the property; the first two, which were judgments against W. L. Moseby, were paid in full out of the fund; the third was a purchase money judgment of W. L. Moseby v. Sarah J. Fillman and Jacob Fillman for $368, entered December 5, 1883; the fourth was a purchase money judgment between the same parties for $364.50, entered December 6, 1883; the fifth was a judgment of Patterson, Renshaw & Co. v. Jacob Fillman, entered February 14, 1884, upon which judgment a fi. fa. had been issued prior to the sheriff's sale against Jacob Fillman and W. L. Moseby, terretenant, and a levy made.

On March 14, 1885, W. L. Moseby assigned the two purchase money judgments to his wife Margaret E. Moseby; and on April 14, 1885, all the real estate of Mrs. Fillman bound by the lien of said two judgments was released therefrom by Mrs. Moseby, and the judgments as to Mrs. Fillman marked "satisfied" on the record.

Mrs. Fillman had not sufficient separate estate to enable her to purchase the property upon her own credit; and it was conceded upon the argument that it was a purchase by her husband Jacob Fillman.

W. L. Moseby testified before the auditor: "When I repurchased the property from Sarah J. Fillman and her husband, Jacob Fillman agreed to pay the two judgments which Mrs. Moseby then held; and until they were paid, they were to remain liens against Jacob Fillman. When I assigned the judgments to Mrs. Moseby, it was for a valuable consideration."

The auditor found as to the two judgments of Mrs. Moseby that "The fact of actual payment is not denied nor in any way disputed." He accordingly distributed the fund, after the payment of costs, to the uncontested judgments and to the judgment of Patterson, Renshaw & Co., leaving a balance undistributed, and excluding the two judgments of Mrs. Moseby.

Mrs. Moseby filed exceptions to the distribution: 1, that the auditor erred in distributing any part of the fund to the judgment of Patterson, Renshaw & Co., and 2, in not distributing the balance remaining after paying the costs and the first two judgments to her, judgments against Jacob Fillman. No exception was filed as to the findings of facts by the auditor. The court, McClean, P. J., overruled the exceptions and confirmed the report.

The assignments of error specified the distribution of any part of the fund to the judgment of Patterson, Renshaw & Co; the exclusion of the judgments of Margaret E. Moseby v. Jacob Fillman; and the decree of the court dismissing the appellant's exceptions and confirming the report of the auditor.

Messrs. W. Scott Alexander and R. Bruce Petriken, for appellant:

The auditor was bound to distribute the fund according to the record of liens as they are found on the judgment docket.

Kendig's App. 82 Pa. 68.

In the absence of fraud or collusion, the auditor must treat a judgment as conclusive; he has no right to disregard it or allow any later lien priority over it.

Thompson's App. 57 Pa. 175.

Upon the distribution of the proceeds of a sheriff's sale, a subsisting judgment can only be attacked by other creditors collaterally, upon the ground of collusion.

Parol evidence is admissible to show that upon a conveyance of the mortgaged premises to the mortgagee the lien of the mortgage was to remain, and to rebut the presumption of a merger by showing an intent to the contrary.

Helmhold v. Man, 4 Whart. 410.

"Parol evidence is indisputably proper to rebut a presumption or an equity. 'The meaning of this,' says Professor Greenleaf in his treatise on Evidence, Vol. 1, part 2, chap. 5, pl. 296, 'is, that where a certain presumption would in general be deduced from the nature of an act, such presumption may be repelled by extrinsic evidence showing the intention to be otherwise.'"

Gibson, C. J., in Bank v. Fordyce, 9 Pa. 278.

Messrs. J. Nelson Sipes and W. Rush Gillan, for appellees:

While as to general creditors the title to the real estate sold was in Jacob Fillman, yet Moseby dealt on the basis of the title being in the wife, and he must be held to the legal consequences of the same.

The assignment of the judgments by Moseby to his wife is a subterfuge and a scheme for cheating the creditors of Fillman. It was an attempt to keep alive these judgments to the prejudice of subsequent lien creditors, which, in the absence of other interests which require them to be kept alive for their protection, cannot be done.

Loverein v. Humboldt Safe Deposit & Trust Co. 17 W N. C. 488; S. C. 3 Cent. Rep. 590.

Per Curiam:

This fund was correctly distributed. The auditor found as to the judgments on which the appellant claims that "The fact of actual payment is not denied, nor in any way disputed." It is undoubtedly true that parol evidence is admissible to rebut a presumption or any equity, yet all the evidence in this case is insufficient to postpone the claim of the appellees or to rebut their equities. The appellant is not in a position to successfully claim this fund.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellant.

v.

The President, Managers and Company of the DELAWARE & HUDSON CANAL CO.

1. A person crossing a railroad track by a common and well known foot path, used by the public for many years, without let or hindrance on the part of the railroad company and its employees, is not a trespasser.
2. While such user does not convert the company's right of way into a public highway, it implies a license from the company, and charges the company with the duty of using ordinary care toward those crossing by the path.
3. Whether such user exists, and whether the company exercised ordinary care, as regards speed and signals in a given case, or was guilty of negligence, which was the proximate cause of the injury, are questions of fact for the jury.
4. Contributory negligence is not a defense to an action for injuries to a child, eight years of age, who is crossing the track by such a foot path.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Lackawanna County, to review a judgment of compulsory nonsuit in an action of trespass on the case for negligence. Reversed.

At the trial, before Hand, P. J., the plaintiff proved the facts set forth in the opinion of the court below refusing to take off the nonsuit.

The plaintiff offered in evidence also a resolution of the City Councils of Scranton prohibiting railroad companies from running their trains at any street crossing in the city, at a rate of speed greater than five miles an hour, and a resolution requiring railroad companies to station flagmen at the street crossings of their roads in the city. Counsel for the defendant objected to the offers as irrelevant and incompetent, the plaintiff's evidence showing that at no rate of speed could the accident have been prevented, as the plaintiff's own testimony is that she could not see any train coming, over the freight train standing on the side track, and that she did not see any train, and went as quick as she could from in front of the standing locomotive to the track where she was injured, and being a distance of two or three feet, therefore no rate of speed is material upon the question of negligence of the Company, as the accident to the plaintiff could not possibly have been avoided under the circumstances, at any rate of speed; and they further objected that the crossing at Phelps Street was not one of those mentioned in the resolutions.

The court sustained the objection and excluded the evidence.

At the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony the court, on motion of the defendant's counsel, entered a compulsory nonsuit.

Subsequently, in discharging a rule to take off the nonsuit, the following opinion was delivered by HAND, P. J.:

"This is an action brought to recover damages for injury to the plaintiff, a girl eight years of age at the time of the accident, while crossing the track of the defendant in the outskirts of the City of Scranton, along an alleged foot path, as shown in the testimony.

"The facts of the case are as follows, as gathered from the map and testimony in the case:

"Rachel E. Taylor was sent on the third day of November, 1883, by her mother to Kelley's store, on Phelps Street, about 1 o'clock, to obtain some oil. From her home on the east side of Washington Avenue, in the City of Scranton, she passed across Washington Avenue in a westerly direction, and several other streets running at right angles to Washington Avenue, crossing private property, passed the school house which she was accustomed to attend, and from the school house along a path to the track of the defendant. As she reached the track, a train of cars was standing upon the switch, with a locomotive at the head blowing off steam. She passed immediately in front of the locomotive and around it and, as she went to step upon the main track of the railroad, was struck by a passing passenger train, thrown down and her foot was crushed; her foot had to be amputated, and it is for this injury that suit is brought.

"The train standing upon the switch was a freight train, lying by to enable the passenger train to pass. The passenger train came along at its usual time, running at a rate of from twelve to fifteen miles an hour. The railroad of the defendant at this point is the main line of railroad, not near a depot, and in no yard of the defendant; the switch being used for holding the freight train there while the passenger train passed upon the regular track.

"The alleged foot path went from the school house to the brow of the cut, the railroad being in a cut a few feet in depth, and the path passed down diagonally along the bank, and diagonally across the track. This path was used, so far as the testimony shows, by persons not for the purpose of crossing directly across the track to reach a point, but for the purpose of going along the track itself, and within the right of way of the railroad, for the purpose of reaching Phelps Street, some of the witnesses stating that it was a shorter cut than to pass by the regular streets and alleys of the city. There was an alley running parallel with the railroad, a short distance from it, entirely outside of the right of way of the railroad, which parties could use and reach Phelps Street, as the map shows, by as short if not shorter distance than by the railroad track.

"The little girl testified that she could not see the approaching train by reason of the train standing upon the switch; that her attention was called to the locomotive blowing off steam, which she was afraid would start, and which she passed as rapidly as she conveniently could. Durkin, one of the witnesses who saw the accident and picked the child up, says he saw her running down the bank, saw the train coming, shouted to her with no avail. The accident took place a few feet from him.

"Some of the witnesses testified that the train was stopped at Phelps Street, some just past it. The evidence was that the girl could not see the approaching train and that the engineer of the train could not see her; that immediately as she passed in front of the standing train she was struck.

"It was claimed by the plaintiff that this path was a permissive way. The evidence is that it was not a path leading to any of the works of the Company, nor is it shown that it directly or indirectly acquiesced in it, by any proof except such use of it as the evidence shows. P. M. Walsh, a witness for the plaintiff, who made the map put in evidence, testified that for fourteen years he knew well the locality and made surveys of that locality for Mr. Phelps and the property owners of New Street before he made the surveys for the purpose of this trial; that he was acquainted with the houses in the vicinity of that place about the time of the accident. He says:

"I didn't know the fact of a crossing above Phelps Street until my attention was called to it after the accident, and I was employed to make a survey. I found that there was a foot path there, well defined, a well beaten foot path leading from No. 9 school house across the Delaware & Hudson track up towards Phelps Street. After it crossed the track, the children I presume used it to go up across Phelps Street along parallel with the track of the railroad. The double dotted line upon this map represents the foot path leading across the railroad; then it ceased to be well defined there; people used sometimes to go to Phelps Street this way, and at other times they would not cross it, but would go that way; meaning the east side.

"Other witnesses testified to the use of this path more or less by the school children. One witness Mr. Hull testified that he saw some cross the track and go up the other side of the bank; he is the only witness who testified to that. There is no evidence of any other use of the path directly across the track. Some witnesses testify to the use of the track itself at times between the rails. At the time of this accident there was no flagman stationed at Phelps Street, but there was one stationed there subsequently to the accident. The little girl testified that she heard no bell or whistle; some of the passengers on the train stated that they heard no bell or whistle before reaching the pathway. The distance of Phelps Street was about 127 feet from the place of the accident, and the train was approaching Phelps Street.

"The route the girl undertook to take to go to Kelley's store was along the track of the railroad, although she had not reached the farther side of the track which she attempted to cross; and when the accident occurred she was upon the railroad after passing the switch of the Company.

"Upon the showing of the plaintiff's witnesses we granted a nonsuit. Our reasons for granting this nonsuit may be stated as follows:

"This is a case of a main track of a railroad with a side switch for the purpose of holding a freight train while the passenger train passes; it is in no yard of the Company where cars are switched back and forth for the purpose of making up trains; it is not near any depot or works of the Company; no agents of the Company are in the locality, except possibly when the freight train is to be switched off and the brakeman may get off his train to turn the switch.

"The path spoken of in the evidence is not a common and public path directly across the track to any point, used by the public for any particular purpose. It is a path used almost entirely by school children to reach Phelps Street. The track and path are in the cut with banks on both sides. The path goes down the bank not at right angles but diagonally; and so far as it crosses the track at all it crosses it diagonally, for the purpose of walking down the track and along it within the railroad company's right of way. The evidence shows that after leading into the cut, the path was used more upon the east side of the track than upon the west, but used sometimes upon both sides and sometimes in the middle. There is no such use of this path as to constitute a presumption of permission on the part of the Company; its use is entirely within a period when continued trespasses could not ripen into a right; it was just such use of the railroad track as is sometimes common in the outskirts of the city, and such as we consider the law severely condemns.

"The Company had the full right of a clear track at that point; it was not a way of necessity; hardly, we think, can the plea of convenience be urged, for an alley a short distance parallel to the railroad was open to Phelps Street, which reached it at the same distance.

"We consider that the plaintiff was a trespasser upon the track, as all others were during the time when crossing this path to go down the track. This case differs in this respect from the cases cited, although it is not so strong in its facts as the case of Lewis v. R. R. Co. 79 Pa. 83, in which the court below, and with the approval of the supreme court, withdrew the question of permissive way.

"If the plaintiff was a trespasser, she was entitled to proper care by the Company, but only to proper care, in case such care could avail. The evidence is that she was running; she herself says she was hurrying past the train with the locomotive standing on the switch; she could not see the approaching train; the engineer could not see her; she darted in front of the standing engine, not over ten feet from it, into the approaching train. Her impetuosity and thoughtlessness, common it is true to a child, put her into a place, in disregard of the shout of her teacher, who warned her without hearing, where no care nor possible foresight of the Company could have prevented the accident. The question of speed and signal is out of the case. It is not the case of a trespasser walking on a track in sight of an approaching train. It is the case of a trespasser out of sight, and comes within the rule laid down in the text books and the decisions which relieve the defendant, in our judgment, from liability.

"We are of the opinion that the use of this track as a byway, as shown in the evidence, is severely condemned by the decisions of our courts, particularly in cities and thickly settled towns. It is true that railroad companies are held to accountability, even against trespassers walking on the track; but this is a reasonable accountability, not an impossible one.

"The case, while perhaps a close one, differs from those to which we have been referred, and in which there is evidence of negligence, suffered to go to the jury.

"After a careful examination of all the cases, we are satisfied that if sympathy should control our decision in this case, it would simply be cruelty to the children frequenting this school house. We therefore grant the nonsuit, because we deem that no negligence is shown such as contributed to the accident; and because it was one of those inevitable accidents, caused by the impetuosity and heedlessness of the child, which could not have been prevented, being upon the track where there was no public crossing, and where the child could not be seen, such as to throw upon the Company any further care than the evidence shows it exercised.

"We refer to 2 Wood's Railway Law, 1891, 1278; R. R. Co. v. Hummel, 44 Pa. 375; R. Co. v. Connell, 88 Pa. 520; Moore v. R. Co. 99 Pa. 801.

"The rule to take off nonsuit is discharged."

Whereupon the plaintiff took this writ and assigned as error the action of the court: 1, in granting a compulsory nonsuit; 2, in discharging the rule to show cause why the nonsuit should not be taken off; and 3 and 4, in rejecting the resolutions offered in evidence by the plaintiff.

Messrs. E. N. Willard and Everett Warren, for plaintiff in error:

Where a person crosses a railroad track by a common and well known foot path, used by the public for many years without let or hindrance on the part of the employees of the railroad company, he cannot be regarded as a trespasser.

Where persons are in the habit of crossing a railroad at a particular place, although there is no right of way there, it throws upon the company the responsibility of taking reasonable precautions in the use of such place.

The question whether the defendant did or not use reasonable care, considering the circumstances of the case, was for the jury.

The true rule for determining what is proximate cause is that the injury must be the natural and probable consequence of the negligence, and that it might and ought to have been foreseen under the circumstances.

R. R. Co. v. Hope, 80 Pa. 373; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 10 and cases cited.

The erection of an obstruction to the view at a crossing, while not negligence per se, should be left to the jury to say whether under the circumstances it was negligence.

The learned judge in the court below rejected our offers of the ordinances and the supplements regulating the speed of trains and the position of flagmen at street crossings.

The evidence was direct and conclusive that the train was coming, at the time the injuries were sustained by this plaintiff, at a rate of speed of at least fifteen miles an hour. This, we submit, the jury would have been justified in inferring was a dangerous and reckless rate of speed, considering the locality of this private crossing and its proximity to Phelps Street and the surroundings. It is beyond reason to say that the train could have slowed to five miles an hour at Phelps Street, only 127 feet distant.

While it is true that trains must be run at a high rate of speed to reach their greatest utility, populous towns and cities must be exceptions, when the speed must be moderated in view of the danger of life, limb and property.

R. R. Co. v. Long, 75 Pa. 265; R. R. Co. v. Lewis, 79 Pa. 44; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 487, and cases cited.

What is a reasonable rate of speed for a railroad train at a crossing is a question for the jury.

R. R. Co. v. Smith, 28 Legal Int. 101; R. R. Co. v. James, 81 * Pa. 194.

Railroad companies running their trains through cities or populous towns are held to a degree of care commensurate with the danger involved.

In an action to recover damages for alleged negligence, proof of the violation of a city ordinance does not establish negligence per se. It is competent evidence upon the question to submit to the jury, but not conclusive.

Knuffle v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 84 N. Y. 488; Beisegel v. R. R. Co. 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 29; Massoth v. Canal Co. 64 N. Y. 524; Faber v. R. R. Co. 29 Minn. 465; Hayes v. R. R. Co. 111 U. S. 228 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 410); Meek v. Pennsylvania Co. 13 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 648.

If a railway company omits to keep a flagman at crossings, and circumstances exist rendering it wanting in ordinary care not to do so, then if injury and damage be caused by reason of such omission, the company is liable.

2 Rorer, Railroads, 1012; R. R. Co. v. Boyer, 2 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 172; also cases cited in note, p. 182.

The failure on the part of this Company to comply with the requirements of the ordinance constituted a portion of the proof of negligence and was evidence for that purpose.

Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 713, note; Massoth v. Canal Co. 64 N. Y. 424; R. R. Co. v. State, 29 Md. 252; R. R. Co. v. Reidy, 66 Ill. 44; 4 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 578.

There was evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant Company for the jury, in the failure and omission to ring a bell or blow a whistle or signal in any way on approaching this crossing under the circumstances.

It was not for the judge to say that this failure in no way contributed to the injury.

The testimony of a witness who, being near the crossing, was expressly listening for train warnings and heard none, is of a higher grade than mere negative testimony; and in connection with the negative testimony of other witnesses, it is sufficient to require the submission of the evidence to the jury.

In R. R. Co. v. Hummell, 44 Pa. 375, the boy when first seen had hold of the cars, and was running along with them, and so was injured. He was a trespasser on the track and cars of the company. That case is clearly distinguishable from the one at bar.

In R. R. Co. v. Connell, 88 Pa. 520, a boy between six and seven years suddenly jumped upon the front platform of a moving street car, fell and was injured.

In Moore v. R. R. Co. 99 Pa. 801, the boy was loitering on the track, and walking on the outer edge of the sleepers along the track. He was not on the track at a public crossing. The boy was walking along the track when he was struck, and was clearly a trespasser.

A child crossing a railroad track is responsible only for the exercise of the caution and discretion of which children of its age are presumed to be capable, and not to the degree of care required of an adult.

Casey v. R. R. Co. 6 Abb. N. C. 104.

When both the duty and the measure of its performance are to be ascertained as facts, a jury alone can determine what is negligence, and whether it has been proven.

Mr. Justice Sterrett delivered the opinion of the court:

In his opinion refusing to take off the compulsory nonsuit, the learned president of the common pleas concedes that the case is a close one, but appears to think the judgment should be sustained on the ground that the child's unfortunate injury resulted from her own impetuosity and heedlessness and not from any neglect of duty on the part of defendant Company. If he is correct in this, the nonsuit was rightly entered. But plaintiff's contention is that the jury would have been warranted in finding negligence of the Company defendant from which the injury complained of resulted; that the testimony tended to prove such facts and circumstances as bring the case within the general principle recognized and approved by this court in R. R. Co. v. Troutman, 11 W. N. C. 458, in which it is ruled that where a person crosses a railroad track by a common and well known foot path, used by the public for many years without let or hindrance on the part of the railroad company and its employees, he cannot be regarded as a trespasser; and where it is shown, as was done in this case, that the foot path across the company's land has been habitually used by the public for many years without objection, it is for the jury to say whether the company has not acquiesced in such use.

308

While such user does not convert the company's right of way into a public highway, it certainly does relieve persons passing on the same from being treated as trespassers on the company's premises; and there is a manifest distinction between the degree of care which a railroad company is bound to exercise towards mere trespassers and those who may be using the right of way by tacit consent or implied permission of the company.

In the case of such long continued user by the public, the company and its employees are charged with notice of the fact, and therefore cannot with impunity neglect precautions to prevent danger to persons thus using the same.

In Barry v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co. 92 N. Y. 289, it is said: "The acquiescence of defendant for so long a time in the crossing of the tracks by pedestrians, amounted to a license and permission by defendant to all persons to cross the tracks at this point. These circumstances imposed a duty on the defendant, in respect of persons using the crossing, to exercise reasonable care in the movement of its trains. The company had a lawful right to use the tracks for its business, and could have withdrawn its permission to the public to use its premises as a public way, assuming that no public right therein existed, but, so long as it permitted the public use, it was chargeable with knowledge of the danger to human life from operating its trains at that point, and was bound to such reasonable precaution in their management as ordinary prudence dictated to protect wayfarers from injury. * * * The company, in such cases, is an actor at the time in creating the circumstances which imperil human life, and it would be an alarming doctrine that it was under no duty to exercise any care in the movement of its trains."

The principle clearly settled by the foregoing and many other cases that might be cited is that when a railroad company has for years, without objection, permitted the public to cross its tracks at a certain point, not in itself a public crossing, it owes the duty of reasonable care towards those using the crossing; and whether in a given case such reasonable care has been exercised or not is ordinarily a question for the jury under all the evidence.

Without undertaking to review the testimony on which plaintiff relied, we think the evidence is quite sufficient to warrant the submission of her case to a jury on the question of permissive crossing at the point where she was injured, and whether in the movement of its train the Company exercised that degree of care which, under the circumstances, it was in duty bound to do.

There was testimony tending to show that the whistle was not sounded, the bell not rung, nor any warning given of the approach of the train by which plaintiff was struck. This was properly for the consideration of the jury; and in view of all the circumstances, including the fact that the siding was occupied by a standing train of cars and the main track thus out of view, we have no right to say the jury would not have found negligence in not warning those who might be in the act of crossing that the train was approaching.

If plaintiff had been duly warned, either by sounding the whistle or ringing the bell, it is not at all probable she would have attempted to cross the track in the face of known danger. The question of contributory negligence does not arise in the case. The age of plaintiff at the time of the accident precludes that. If, under the evidence, she was not a trespasser on the premises of the Company, the question is whether it was not its duty to give suitable warning of the approach of its train; and, failing to do that, whether it was not guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of the injury.

The first and second specifications of error are sustained. There was no error in refusing to receive the evidence specified in the third and fourth assignments, and hence they are not sustained.

Judgment reversed and a procedendo awarded.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

APPEAL from a decree of Common Pleas No. 2 of Philadelphia County, dismissing a bill in equity for an account, etc. Affirmed.
PA.

The bill was filed by Charles Richardson, William C. Richardson, Emma Walton, and Joseph H. White and Elizabeth B., his wife, in right of the wife, to compel defendant, Benjamin Richardson, to render a true account of all moneys, and the disbursement thereof, received by him, or made on account of certain real estate devised by William Richardson, deceased, to take charge and management of which property, as attorney in fact, defendant had been appointed by complainants, parties in interest under the will of the said William Richardson, and for the ascertainment and award of the true shares of complainants in said property.

On October 29, 1881, the complainants, the defendant's attorney consenting, by leave amended the bill by adding Elizabeth Richardson, widow of Edward Richardson, deceased, as a party defendant. On March 2, 1882, the death of Emma Walton, one of the complainants, was suggested of record and the record amended by substituting the executor of her last will and testament, William L. Dilkes, as a party complainant in her stead.

The bill averred in substance that William Richardson died in 1855, seised of certain realty, and leaving a will dated December 15, 1854, and proved January 25, 1855. In the residuary clause of the will, which is the principal clause to be regarded in considering the questions raised in the case, he gave the residue of his estate "To my said beloved wife, Jane Richardson, for the term of her natural life; and upon the decease of my said wife, I do order and direct that the said remainder of my estate be sold by my executor; and after paying the afore named bequests it is my will and I do order that the moneys arising therefrom and so remaining shall be divided between my children: John, Elizabeth Berley, Edward, Charles, Emma, William Carman, and Jane, share and share alike; and if any of my said last named children be deceased, leaving issue, then it is my will that the share the parent would have been entitled to if living shall go to such issue."

The bill averred that the testator left surviving him his wife Jane Richardson, and his children: John, Elizabeth B., Edward, Charles, Emma, William C., Jane, and Benjamin the defendant. Jane the widow died August 8, 1878; Jane the daughter married Augustus W. Boener, and died March 6, 1874, intestate and without issue; Augustus W. Boener still survives; Edward Richardson, a son, died June 2, 1877, intestate, leaving surviving him his widow Elizabeth Richardson, the defendant, and one child William, who died during minority unmarried and without issue, on March 8, 1878. John Richardson, a son, died December 8, 1878, leaving a will, by which he gave his share of the proceeds of the real estate bequeathed to him by his father's will to William C. Richardson and Emma Walton, two of the plaintiffs, and Benjamin Richardson, the defendant, in equal parts. Elizabeth B. Richardson, a daughter, is now intermarried with Joseph H. White; Emma Richardson, a daughter, married Lloyd H. Walton, since deceased.

The bill further avers that the plaintiffs and the said John Richardson, on August 26, 1878, on the death of the widow Jane, appointed Benjamin Richardson, their attorney in fact, to take charge of the real estate directed by William Richardson's will to be sold, to collect the rents and to account to them for their proper proportions thereof, since which time he has acted as their attorney; but as is averred he has not properly accounted to the plaintiffs for their due proportions of the same, pretending that he is the owner of the share bequeathed to Jane Boener, and that Elizabeth Richardson, the widow of Edward, is entitled to a share of the said rents.

The bill charged that the defendant is not so entitled as he pretends, and that the accounts rendered by him are not true and correct. Wherefore they pray relief that the defendant render a true account of the moneys received and disbursed by him in respect to the said real estate, and that the plaintiffs' shares in the net balance be ascertained, and that the defendant be directed to pay their respective shares of the same to them, etc.

The answer of the defendant, Benjamin Richardson, averred that the facts set forth in the bill were true, except that the last will and testament of John Richardson, deceased, admitted to probate on December 12, 1878, was in the words following, namely: "I, John Richardson, do make this my last will and testament. I give and bequeath and devise all my property and estate to Benjamin Richardson, Emma Walton and William C. Richardson, absolutely, in fee simple, in equal shares, with the following proviso and condition: should the said Emma Walton be deceased at the time of the partition of the estate, or any part thereof, then it is my will that the share of the said Emma shall go to the above mentioned Benjamin Richardson, except the sum of $250, to Harry Hooper Walton. I appoint the said Benjamin Richardson executor of this, my will;" and that the said Emma Walton died June 23, 1881, before any partition of the estate, or any part thereof in said will mentioned.

That on August 26, 1878, John Richardson, Charles Richardson, Emma Walton, William Carman Richardson, Joseph H. White, and Elizabeth H. White, in writing, appointed the defendant their attorney in fact, "to collect, receive and give acquaintance for all rents and moneys due or to become due upon the real estate late of William Richardson, deceased, and to take all legal or other proceedings to collect the same; and let said real estate to such tenants and on such terms as the said attorney may deem expedient," and that the foregoing was the defendant's whole authority in the premises.

That the defendant has duly accounted to his constituents under said letter of attorney, and that the only dispute between him and them is a claim on the part of the plaintiffs that Elizabeth Richardson, the widow of Edward, is not entitled to a share of the rents, and that the defendant, as assignee of Augustus Boener, is not entitled to a share of said rents, or if he is, that he is entitled for their benefit as well as for his own.

The answer further averred that the said Augustus W. Boener, on May 14, 1879, conveyed to the defendant his share in the estate for $500, in cash, and release of claims which he owed defendant's mother, which claims amounted to over $2,000, and which had been bequeathed by defendant's mother to him, and that soon afterwards the plaintiffs united with the defendant and with Elizabeth, widow of Edward Richardson, in a sale of a lot at Tacony, belonging to William Richardson's estate, the conveyance reciting the interest of the said Boener and its purchase by the defendant, and the plaintiffs and their counsel being acquainted with the same.

The answer further averred that after said conveyance, defendant rendered accounts in which he was credited with the Boener interest, and Elizabeth Richardson with the share of Edward, and that the plaintiffs never claimed any benefit of the defendant's purchase of the Boener interest.

The answer further averred that in the fall of 1880 some of the plaintiffs began to claim a share in the benefit of the defendant's purchase of the Boener interest, and that subsequently they claimed that no property or estate passed to him by reason of the said purchase, and that neither the said Boener nor the said Elizabeth had any interest in the estate of which the testator died possessed.

On March 12, 1881, the defendant wrote to the plaintiffs' counsel asking them to elect whether they would or would not claim the benefit of the Boener purchase; whereupon, the plaintiffs, through their counsel, on March 18, 1881, declined to make any election, and thereafter filed this bill, without making any election, and averred a general account of past transactions, which are the subject of a settled account between the parties.

The answer further averred that the defendant, as assignee of Augustus W. Boener, is entitled to an undivided seventh of the estate, free from all trusts for the plaintiffs' benefit, and also that Elizabeth Richardson is entitled to an undivided seventh of the estate. The answer then avers that the plaintiffs have no right to apply for relief to this court, and pleads to the bill, and to the whole relief therein prayed for: first, that Elizabeth Richardson is a necessary party to the bill; second, a settled account.

The cause was referred to George Tucker Bispham, Esq., as examiner and master, to find the facts and report a decree. He found the facts as set forth in the bill and answer, and reported besides as follows:

"There are two general questions which are to be passed upon in deciding the rights of the parties to this controversy: first, Was the interest of the children of the testator a vested one during the lifetime of the widow? and second, if that is so, Was the purchase of the Boener interest by the defendant, made under such circumstances that the plaintiffs are now entitled, after what has passed, to claim the benefit of it?

"The first question, while not, possibly, free from difficulty, may nevertheless be perhaps properly decided in the light of one or two general and well settled principles and of a few authorities in this State.

"We start with the general rule that bequests are to be treated as vested rather than contingent, if the language of the instrument is capable of admitting of such a construction. It is also a well established rule that where beneficiaries are mentioned by name, the doctrine

Of survivorship does not ordinarily apply, although it is true that the mere fact that the beneficiaries are named does not necessarily exclude that doctrine.

"It is further to be noted in the present case that the residuary clause of the will is distinguished by the absence of certain phrases, the construction of which by the courts has not always been uniform, but which might indicate a contingent gift. Thus, in the bequest to his children, William Richardson makes no use of any such expressions as "all my children who shall be then living," "all the children that shall then be living and the lawful issue of such as may then be deceased," and the like. These forms of expression have often been held to signify contingencies, and perhaps just as often the contrary.

McBride v. Smith, 54 Pa. 245; Buzby's App. 52 Pa. 111; Delbert's App. 88 Pa. 462; Schweibert's Est. 40 Legal Int. 194; Appeal of Lumbermen's Bank, 13 W. N. C. 191; Manderson v. Lukens, 23 Pa. 31; Womrath v. McCormick, 51 Pa. 507; Crawford v. Ford, 7 W. N. C. 532; Laguerenne's Est. 12 W. N. C. 110.

"Their absence, however, is worthy of note, as furnishing an argument in favor of the vested character of the interests.

"There is in other words in the will under consideration no language which on its face suggests a gift to persons who shall be alive at a specified time.

"The case is in substance, so far as the first words in the residuary clause are concerned, a present gift to children with the time of distribution postponed. That such postponement will not interfere with the present vesting of the gift must now be considered as thoroughly settled.

Womrath v. McCormick, 54 Pa. 504; Manderson v. Lukens, 23 Pa. 31; Crawford v. Ford, 7 W. N. C. 532; Laguerenne's Est. 12 W. N. C. 110.

"The question then is: Do the subsequent words modify the intention thus gathered from the first part of the sentence?

"The fact that there is no gift to the children other than that found in the direction to the executors to distribute in futuro will not prevent the immediate vesting when, as in this case, the gift is postponed only to accommodate the estate by enabling it to meet the burden imposed by the gift to the first taker.

2 Wms. Exrs. 1844; McClure's App. 72 Pa. 414.

"Nor, in my judgment, does the added gift to any deceased donee, leaving issue, vary this construction; that only defines the quantity of estate and refers to the succession of the interest.

Womrath v. McCormick, 54 Pa. 504; Crawford v. Ford, 7 W. N. C. 532; Laguerenne's Est. 12 W. N. C. 110; Schweibert's Est. 40 Legal Int. 194.

"I do not think, therefore, that either the postponement of the gift, or the fact that there is no gift to children other than that found in the direction to the executor to distribute in futuro, or the added gift to issue of any deceased donee leaving issue, renders the estate contingent, under the authorities above referred to.

"But it is to be seen whether from the entire language of the residuary bequest, there can be gathered an intention on the part of the testator to limit the ultimate beneficiaries to such of his children as should be alive at a certain time or should answer a certain description; because if no such intention can be gathered from the general scope of the residuary bequest, the will is to be construed as giving what the disposing words under the above authorities would seem to assert, namely: an absolute vested estate to the parties named in it.

"It was argued that the general intent of the testator was to benefit a class, the constituents of which were to be the survivors of certain named children, who shall be living at the death of the widow; but I do not think that the argument in this case, that the legacies are to be considered as given to the named children as a class, is a sound one. I do not see anything to take this residuary gift out of the rule that children named take as individuals, and not as a class.

2 Jarm. Wills. p. 701 and cases there cited.

"The only other question remaining to be considered under this branch of the case is whether the dying without issue constitutes a condition subsequent or a divesting contingency. It is to be noticed that whatever contingency existed in this respect is inferential, nothing of the kind being expressly stated in the will. It would have been very easy (as was done in Peterson's App. 88 Pa. 397) for the testator, if he had wished to do so, to indicate in his will that the death of any child without issue would have the effect of divesting the estate of the parent, by casting it upon the survivors. In the absence of such express divesting contingency, one ought not to be inferred.

Gray v. Garman, 2 Hare, 268; Salisbury v. Petty, 3 Hare, 86, cited in 2 Wms. Exrs. 1359; Laguerenne's Est. 12 W. N. C. 110.

"I am, therefore, of the opinion that the interest of Jane Boener was vested during the lifetime of the widow, and that the interest of Edward Richardson was likewise so vested. In what way, exactly, the interest of Jane Boener passed to her surviving husband is not, perhaps, clear; but it seems to me that this is a question which concerns only Jane Boener's personal representatives on the one hand, and the purchaser from her husband on the other. If they are satisfied (the one that the title has passed, and the other that it has been acquired), I do not see how the other children of the testator have anything to do with the matter. The interest of Edward passed, on his death to his son; and upon the death of his son, Elizabeth A. Richardson took the share under the Intestate Act.

"Second. The facts as to the purchase by Benjamin Richardson remain to be considered. They are as follows:

"The terms of the will were such that a legacy of $500 to the testator's reputed son William was made a lien upon the residuary real estate. For the purpose of discharging this lien and paying the legacy, it was proposed in the family that a lot of ground at Tacony, belonging to the estate, should be sold.

"Benjamin Richardson (who had, it seems, been advised or told that Jane Boener's interest under the will was vested in her during her lifetime and had passed on her death to her husband) requested Mr. Boener to unite with the other devisees in a conveyance of the Tacony lot. Boener declined to do this; and thereupon Benjamin bought his interest in the whole estate for $500 in cash, and a release of an alleged claim which he (Benjamin) as an executor and sole legatee of his mother's estate, had against Boener, for moneys advanced by his mother for the support of Mrs. Boener, and for her funeral expenses. The amount thus alleged to have been advanced was $2,000.

"A deed for the Tacony lot was then prepared and was signed by all the devisees. It appears that in the deed there was a recital that Benjamin had become the assignee of the Boener interest.

"I find as a fact that, at the time of the execution of the deed for the Tacony lot, the plaintiffs knew that Benjamin had purchased and claimed to be the owner of the Boener interest. The deed itself recited the fact; and in the absence of fraud it is to be presumed that the parties to an instrument are acquainted with its contents.

"This presumption is strengthened by the fact that both William C. Richardson and Charles Richardson were informed by Benjamin, at or about the time of the execution of the Tacony deed, that he had had some difficulty in getting Boener to unite in the sale, but had finally 'fixed the matter.' This certainly was sufficient to put them upon inquiry; and, from all that took place (as appears by the testimony) I find as a fact that both William C. and Charles had notice, either personally or by their attorney, that Benjamin was then the assignee of the Boener interest.

"There is no question that prior to the filing of the bill, namely: on March 12, 1881, the plaintiffs were fully advised, by a letter addressed to their counsel by the counsel for the defendant, of the fact of Benjamin's purchase, and were then asked to make their election whether they declined to have any share in the purchase or whether they would claim the benefit of it, in which latter case they were asked to say that they would contribute their share of the purchase money, whatever that purchase money might be.

"The plaintiffs declined to make any election; and this declination was repeated before the master and has continued to the present time.

"Under the facts as found in this report, I am of opinion, upon this branch of the case:

First, that the relation to the plaintiffs which Benjamin Richardson occupied was not such that they were entitled to claim the benefit of his purchase of the Boener interest. It is true that he was attorney in fact of the plaintiffs to collect the rents; but he was also a co-owner with them, having acquired an interest under the will of his brother John. If Boener also had an interest, there seems to be no reason why Benjamin was not entitled to purchase it for himself, and without being obliged to account to the owners for the purchase. If one of several tenants in common purchases from another, under such circumstances, I do not think that there is any rule of equity which requires him to allow his cotenants the benefit of the purchase. The case is entirely different from the purchase by one co-owner of a claim or encumbrance against the whole estate. The purchase of an adverse claim might operate to the injury of all the tenants in common, and they all are therefore well entitled to claim the benefit of it. But I do not see upon what ground one out of five or six tenants in common who buys an interest of one of his cotenants can be compelled to admit his remaining cotenants to the benefit of the purchase.

"Second, that the plaintiffs, even if they ever were entitled to claim the benefit of the Boener purchase, were bound to elect so to do within a reasonable time after knowledge and especially after notice and demand; and having failed to do this, in the present case, they cannot now be heard to insist upon being given the benefit of the purchase. If the Boener title was doubtful, but the plaintiffs desired to claim the benefit of it, they should have promptly offered to share the risk. Before the bill was filed they were fully informed of all the facts; and they ought not in fairness to throw the whole burden of the uncertainty as to the legal question upon Benjamin. If they affected to regard him as their agent in the purchase, they should have either promptly ratified it or promptly disavowed it.

"The view taken above renders it scarcely necessary to consider the question as to how much Benjamin paid for the Boener interest. If, however, the question should become material, then in my judgment the plaintiffs, if they are entitled to the benefit of Benjamin's purchase, must pay him their proportion of $2,500, at which sum the consideration of his purchase from Boener ought properly to be fixed. This amount was made up of $500 in cash, and a release of claims, as already stated, of $2,000. If the settlement between Boener and Benjamin Richardson was in good faith (and there is no evidence to show that it was not), the figures agreed upon by them should be taken as fixing the consideration which Benjamin paid.

"Upon the whole case, therefore, I report that the defendant has fully accounted to the plaintiffs, and that there is nothing in his hands due them or any of them in respect of their shares of rents collected by him.

"I report, consequently, that a decree should be entered dismissing the bill with costs."

The court below entered a decree accordingly; whereupon, the plaintiffs appealed and assigned as error the action of the court in finding that under the will of William Richardson, deceased, the interests of John Richardson, Elizabeth Berley White, formerly Richardson, and Joseph H. White, her husband, in right of the said Elizabeth, Edward Richardson, Charles Richardson, Emma Walton, deceased, formerly Richardson, William Carman Richardson, and Jane Richardson, and Augustus W. Boener, her husband, in right of said Jane, in the residuary estate of William Richardson, deceased, were vested during the lifetime of Jane Richardson, the widow of the testator.

Also the action of the court in entering a decree that the bill should be dismissed with costs.

Moore v. Smith, 9 Watts, 408; Leake v. Robinson, 2 Merivale, 363; Appeal of the Lumbermen's Bank, 13 W. N. C. 191.

The gift was to the testator's children, not as individuals, but as a class; and not to the class as it existed at the time of his death, but to the class restrictively defined by survival of the life tenancy.

The naming of some of a class of children, or others of a number of beneficiaries, does not by any means, of itself, render the gift any the less a gift to a class. Thus, in Porter v. For, 6 Simons, 485, the gift was to the testator's grandchildren and to his nephew T. O.

In Clark v. Phillips, 17 Jur. 886, to the children of A, the children of B, and to D.

In Re Stanhope's Trusts, 27 Beav. 201, by name to four of the testator's five living daughters and their issue, with a subsequent provision that every daughter his wife might thereafter have should be admitted.

In Aspinall v. Duckworth, 35 Beav. 307, to a nephew A, and the children of a lately deceased sister. All of these gifts were held to be gifts to a class.

Williams v. Neff, 52 Pa. 333, which seems to decide contra, is opposed to the weight of authority on this subject if that decision is rested solely upon the fact that the beneficiaries are all named. A gift to several children, or other persons, all of whom are named, may very often be construed to be a gift to those children or persons as individuals. But such a decision cannot be rested on the sole ground that the beneficiaries are each named. The reason is always found in other clauses or in the general scheme of the will.

In Hoppe v. Tucker, 59 N. Y. 202, the testator divided his estate into six parts, corresponding to the number of his children, giving substantially one part to each or to their children. One part (after deducting a specific legacy) he bequeathed "in equal proportions, share and share alike" to A, B and C, children of his deceased daughter A. M. It was held that while the clause, taken alone, would be construed as a bequest to the persons named as individuals, yet in order to effectuate the general scheme of the will (which in this case was that the issue of all his children, where they took under the will, should take by representation) it must be construed as a gift to a class.

So also a gift of a residue to A, B and C, sons of testator's deceased brother, was held to be a gift to a class in Bolles v. Smith, 39 Conn. 217, upon the sole ground that a duty was placed upon them by the testator, which they must jointly perform, the duty namely, of paying from the residue a pecuniary legacy to the testator's wife, and several other legacies (which payments in fact amounted to nothing more than the ascertainment of the residue itself).

See also Page v. Gilbert, 32 Hun, 301.

The law always favors that construction of a will which would prevent intestacy as to any part of the testator's property.

Stelman v. Stehman, 1 Watts, 466; Azford's Est. 2 W. N. C. 663; Board of Missions' App. 91 Pa. 507.

In applying this principle it is immaterial that no alleged intestacy did as a matter of fact happen to occur, for as is said in Jarman on Wills, p. 469: "In construing wills we must look indifferently at actual and possible events."

Nothing in the construction of wills is better established than that a gift to an individual lapses by the death of that individual before that of the testator; while if the gift be to a class, the share of a member of that class predeceasing the testator does not lapse, but inures to the surviving members.

Jarm. Wills, p. 623 and cases cited.

As the legacies here are of the residue itself, a lapse must necessarily occasion intestacy. If, therefore, the interests here given are to the children as persons designates, and not as a class, then the testator has made just the kind of a will which the law by virtue of the principles above stated universally presumes a testator not to have intended to make.

The gift here was not only not to designated persons and to a class, but that that class was to be ascertained at the time of distribution, namely: the death of the life tenant.

The residuary estate is converted into personality at the expiration of the life estate; and therefore the interest of all the remaindermen are interests in personality.

"Issue" in a limitation of personal property take as purchasers, the reason of the rule being that the operation of law, whenever possible, "makes real estate descendible and personal estate distributable."

Re Wynch's Trusts, 17 Jur. 588; Myer's App. 49 Pa. 111; Sheet's Est. 52 Pa. 257; Snyder's App. 95 Pa. 174; Clark's Est. 14 W. N. C. 94.

Womrath v. McCormick is a case which, even as applied to gifts of real estate, was received with surprise on all hands, has been restricted as closely as possible, followed reluctantly in a few cases and tacitly overruled in the Lumbermen's Bank's App. 13 W. N. C. 191, and Barger's App. 100 Pa. 239.

It certainly could not be extended, beyond its own operation, to gifts of personal property, in flat disregard of the principle that "issue" in such gifts are purchasers.

Messrs. Crawford & Dallas, for appellees:

The will works a conversion as to the realty by the direction to sell on the widow's death; and if the clause would give a vested estate, if the subject were realty, it would of course give a vested interest in the personality.

McClure's App. 72 Pa. 421.

The well established principles that the substance and not the form of (the gift is the material consideration to determine whether it is vested or contingent—that if there is a doubt upon the construction, the law vests the gift—that where futurity in a gift relates not to the substance of the gift, but to the time of its payment, and there is an antecedent absolute gift of a life estate and the gift in question is postponed for its benefit, to let it in, although there be no other gift than in the direction to pay or distribute in futuro, the gift is vested—determined the supreme court in McClure's App. 72 Pa. 415, to decide in a precisely similar case to the present, that a gift of realty to a wife for life and on her death "to be sold and equally divided amongst my nephews and nieces, namely:" and naming them, gave them a vested legacy on the testator's decease.

This was affirmed in Chees' App. 87 Pa. 364, Mr. Justice Sharswood there stating that Mr. Justice Williams' opinion in McClure's App.

was an elaborate and exhaustive opinion on the subject. This construction as to realty was assumed in Cote's App. 79 Pa. 235.

Nor does the added gift to issue of any deceased donee leaving issue vary this construction. That only defines the quantity of estate, and refers to the succession of the interest.

Womrath v. McCormick, 51 Pa. 504; Crawford v. Ford, 7 W. N. C. 532, and Laguerenne's Est. 12 W. N. C. 110.

In each case the gifts in question were of a residue of both personality and realty.

In the Lumbermen's Bank's App. the gift was to children then living, and decided expressly upon the authority of McBride v. Smyth, 54 Pa. 248, and previous cases; which last case and Fairfax's App. 13 W. N. C. 274, decide that it is only where the gift is to such child or children or individuals as shall attain a certain age or sustain a certain character or do a particular act or be living at a certain time, without any distinct gift to the whole class preceding such restrictive description, so that the uncertain event forms part of the description of the person to take, that a different construction obtains, following the established rule expressed in Smith's Executory Interests, p. 281.

In Barger's Appeal, 100 Pa. 239, the will, which was that of a very eminent lawyer, who knew the use of legal terms, expressly provided in legal phrase that the gift should not vest during the time in question after his death.

The term class, applied to a gift involving survivorship and upon the question of vesting, "is applicable only to the case of a plurality of persons comprised under one general description, indefinite in number and individually undistinguished by name or particular description."

Lord Langdale, in Burrell v. Baskersfield, 11 Beav. 525.

Therefore, if a testator in a gift to children, or any plurality of persons comprised under one general description, names them (Bain v. Lescher, 11 Sim. 397; Burrell v. Baskersfield, 11 Beav. 525; Re Hull's Est. 21 Beav. 314; Creswell v. Cheslyn, 2 Eden, 123; Re Gibson, 2 Johns. & Hem. 656; McClure's App. 72 Pa. 421; Williams v. Neff, 52 Pa. 383), or only specifies their number, as, to the five children of A (Creswell v. Cheslyn, 2 Eden, 123; Re Smith's Trusts, L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 117; Re Stansfield, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 84), this is a designatio personarum, and not a gift to a class, and of course without survivorship.

Sir W. Paigé Wood, V. C. said, in Re Gibson, that with the exception of Knight v. Gould, 2 Mylne & K. 295, where the gift to three executors by name and office was held to be a gift to them as a class, passing to the two survivors, because given as a reward for performing their office, and the office being joint, their reward should be joint, he knew of no case of a gift to persons "herein before" or "herein after" "named" or "mentioned" in which the gift was held to be to a class, involving survivorship.

And in this will the words of distribution "share and share alike" also strengthen the intent. A gift of aliquot shares to several as tenants in common is not to a class.

Ramsay v. Shelmerdine, L. R. 1 Eq. Cas. 129.

The English cases of Porter v. Fox, 6 Sim.

485; Clark v. Phillips, 17 Jur. 886; and Aspinall v. Duckworth, 35 Beav. 307, cited by the appellants, are merely to the point that the addition of another person by name to a class gift does not destroy that class gift.

In Re Stanhope's Trusts, 27 Beav. 201, the Master of the Rolls held that the gift to the named daughters was not to a class; but the added words that all his other daughters should take with them made it a gift to all his daughters simply and therefore to a class, which is of course not the present case.

Mr. Justice Trunkley delivered the opinion of the court:

It is admitted that the sole question is: Was the interest of the children of the testator vested one during the life of the widow? The opinion of the learned master well expresses all that need be said upon this question.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed, at costs of appellants.

The President, Managers and Company of the DELAWARE & HUDSON CANAL CO., Pff. in Err.,

v.

Gilbert L. WEBSTER.

1. It is not negligence per se for a passenger to get off a car that is moving slowly, in response to an invitation by a person in charge of the train.
2. If the train is moving so rapidly as to render it clearly dangerous to attempt to get off, the passenger who does get off is negligent.
3. When there is doubt whether the speed of the train was so rapid as to render it clearly dangerous to get off, the fact is for the jury.
4. In a suit for damages for injuries sustained by a passenger on a gravity railroad in alighting while the train was moving no faster than a man can walk, past the point at which the conductor had promised to let him off, there was a conflict of testimony as to whether the conductor ordered him to get off or cautioned him against getting off until the train stopped. Held, that the fact of the passenger's negligence was for the jury.
5. The validity of the execution of a commission to take testimony is not affected by the fact that the commissioner signs himself throughout as a notary public merely, except across the seal of the envelope in which he returns the testimony.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Wayne County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of trespass on the case for negligence. Affirmed.

This was an action by Gilbert L. Webster against the President, Managers and Company of the Delaware & Hudson Canal Co., to recover damages for injuries to the plaintiff, alleged to have resulted from the negligence of the defendant's employees.

At the trial before Collum, P. J., the following facts appeared:

The defendant operated a gravity railroad between Carbondale and Honesdale. The cars ran on a moderate down grade between the inclined planes, and were controlled by means of brakes; they were light and easily stopped and controlled by the brakes; and the practice was to stop at almost any point where passengers desired to get on or off.

The only intermediate point on the road where a depot was maintained was Waymart; and while at the time of the accident there were many other places that were understood by the conductors and those who frequented the road as stopping places when there were passengers to get on or off, there was nothing to indicate these stopping places, not even platforms. The plaintiff was not acquainted with the road and knew nothing about these stopping places or their location. On the 17th of December, 1879, he started to go to the house of his son-in-law, who lived on the railroad but a few rods from Keen's sawmill. He knew where his son-in-law lived, but did not know whether Keen's mill was a regular stopping place or not.

He asked the ticket agent at Waymart if he could get a ticket so he could get off at Keen's mill and was given to understand that he could. He bought a ticket marked "Keen's." The conductor understood that he was to get off at Keen's mill and promised to let him off at that point. The cars were stopped at George Keen's house, which was not a regular stopping place about half a mile above Keen's mill, to allow other passengers to get off. When nearing Keen's mill, the conductor applied the brakes, the plaintiff came out on the platform of the car preparatory to getting off; the conductor stood at the brakes and the speed of the train was slackened so it was moving about as fast as a man would ordinarily walk, or, according to the conductor's evidence, perhaps a little slower.

They had passed Keen's mill, and plaintiff was standing on the car step.

As to what then occurred the testimony was contradictory.

The plaintiff testified:

"Mr. Penwarden (the conductor) came out of his car, he was in the head car, and broke up the car because it was running very fast, until we got right opposite the house. Said he 'Get off.' I didn't make him no reply. Right away said he, 'Get off.' I spoke to him and said: 'I will when you stop your shebang.' We went a short distance farther, and he said, 'I tell you get off.' I got off, and as I got off, I staggered back against the car, and that threw me down. I had a box in my hand, and it tore that pretty bad, and I fell onto my hands and knees."

The conductor testified as follows:

"When he came out on the platform I said: 'Mr. Webster, where are you going here?' Then we had got fully up to the house, even with it, and a trifle past it, and he said: 'I am going right here.' He had a square box in his hand. It was, perhaps, such a box as milliners keep feathers and such things in. It might have been two foot long and it might not. He had that right in both hands, and I saw that he was making an effort as if he wanted to get off. I saw by his motions that he intended to get off. I said: 'Wait until we stop,' but he stepped right off upon the ground. He didn't take hold of the railing of the car. There is a hand rail to take hold of, to get on and off, and to protect the platform. He took hold of nothing but stepped right down."

For the injuries there suffered this suit was brought.

The plaintiff offered the deposition of Dr. Garrison, taken in the State of Florida, on a commission issued to C. Codrington. This was objected by defendant:

"1. Because the commissioner had made and signed no return to his commission.

"2. Because the paper showed upon the face of it that the answers to the cross interrogatories were neither written by the commissioner nor at his office, the ink being entirely different from all that used by the commissioner, but that they were written by some person and brought to the commissioner's office and signed there by the witness."

The caption stated that the deposition was taken before "C. Codrington, Notary Public for the State of Florida," and all the jurats were signed in the same way. The envelope was lost, but it was proved that across the seal had been written the words "C. Codrington, Commissioner," and that the envelope was indorsed "Deposited in the postoffice at De Land this 18th day of April, A. D. 1882. C. Codrington, Commissioner."

The paper book of the plaintiff in error did not contain this deposition.

The court overruled the objection to the deposition and permitted it to be read. First assignment of error.

The defendant asked the court to charge that:

"Even supposing it to be true, as alleged by plaintiff, that Penwarden, the conductor, ordered him to get off the train, no evidence being given of any threats or cause of fear, the plaintiff, in jumping from the train while in motion, at the place and in the manner in which he did with the box in his hands, and not supporting himself by taking hold of the rail upon the step, was guilty of negligence contributing to his alleged injury, and he cannot recover in this action." Ans. "We refuse this point. The jury are to ascertain, from all the evidence, whether there was negligence on the part of the plaintiff, contributing to this injury." Third assignment of error.

And also asked the court to charge that: "The plaintiff, having admitted that he jumped off the cars while in motion, was per se guilty of negligence, and therefore cannot recover." Refused. Fourth assignment of error.

The court charged, inter alia, as follows:

"When a railroad company undertakes the transportation of a passenger for an agreed price, the contract implies that it is provided with a safe and sufficient railroad to the point indicated; that its cars are stanch and road-worthy; that means have been taken beforehand to guard against every apparent danger that may be set the passenger, and that the servants in charge are tried, sober and competent men. When in the performance of this contract a passenger is injured, without fault on his part, the law raises a prima facie presumption of negligence, and throws on the company the onus of showing that it does not exist. This rule, however, does not apply to a case where a passenger receives an injury in alighting from a car, when he has an opportunity of seeing and knowing where he is going, and controlling his movements. * * *

"The implied contract to carry a passenger safely includes the duty of giving him a reasonable opportunity to alight in safety; and it is the duty of a railroad company to cause its cars to come to a full stop for passengers to get off. But while it is the duty of a railroad to provide safe and convenient means of ingress and egress to and from the cars, it is equally the duty of passengers to use the means thus provided with reasonable circumspection and care. While the company is held to a high degree of care and skill in the transportation of passengers and is responsible for injuries to them caused by the want of it, the passengers are required to be careful and prudent, and to conform to the reasonable regulations of the company. If a passenger is injured as a result, in part, of his own want of reasonable care and discretion, he cannot recover, even though it should appear that the negligence of the company contributed to the injury. Where both parties are in fault and their mutual negligence produces the injury, neither has a right of action for it. This is called contributory or concurrent negligence. If, therefore, the negligence of a plaintiff in any degree contributed to the injury for which he sues, he cannot recover. Concurrent negligence is the absence of such a degree of care as the circumstances of the case demand. * * *

"Is the defendant responsible for the acts of the conductor in this action? We think it is. He is in command of the train and controls its movements. His negligence in letting off a passenger at a point other than a regular station affects the Company. We do not mean by this to say that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this case, or to say that there was any negligence on the part of the conductor, but to affirm that if there was negligence on his part, and if it alone, without fault of the plaintiff, produced an injury to him, the Company is responsible, and must answer for it.

Now if the conductor agreed with the plaintiff to stop the train at Keen's mill, and to allow the plaintiff to get off there, it became his duty to the plaintiff to stop the train there and to afford the plaintiff a reasonable opportunity to get off; and if the train was not stopped at that place, but its speed was slackened, and the plaintiff came out on the platform of the car and was told by the conductor to get off, and, obeying this direction, was injured without fault of his own, and by reason of an omission or refusal on the part of the conductor to stop the train and afford him a reasonable opportunity to leave the train safely, then for such injury the plaintiff may recover.

"But if, while the train was in motion, the plaintiff was told by the conductor to get off, and the circumstances were such as would necessarily or probably render such an act perilous, the plaintiff cannot recover, because to do the act would be negligence on his part, notwithstanding he was told to do so. And if it did not appear perilous and unsafe, it was his duty to exercise ordinary care and prudence in complying with the request or direction of the conductor; and if the want of such care on his part contributed to the injury, he cannot recover. When the plaintiff got off the cars he had a bundle or box in his hands. He stepped from the car to the ground while the train was moving, without taking hold of the railing of the car or platform, or taking any precautions to steady himself. Was this ordinary care, under the circumstances as developed by the evidence of the plaintiff—such care as the situation demanded? [This is for the jury, upon all the evidence in the case.]

"We have been requested to say that the evidence of the plaintiff shows contributory negligence on his part, which must defeat a recovery by him in this action. [We cannot say this. We think the jury are to inquire, in this connection, whether the plaintiff exercised ordinary care and prudence in getting off the car, having regard to the situation in which he was placed, and if he did not, whether the want of it contributed to the injury which he received.]"

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant took this writ. The portions of the charge inclosed in brackets were the subject of the second assignment of error.

Messrs. W. H. Dimmick and H. Wilson, for plaintiff in error:

To alight from a railroad car, when in motion, is an act of negligence as obvious and unmistakable as many of the acts which have been judicially pronounced negligence; as, for instance, in Reilly v. R. Co. 2 W. N. C. 198; R. Co. v. Hassard, 75 Pa. 377; Gerety v. R. R. Co. 81 Pa. 274; Carroll v. R. R. Co. 12 W. N. C. 348; Transportation Co. v. Wamautta Oil Refining Co. 63 Pa. 14; Coal & Coke Co. v. McEnery, 91 Pa. 185; Payne v. Reese, 100 Pa. 301; R. R. Co. v. Zebe, 33 Pa. 318; Honor v. Albrighton, 93 Pa. 475.

When the standard is fixed, when the measure of duty is defined by the law and is the same under all circumstances, its omission is negligence, and may be so declared by the court. And so, when there is such an obvious disregard of duty and safety as amounts to misconduct, the court may declare it to be negligence as matter of law.

West Chester & P. R. R. Co. v. McElwee, 67 Pa. 315.

What is negligence and what is ordinary care must generally be submitted to a jury. This is so, if there be any dispute as to the acts claimed to establish the alleged negligence; but negligence is not to be found without evidence.

Gramlich v. Wurst, 86 Pa. 74.

Negligence is a question for the jury, if there be reasonable doubt as to the facts tending to prove it, or as to the just inferences to be drawn therefrom.

McKee v. Bidwell, 74 Pa. 218.

It has never been held that when the facts of a case have been ascertained, the court may not apply the law to the facts. In questions of negligence it has been repeatedly held that certain facts, when established, amount to negligence per se.

Hoag v. R. Co. 85 Pa. 297.

The province of the jury is to find facts. If the facts be admitted or ascertained, it is the duty of the court to declare the law thereon.

Baker v. Fehr, 97 Pa. 72.

If the undoubted evidence clearly shows any fact which proves that the deceased was guilty of concurring negligence, the court should say there can be no recovery.

R. R. Co. v. Fortney, 90 Pa. 323.

When the only fact in dispute is an immaterial one, and would not have warranted an inference of negligence, whichever way decided, and the remaining evidence is uncontroverted, and would not warrant an inference of negligence, the court should direct a verdict for defendant.

Goshorn v. Smith, 92 Pa. 435.

When the admitted facts clearly show contributory negligence, it is the duty of the court to withhold the question from the jury, and determine it as a matter of law.

R. Co. v. Walling, 97 Pa. 55.

The standard of care is shifting where the measure of duty is ordinary care, where the circumstances admit of a wide range of variation, and the degree of care varies with the change of circumstances; the question, in each case, being as to the degree of care which should be exercised under the particular circumstances.

Such is the rule where the question was whether the plaintiff, who used a blind mule in towing on a defective towpath, exercised the degree of care reasonably required under the circumstances.

Canal Co. v. Bentley, 66 Pa. 30.

Where the question was whether a safe deposit company had provided an adequate guard, under the circumstances.

Safe Deposit Co. v. Pollock, 85 Pa. 391.

Where the question was whether the defendant has exercised a reasonable degree of care to prevent the fall of a platform.

Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. 332.

Where the question was whether there was unreasonable delay by the city authorities in removing a nuisance on the street.

Fritsch v. Allegheny, 91 Pa. 226.

Where the question was whether a locomotive engineer was guilty of negligence in running over a child of tender years.

R. R. Co. v. Morgan, 82 Pa. 135.

Where the question was whether the blowing of a locomotive whistle, by which a horse was frightened, was unnecessary, extraordinary and unreasonable.

R. R. Co. v. Killips, 88 Pa. 405.

The standard is fixed, where the circumstances present too narrow a range of variation to admit of varying degrees of care; where the conditions are substantially the same in all cases, and are such as to make the measure of duty obvious, and the same in all cases.

Such is the rule where a boy left his regular employment at a coal breaker, to carry an oil can to a fellow employee at another point, and stepped into a pair of rollers which had been left uncovered.

Honor v. Albrighton, 98 Pa. 475.

Where a passenger, instead of getting out on the platform, alighted on the opposite side, on another track, and was there run over by another train; no necessity for leaving the car on that side being shown.

R. R. Co. v. Zebe, 33 Pa. 318.

Where the plaintiff, with others, was passing along a pathway, under which was laid a blow pipe from the boilers of defendant's engine, terminating in a wooden box. At the time, the stream was being blown off from the boilers, and escaping through the ground above the box. Seeing this, plaintiff's comrades turned aside to avoid injury; but the plaintiff, instead of turning aside, went on and stepped into the box, whereby he was scalded.

Payne v. Reese, 100 Pa. 301.

Where a teamster, knowing the unsafe condition of a bridge, and failing to notify those who were bound to repair it, was killed by its fall.

Coal & Coke Co. v. McEnery, 91 Pa. 185.

Where one car in a train was loaded with combustible matter, easily ignited by sparks, and the couplings were so defective that it could not be detached.

Transportation Co. v. Oil Ref. Co. 63 Pa. 14.

It has been declared negligence in a parent to permit a child to trespass on a railroad track.

Cauley v. R. Co. 95 Pa. 398.

Or to permit a child of tender years to run at large in a city traversed by vehicles and cars.

Glassey v. R. Co. 57 Pa. 172; R. Co. v. Pearson, 72 Pa. 169.

Or to permit a child of tender years to engage in a dangerous employment.

Smith v. R. Co. 92 Pa. 450.

Or for the driver of a street car to allow a child of tender years to ride on the front platform.

R. Co. v. Caldwell, 74 Pa. 421.

Or for a locomotive engineer to fail to give warning, and reduce his speed, on approaching a public highway where danger is to be apprehended.

R. Co. v. Stinger, 78 Pa. 219.

It has also been declared negligence to attempt to cross a railroad track immediately in front of an approaching locomotive.

Gerety v. R. Co. 81 Pa. 274; Nagle v. R. Co. 88 Pa. 35; Boys v. R. R. Co. 3 W. N. C. 198; Anderson v. R. R. Co. 4 W. N. C. 274.

To attempt to cross the track without looking out for approaching trains.

Reilly v. R. Co. 2 W. N. C. 198.

Mr. George S. Purdy, for defendant in error:

While the commissioner has added the title of notary public to his signature, it certainly in no way invalidates the deposition.

If the motion of the train is so slow that the danger of jumping off is not reasonably apparent, and the passenger acts under the instructions of the conductor, then the defense of contributory negligence is unavailing. It has become the settled rule of law in England and in the United States that for a passenger to get off a car that is moving slowly is not negligence per se, but is a question for the jury, under the particular circumstances of the case.

In Robson v. N. E. R. Co. L. R. 10 Q. B. 271; 12 Eng. Rep. (Moak's) 802, where a passenger attempted to alight from the steps of a car that extended beyond the platform, the height from the ground being an unusual one, held, "that the jury might not improperly have found that the expectation of being carried beyond the station was reasonably entertained by the plaintiff, and that the inconvenience would have been such as not to render it imprudent on her part to expose herself to the danger incurred in alighting; and the defendants were therefore liable for the injury resulting from the plaintiff's act, which had been caused by their negligent breach of duty." On appeal the judgment in favor of the plaintiff was affirmed. L. R. 2 Q. B. Div. 85, 19 Eng. Rep. (Moak's) 228.

The same rule is applied in R. R. Co. v. Hendricks, 41 Ind. 48; Filer v. R. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 47; Mulhado v. R. R. Co. 30 N. Y. 370; Morrison v. R. R. Co. 56 N. Y. 302; *McIntire v. R. R. Or when a passenger steps off a moving car when he has reason to believe it will be brought to a full stop, or jumps from a moving car after a reasonable opportunity has been given him to alight while the car was standing.

McClintock v. Pa. R. R. Co. 42 Legal Int. 82.

Mr. Justice Trunkay delivered the opinion of the court:

If the deposition referred to in the first assignment of error was inadmissible for the reasons stated, it is not shown by anything printed in the paper book of the defendant. From what is printed by the other party it appears there is no fatal defect. And from inspection of the return of the commissioner we find no valid objection.

The remaining question raised by the assignments is: Was it the duty of the court to instruct the jury to render a verdict for the defendant because of the plaintiff's concurrent negligence? That it was fairly submitted to the jury, if it was proper to submit at all, to find whether the plaintiff was negligent, with instruction that if his negligence contributed to the accident he cannot recover, is conceded.

Had the jury found that the whole of the conductor's testimony was true, the plaintiff had no case, and so the court charged. The statements as to what the conductor said just before the plaintiff stepped off the car are in sharp conflict. One testifies that the conductor told the plaintiff three times to get off; the conductor, that he said to the plaintiff: "Wait till we stop." It is uncontroverted that the plaintiff was to get off at Koen's Mill; that the train was not running as fast as a person would ordinarily walk; that it was under control and could have been stopped within the length of a car.

The principles applicable to the question presented are well settled. It is not negligence per se for a passenger to get off a car that is moving slowly, in response to invitation by a person in charge of the train. But if the train is moving so rapidly as to render it clearly dangerous to attempt to get off, the passenger who does is negligent. When there is doubt whether the speed of the train was so rapid as to render it clearly dangerous to get off, the fact is for the jury.

"Although, if a passenger, without any directions from the conductor, voluntarily incurs danger by jumping off the train while in motion, the carrier is not responsible for injury resulting therefrom, yet if the motion of the train is so slow that the danger of jumping off is not reasonably apparent, and the passenger acts under the instructions of the conductor, the defense of contributory negligence is unavailing; and it is for the jury to say whether the danger of leaving or boarding a train when in motion is so apparent as to make it the duty of the passenger to desist from the attempt." Whart. Neg. § 880.

This doctrine is sustained by numerous decisions in other States and is not in conflict with the authorities in this State.

When a person, about to jump from a car running ten miles an hour, in midnight darkness, is warned by the conductor of the danger and told that the train shall be stopped, takes the risk, jumps and is hurt, his concurrent negligence bars recovery. In that case the court rules that an action cannot be maintained. R. R. Co. v. Aspell, 23 Pa. 147.

In McClintock v. R. R. Co. 42 Legal Int. 82, the plaintiff got off a moving train without direction or notice of any person in charge of the train; there was some conflict of testimony respecting the circumstances, and the question was submitted to the jury.

When a woman, accompanied by three children, on arriving at her place of destination proceeded to alight, two of the children had left the car, and while she was still on the car, the train started, when she sprang upon the platform and was injured. The question of concurrent negligence is to be determined by the particular circumstances, and is for the jury. Her case was not like Aspell's. The abstract truth, "that it is wrong for a party to attempt to leave the cars while they are in motion," did not apply to the circumstances in which she was placed. R. R. Co. v. Kilgore, 33 Pa. 292.

In Johnson v. R. R. Co. 70 Pa. 357, the question was whether the plaintiff, who had attempted to board a train while in motion, was guilty of contributory negligence. The court charged that if the train was distinctly running upon the track when the plaintiff attempted to enter, he was guilty of negligence and could not recover. That was held to be error; and this court ruled that it was for the jury to say, under all the circumstances in evidence, whether the danger of boarding the train when in motion was so apparent that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in making the attempt.

There was no error in submitting the question to the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

M. J. BUCK, Plff. in Err.,

William M. WILSON et al.

1. A debt upon a continuous account of book entries, made in the ordinary course of dealing, is entire; and it cannot, without an agreement to that effect, be split up into separate and distinct demands, so as to form the basis of several suits.
2. Receiving promissory notes on account of a claim will not imply an extension of the time of payment or an agreement to sever the debt in an action on the book account.
3. The agreement to sever the debt must be proved as a fact, dependent upon the understanding of the parties when the notes were given.
4. While suit may be brought on the promissory notes as they fall due, a recovery in an action on the book account, on the common counts in assumpsit, and on the notes due, will bar a recovery in a similar action on the other notes falling due and on the book account.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Blair County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiffs in an action of trespass on the case upon promises. Reversed.

On July 1, 1884, a former suit was brought by the plaintiffs in this action against the defendant. The declaration alleged that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiffs, to wit: on June 10, 1884, in the sum of $500, on the common counts in assumpsit, and proceeded as follows: "And for that, whereas, the said defendant heretofore, to wit: on the 10th day of June, A. D. 1884, in the county aforesaid, is indebted to the said plaintiffs in the sum of $378.17, as follows: first, a balance due on a book account for merchandise sold and delivered to said defendant, through the order and direction of his agent, W. J. Sharbaugh, a copy of which said book account, duly probated, is hereto attached and to the court here shown; second, a certain promissory note, dated Houtzdale, April 2, 1884, at two months, for $100, payable at 206 Market Street, Philadelphia, as well as another note, dated Houtzdale, March 6, 1884, at three months after date, for the sum of $225, payable at 206 Market Street, Philadelphia; which said notes were duly signed by W. J. Sharbaugh, agent of Dr. M. J. Buck, and delivered to plaintiffs in payment of merchandise, consisting of drugs, etc., sold and delivered by plaintiffs to defendant for use in his store at Houtzdale, Pa., a copy of which said notes is hereunto attached and to the court here shown."

The account as filed contained credits for the notes above mentioned and also three notes not then due, leaving the balance on the book account $52.67, and the affidavit of the bookkeeper alleged that that amount was due and owing thereon. January 29, 1885, verdict for plaintiffs for $393.30.

On February 7, 1885, this suit was instituted. The declaration alleged that the defendant, to wit: on August 4, 1884, was indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $600 on the common counts in assumpsit, and then proceeded as follows: "And for that, whereas, the said defendant heretofore, to wit: on the 30th day of January, A. D. 1884, in the county aforesaid, was indebted to the said plaintiffs in the sum of $495.29, being the amount of a balance due on a book account for merchandise sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to Wm. J. Sharbaugh, agent for M. J. Buck, for the drug store at Houtzdale, Pennsylvania. The said merchandise being such goods as were necessary for the proper conducting and carrying on of said drug store and were used therein. The said sum of $495.29 being the balance due on said account on the 5th of August, 1884, the same being the termination of the extension of the time of payment on said account as represented by three several promissory notes of W. J. Sharbaugh, agent of said defendant, due respectively, the first one July 13, 1884, for $100; the second, July 19, 1884, for $267.65; and the third one, August 5, 1884, for $125, and the said amount being the balance of said account not yet due on the first day of July, 1884, at the time of bringing a former suit in that part of this account that was then due, which account is duly probated, attached, and to the court here shown."

The copy of the account as filed in this case was the same as in the former suit, except that the five notes were charged against the defendant in the account with interest, showing a balance of $875.46, and the affidavit of the bookkeeper averred "that there is now due and owing thereon" that amount; "that no part of said principal sum or interest has ever been paid, or in any manner settled, and that there are no deductions or off-sets of any kind, except such as are therein specified and credited."

At the end of the declaration plaintiff's claim is indorsed as follows:

Balance due July 13, 1884.....	$100 00
Interest from July 13, 1884.....
Balance due July 19, 1884.....	267 65
Interest from July 19, 1884.....
Balance due August 5, 1884.....	125 00
Interest from August 5, 1884.....

On the trial, the plaintiffs claimed only the above items. Defendant pleaded the general issue and non assumpsit, and under the plea of the general issue offered the record of the former suit in evidence and asked the court to charge that it was a bar to the plaintiffs' recovery and that the verdict must be for the defendant. The court, DEAN, P. J., in answer to this point said inter alia: "On this state of facts defendant bases his third point: that his plea of former recovery is sustained and he must have a verdict. The authorities establish that a note given as collateral merely, and not in payment of an antecedent book debt, does not extinguish the original cause of action on the account; and if the defendant was now moving for a nonsuit because the claim was not founded on the notes, plaintiffs might successfully invoke this rule against him. It seems to us, however, in view of the facts here the rule has no application. Neither party alleges that the debt on the book account was paid by giving the notes; both affirm that it was not. The plaintiffs argue that by accepting the notes the date of payment was postponed; the defendant alleges that the whole of the book account could have been sued upon at any time, notwithstanding the time given in the notes; as it could have been claimed in the first suit they were bound, he alleges, to lay it before that jury and have it passed on by them, and it must now be assumed that it was passed on."

"The record does not show that it was claimed; the plaintiffs' claim on their narr. is expressly limited to three items, viz.: the small balance of $52.67 and probate, and two notes then due. In this suit the claim is limited to the amount covered by the three notes not due when the first suit was brought. No evidence is offered to contradict the record in the first case; evidence is given in explanation of it."

"At request of Sharbaugh, alleged agent of defendant, plaintiffs agreed to give defendant time by accepting notes at short dates. By this arrangement the plaintiffs reaped this advantage: the balance was settled beyond dispute, by a distinct written admission, and they had their debt in the shape of negotiable paper which they might at once use. The defendant secured the time stipulated for by him in the notes. The defendant, by giving the several notes, and the plaintiffs, by accepting them in consideration of the advantages resulting to both, impliedly agree that a book account then due should be paid in installments; there is no reason why they should not so agree if they chose; there is no reason why plaintiffs should not sue for each installment as it became due."

"If the defendant had given plaintiffs a bond in the full amount of the balance of the book account payable in installments, as provided by these notes, the plaintiffs could have proceeded to collect the installments as they became due; the judgment for one installment would have been no bar to a recovery for a second not due when the first suit was brought. Here the entire book account is adopted as the sum due; it is made payable by installments in giving and accepting the notes. The pleadings in the first suit might have been so framed as to aver with more certainty the precise sums sued for, but to recover the installments due on the book account it was necessary under the rule of court to file a copy of the whole account; the pleadings clearly disclose that plaintiffs' claim was limited to the three items mentioned: the agreement for extension by installments is not inconsistent with the record; why should it not be enforced?"

"On the facts before us, the plea of 'former recovery' comes with a poor grace from this defendant. He argues that the plaintiffs could have sued at once for the entire amount of the book account and were bound to do so; but that is just what he wanted to prevent by the agreement stipulating for the time specified in the notes; he now complains that plaintiffs did what at his request they agreed to do, gave him time; because they did not take all they might have taken, notwithstanding their agreement, they must not have what is yet unpaid.

"We think the agreement for time, after the plaintiffs had accepted the notes, is one which would have been enforced against them, had they attempted its violation; after the defendant has had the time he stipulated for, it is one which ought to be enforced against him. As the record itself does not conclusively show that the first suit was for the same cause of action as this, while the undisputed evidence from the witness stand shows that it was not, we deny defendant's third point." First and second assignments of error.

On the trial the plaintiffs offered the notes testified to by witness, William M. Wilson, for the purpose first, of showing the extension. Objected to: that the evidence is irrelevant and does not show payment.

By the Court: The notes are admissible, as tending to show an agreement to extend the time of the bill due on May 4, 1884. Objection overruled, notes admitted, exception noted and bill sealed for defendant. Third assignment of error.

Rockwell v. Langley, 19 Pa. 508.

To permit a party to recover in a second action what was included in and might have been recovered in the first action would be against the policy of the law and unjust, because it would harass a defendant and expose him to double costs.

Shaw v. Presbyterian Church, 39 Pa. 226.

Where a judgment in a former trial between the same parties is relied upon by way of evidence as conclusive per se, it must appear by the record of the former that the particular controversy sought to be concluded was necessarily tried and determined; that is, if the verdict and judgment in the former trial show that it could not have been rendered without deciding the particular matter, it will be considered to have settled the matter.

Dilzer v. Beethoven Build. Assn. 13 W. N. C. 165; Gilpin v. Howell, 5 Pa. 54.

The plea of former recovery is composed partly of law and fact, is a mixed question, and where there is any conflicting testimony is always for the jury.

Wilson v. Hamilton, 9 Serg. & R. 429; Rockwell v. Langley, 19 Pa. 509.

In Weakly v. Bell, 9 Watts, 280, and in Shaw v. Presbyterian Church, 39 Pa. 226, there was no evidence of an agreement for an extension, as in this case; there the party receiving the notes denied that there was any agreement or understanding as to an extension. In this case the defendant in error declares that there was to be an extension of the account in installments, as represented by the notes.

It was competent for the plaintiff to show that at the first trial the amount claimed in the present suit was not claimed or included in the former suit; but on the contrary was distinctly excluded because it was not due and payable, and was not passed upon by the jury.

Carmony v. Hooper, 5 Pa. 309 (foot) 310.

Mr. Justice Clark delivered the opinion of the court:

This action of assumpsit was brought by Wm. M. Wilson & Co. against Dr. M. J. Buck, on a book account for goods sold and delivered. The defendant gave in evidence the record of a former action, upon which judgment had been rendered in favor of th

1, under the plea of the general issue, defended upon the ground of a former recovery. See Finley v. Hanbest, 30 Pa. 190.

The former suit was also an action of assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, and an examination of the particular statement of the plaintiff's claim, filed in the respective suits, shows that the items are in each case identical. The sales, it is admitted, were on thirty days' credit; the last item in the account was for goods sold and delivered April 23, 1884. The first suit was instituted on the first day of July, 1884, and the entire claim of the plaintiff was therefore at that time due and payable.

The plaintiffs contend, however, that on the first day of July, 1884, their whole account against the defendant amounted to $1,595.95; that the defendant had given to them his notes, as follows: March 6, 1884, at three months, for $225; April 2, 1884, at two months, for $100; April 10, 1884, at three months, for $100; April 2, 1884, at four months, for $125; and May 17, 1884, at sixty days, for $267.65, and that the payment of the account was thereby extended, according to the tenor and effect of the several notes.

Deducting the credits and the amount of these notes, the balance of the account on the first day of July, 1884, was $52.67, and the plaintiffs say that the suit instituted on that day was for the recovery of that portion of the account represented by this balance and the first two of the notes above recited, which were then due and unpaid; that the itemized copy of account filed showed a balance of $52.67, and was accompanied by copies of the two notes only. The verdict and judgment in that case was for the plaintiffs in the sum of $398.30.

The present action, they say, is brought to recover that portion of the account represented by the last three notes. The suit is not upon the notes, it is for goods sold and delivered; a copy of the book entries, properly verified by the oath of the plaintiffs' bookkeeper, is filed; and these entries are, as we have said, precisely the same as were contained in the former suit; the balance, however, which the account discloses to be "due and owing thereon," is $875.46, which is, as the account itself shows, the amount of the whole five notes before mentioned, with interest thereon, and the $52.67, which, with the first two notes, was embraced in the previous action.

The plaintiffs' claim at the trial, however, notwithstanding the showing of the account and of the accompanying affidavit, was for that part of the account only which is represented by the last three of the notes, and as showing this, we are referred to an indorsement on the narr. to that effect.

It is admitted that the notes were neither given nor received in payment of the account; that there was no other extension of time on part of the plaintiffs, when the notes were given, than was to be implied from their receiving them. Mr. Wilson, the plaintiff, testified that they were not considered as a payment, until they were paid.

"They weren't taken," he says, "as a settlement of the account, because they weren't paid; they were charged back to his account, the same as you would take a check; if the check is good it is all right." A promissory note taken for the whole or part of a debt, will only operate as an extinguishment of it, if so intended by the parties. The notes did not, therefore, discharge the original debt evidenced by the account; they were taken merely for convenience and as concurrent securities only.

A debt due upon a continuous account of book entries, made in the ordinary course of dealing, is entire; it cannot, without agreement to that effect, be split up into separate and distinct demands, so as to form the basis of several suits; if divisible into two parts, it may on the same principle be divided into as many parts as it contains distinct items of charge; and no one would suppose that an action might be instituted on every item in a book account.

It is undoubtedly true, however, that if parties contract that a debt shall fall due and be payable in installments, they have severed it, and distinct recoveries may be had for the several installments in portions of the debt, according to the agreement, without involving the whole debt; but when the consideration is fully executed, and there is no stipulation of severance, the obligation to pay is ordinarily indivisible and entire. Sterner v. Gower, 3 Watts & Serg. 143; Logan v. Caffrey, 30 Pa. 196.

In this case, however, it is not pretended, as we have said, that there was any actual or express agreement to this effect. Mr. Wilson himself says there was "no special agreement" about extending the account, more than was implied in taking the notes; that the notes were credited in the account and charged back if not paid; they can therefore neither be regarded as effecting payment of the debt, nor an extension of the time of payment. For "Where a creditor takes from his debtor a note payable at a future day on account of his claim, the law raises no implication that he agrees to give time, until the maturity of the note for the payment of the original debt; but the agreement must be proved as a fact, dependent upon the understanding of the parties at the time when the security was given." Shaw v. Church, 39 Pa. 226. See also Weekly v. Bell, 9 Watts, 273; Bank v. Potius, 10 Watts, 150.

When the cause of action is the same, a former judgment in a suit between the same parties, although an inadequate one, is a bar to a second recovery. Pinney v. Barnes, 17 Conn. 420.

So, an action brought for a part of an entire and indivisible demand, and a recovery therein, will bar a subsequent suit for the residue of the same demand. Bendernagle v. Cocks, 19 Wend. 207. See also Staples v. Goodrich, 21 Barb. 317; Warren v. Comings, 6 Cush. 103; Lucas v. Lecompte, 42 Ill. 308.

There can be no question, under the evidence, that on the first day of July, 1884, if, in case of the threatened insolvency of the defendant, the plaintiffs had desired to collect the whole debt, they might have done so; the entire claim and demand of the plaintiffs was then due and unpaid, and they had the undoubted right to sue for and recover it. It is equally clear that the plaintiffs had a right in the first suit to proceed upon the two notes then due, which they then held as concurrent or cumulative securities; but they proceeded also upon the account, declaring for goods sold and delivered, and filed an itemized statement or bill of particulars embracing every item of charge in the account filed in the present case. If they allowed credit upon it, to which the defendant was not entitled, and in consequence failed to recover as much as they were in fact entitled to recover, their failure must be attributed to a misapprehension as to the effect of such a proceeding; but in our view of the case they are certainly barred from recovering in a second suit, for the same subject matter as that embraced in the first. To permit a party to recover in a second action what was included in and might have been recovered in the first would be against the policy of the law and unjust, because it would harass a defendant and expose him to double costs. Brenner v. Moyer, 98 Pa. 274; Hess v. Hebble, 6 Serg. & R. 57.

The judgment is therefore reversed.

POTTSTOWN IRON CO., Plff. in Err.,

v.

Jeffrey FANNING et ux.

The owner of a trestle who negligently leaves great masses of ore piled against one side of it in such a manner as to make it unable to bear the weight of a locomotive run upon it by the employees of a railroad company, in accordance with a contract between him and the railroad company for delivering to him ore cars, is liable in damages for the death of a member of the crew of the locomotive, resulting from the fall of the trestle and locomotive.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to Common Pleas No. 3, of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment for the plaintiffs on a verdict in an action of trespass on the case for negligence. Affirmed.

This was an action of trespass on the case by Jeffrey Fanning and wife against the Pottstown Iron Co., for negligently causing the death of the plaintiffs' son, Edward H. Fanning, at Pottstown, Pa., December 29, 1882.

At the trial before LUDLOW, P. J., the following facts appeared:

The deceased was a brakeman in the employ of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company, and on the day of his death was at work upon an engine belonging to the railroad company, which was engaged in pushing cars loaded with iron ore upon a trestlework about fifteen feet in height, erected upon the property of the defendant and belonging to it. After leaving the cars at the point where they were to be unloaded, the engine and tender were coming slowly down, when the trestlework gave way, throwing the engine to the ground and causing his death.

The point at which the trestle gave way was at a two story or double trestle, which had been allowed to remain by the defendant after all others of a similar construction had been removed by it. As originally constructed, the trestlework had been composed entirely of single trestles about ten feet high. The spaces between the trestles were used for the storage of iron ore, and communicated with bins for the same purpose.

In 1879 the defendant desired more storage room, and, not finding it convenient to remove the ore and put in new trestles, decided to raise the old trestles by adding a second story.

There was no evidence as to who planned the original structure, or under whose supervision or direction it was built. When the defendant decided to elevate the trestle Mr. Bines, the engineer of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company, at the request of Mr. Morris, one of the owners of the defendant, and as a matter of accommodation to him, gave him a ground plan or sketch showing the lines of the tracks with the necessary grade to give the elevation proposed, but gave no plan of the proposed addition to the old trestles, and made no suggestions as to how they should be constructed.

A letter from Mr. Bines accompanied the sketch of the lines of track, in which, referring to the elevation proposed by Mr. Morris, Mr. Bines said: "Should this be adopted, the principal part of the work would consist in blocks."

This mode of elevating the trestles by blocking or adding a second story to the old trestles was not recommended by Mr. Bines. On the contrary he disapproved of it.

At the same time that the defendant put the additional story on the old trestlework, it caused its contractor to prepare an entire new set of single trestles to take the place of the double trestles.

At the time of the injury all the old double trestles had been removed by defendant, except the one which broke down, and the new single trestles built for the defendant had been substituted.

The business of putting the rails on the trestles and of looking after the rails belonged to the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company; but the care of the trestlework and the handling of the ore in the bins between the trestles belonged exclusively to the defendant.

The spreading of trestles had occurred on the defendant's premises on a previous occasion, from the weight of coal deposited between the trestles, causing the engine to be thrown from the track.

On the morning of the accident, all the ore from one of the spaces adjoining the double trestle had been removed, and about thirty to fifty tons remained piled up against the other side and nearly to the top. The pressure of this body of ore, plaintiffs claimed, forced the double trestle out of position, and caused it to "buckle" or double upon itself, and thus removed the support to the track and caused the engine to break through. There was positive testimony to that effect.

The defendant contended that the injury was due to the derailing of the engine upon the trestlework, showed the absence of a fish plate on the broken stringer, and that the engine had a pair of unflanged wheels, called "blind drivers," which frequently got off the track, and that on one or two occasions the entire body of the engine was derailed. The engine had been three years at work on the trestles, and was never off on the straight line of trestlework.

The conductor, the engineer and a brakeman, all of whom were on the engine at the time of the accident, testified that the engine did not leave the track and come down on the stringer, as defendant contended, before breaking through; that if such a thing had happened they would have noticed it; and that they always felt the jar when the engine got off at other times.

There was also testimony that after the accident, the double trestle was bent over at an angle of 45°, and that the ore was on top of it; that this position of the double trestle was not due to its having been struck by the engine in falling; that if the engine had struck the double trestle in falling, it would have thrown it the other way, and that if the engine had been derailed, it would have fallen four inches on the stringer and would have cracked the bolster supporting the stringer but would not have sheered it off in the manner in which it was found.

The engine belonged to the railroad company, and the defendant paid the railroad company one dollar per hour for every hour that the engine and its crew were engaged in hauling the cars from the main track on to the trestlework. The crew of the engine, of whom decedent was one, were in the regular employment of the railroad company at this and other work and were paid by the railroad company.

There was no evidence that the trestle broke by reason of excessive weight being put upon it, or that there were any defects in the trestlework, of which decedent had knowledge, and which caused the accident.

The defendant's points and the answers of the court were as follows:

"First, the burden in this case is on the plaintiff, to satisfy the jury that the accident in question was wholly due to the negligence of the defendant; and unless the jury is so satisfied the verdict must be for the defendant."

Answer. "Affirmed."

"Second, if the jury believe that the excessive weight of the engine, or its undue tendency to get off the rails, or the absence of fish or splice plates at the place of the accident contributed to this accident, the verdict must be for the defendant."

Answer. "Affirmed."

"Third, inasmuch as the decedent had been employed in hauling cars over the trestle in question and dumping the contents into their respective bins for over a year, and was during all that time almost every day engaged more or less in such occupation, he must be presumed to have had as much knowledge of the sufficiency of the trestle for the weights he was taking upon it and dumping into said bins as the defendant; and as no notice of any defect therein was given by the decedent or any other person to the Company defendant, there is no liability on the part of the defendant for the accident in question, and the verdict must be for defendant."

Answer. "If the jury find that the bridge was in a dangerous condition, then and in that event the point is affirmed. If the jury find that no apparent cause existed which would lead an employee to suspect danger, than the point is refused." First assignment of error.

"Fourth, the uncontradicted evidence being that defendant employed the Philadelphia & Reading Company, a competent party, to construct for it the original trestle at the place in question; and having obtained from the engineer of that company a competent person's suggestions and ground plan and grades as to the proper method of elevating such trestle, and having in all respects followed said suggestions and plan, the verdict must be for defendant."

Answer. "Declined as stated. Affirmed, if the jury so find as a matter of fact. I have substantially said that in addressing the jury." Second assignment of error.

"Fifth, the uncontradicted evidence being that the trestle in question was constructed at first for defendant by the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company, a competent party for such work, and in the second place by Josiah Keim, also a competent party for such work, and no notice of any defect therein having been brought to the knowledge of the defendant, the verdict must be for the defendant."

Answer. "If the jury so find the facts, then only the point is affirmed." Third assignment of error.

"Sixth, there being no sufficient evidence in this cause to justify a finding by the jury that the defendant was guilty of any negligence in building the trestle or caring for the trestle in dispute, the verdict should be for defendant."

Answer. "Refused. These are questions of fact for the jury, and therefore the point as stated is declined." Fourth assignment of error.

"Seventh, under all the evidence in this cause the verdict should be for defendant."

Answer. "Declined and refused." Fifth assignment of error.

The verdict was in favor of the plaintiff for $1000; and judgment was duly entered thereon. The defendant took this writ and assigned for error the answers of the court to its points as above indicated.

Messrs. M. D. Evans and Wayne McVeagh, for plaintiff in error.

The relation of the Pottstown Iron Company to the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company was either that of an employer to an employee, or that of a corporation to a contractor.

We have therefore to consider the obligations that are due to an employee's servant from the employer, or to a contractor's servant from the corporation contracting. Those obligations are very far from being those of the insurer to the insured. Even the carrier of passengers is not liable as insurer.

Laing v. Colder, 8 Pa. 479; Meier v. R. R. Co., 64 Pa. 225; R. R. Co. v. Napheys, 90 Pa. 135.

The carrier's liability for injury to passengers is only prima facie, and can be removed by proof that the injury complained of resulted from inevitable accident or from something against which no human prudence or foresight could provide.

R. R. Co. v. Anderson, 94 Pa. 351.

His extraordinary liability is based upon the implied contract that belongs in every agreement for personal transportation; that all possible means shall be taken to provide for the passenger's safety, and upon the policy of the law which requires the utmost care to be exercised when a man, paying a consideration, intrusts his person wholly to the care of the carrier.

Sullivan v. R. R. Co. 30 Pa. 284.

The money consideration passing to the carrier, coupled with the helplessness of the individual in his carriage, is the basis for demanding of him unusual care. The lessee of a grand stand at the races, receiving a compensation for admission to the stand, was liable to the same extent as a carrier of passengers.

Francis v. Cockrell, L. R. 5 Q. B. 184.

A party cannot recover for injuries he incurs in risks, themselves legitimate, to which he intelligently submits himself. Whart. Neg. 199, n. 8.

For the exemption of the defendant it is not necessary that there should be an actual contract between the defendant as employer and the workman. A contractor is not liable to the servant of a subcontractor for injuries occasioned by the negligence of the plaintiff's fellow servant.

Wiggett v. Fox, 11 Exch. 832.

Nor is an employer generally liable for injuries received by a subemployee hired by an employee, when the negligence of any of the workmen engaged in the common task is the cause of the injuries.

Johnston v. Boston, 118 Mass. 114; Woodley v. R. Co. 36 L. T. N. S. 419.

The obligation of the defendant in general in the premises may be considered both with reference to the building of the trestle and the subsequent care or repair of it. That the defendant in a case such as this is not liable for the defects in a structure inherent in it from the time of its erection, provided he employs a competent party to build it, is unquestioned law.

When an owner has done all in his power to erect a proper structure, he is not liable to others for its occult defects, if he had no knowledge of them and no reason to believe in their existence. Walden v. Finch, 70 Pa. 460.

When a person employs others, not as servants but as mechanics or contractors, in an independent business, and they are of good character, if there is no want of due care in choosing them, he incurs no liability for injuries resulting to others from their negligence or want of skill.

Ardesco Coal Co. v. Gilson, 63 Pa. 146; Painter v. Mayor etc. of Pittsburgh, 46 Pa. 213; Mansfield Coal Co. v. McEnery, 91 Pa. 185.

When a person employs another to do a lawful act, it must be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that he employs him to do it in a careful and proper manner; and unless the relation of master and servant exists between them, the employer is not responsible for the negligent manner in which the act is done.

Butler v. Hunter, 7 Hurl. & Norm. 826; Hilliard v. Richardson, 8 Gray, 349; Whart. Neg. § 181; Wood, Mast. & S. pp. 610-616.

The owner employing a contractor may in a measure have some personal control of the work in hand without subjecting himself to liability for its faulty performance.

If the defendant Company was not liable, on the theory that the accident was occasioned by defects in the trestle due to its improper construction, the only ground left for the plaintiffs is to endeavor to fix negligence upon the defendant in not duly repairing or caring for it.

"Negligence does not consist in not putting one's buildings or machinery in the safest possible condition, or in not conducting one's business in the safest way."

Judge Cooley, in Southern Law Review for 1876, p. 114.

No one in exercising a lawful calling is liable for anything more than the diligence of a good business man in such calling.

Whart. Neg. § 30-54.

An employer is bound to exercise reasonable care in providing for the safety of his servant in the course of his employment; but he is not required to exercise that exquisite and exhaustive care in the constant examination and overhauling of his machinery and works which would be incompatible with the proper furtherance of business.

Priestly v. Fowler, 3 Mees. & Welsb. 1; Whart. Neg. § 212.

Negligence short of that which springs from the insurer's liability is not to be implied. It must be made apparent in the case of the relation of employer and employee, as in other cases, by affirmative proof.

Allen v. Willard, 57 Pa. 877.

The simple fact of the happening of an accident upon the employer's premises will not charge him with liability.

There was no evidence that the defendant had any knowledge or had ever received any notice from any source that the trestle was defective; nor was there any pretense that as matter of fact there was any rotten wood about it, or other appearance of decay or neglect. Under these circumstances the defendant cannot be held liable for the accident in controversy.

Warner v. R. Co. 39 N. Y. 468.

When one has erected a structure to be used in his ordinary and accustomed business, without fault as to plan, mode of construction, and character of materials, so that it was originally sufficient for all the purposes for which it is used, employs skillful and trustworthy agents to supervise, examine and test it, and that duty is performed with frequency and with such tests as custom and experience have sanctioned and prescribed, he has exercised such care and skill as the law exacts of an employer in reference to his employee; and no liability can attach to him for a defect in such structure, by which an employee has sustained an injury, unless there had been actual notice or knowledge that defects existed which, unless promptly remedied, would be liable to produce serious or fatal consequences.

Grier*, 22 Pa. 55, are other cases where a stricter liability was enforced, for the reason that the defendant in each case was knowingly guilty of gross negligence.

Manley v. Canal & R. Co. 2 Hurlst. & N. 840; Burgesses of Lyme Regis v. Henley, 3 Barn. & Ad. 77; Parnaby v. Lancaster Canal Co. 11 Adol. & E. 228; *Yale v. With the plaintiffs' decedent considered as a stranger lawfully upon the structure which fell, upon the state of facts disclosed at the trial the defendant is not liable for his death. It having been before seen that if he be regarded as an employee, the defendant is likewise exempt from liability, the claim against the latter is unsupported in reason or precedent, and must fail.

Coal Co. v. McEnery, 91 Pa. 185.

The master is bound to provide safe machinery, and to renew it at intervals if perishable. Baker v. R. R. Co. 9 W. N. C. 337.

This duty: to see that the machinery is kept in proper condition, imposes on him the duty to see that its safety is not affected from any cause which is apparent to him, or which can be anticipated and provided against. The neglect of this duty is the direct personal negligence of the master.

Where the servant's injury is attributable to the master's direct personal negligence, he may recover, irrespective of all distinctions based on employment.

Whart. Neg. § 189.

The master must see that the buildings and machinery are kept in repair; and the repairer's neglect is his. He is liable, no matter who may be the agents through whom he acts.

Id. § 235.

The agents who are charged with the duty of supplying safe machinery are not to be regarded as the fellow servants of those engaged in operating it. They are charged with the master's duty to the servant.

Ford v. R. R. Co. 110 Mass. 246.

The neglect, by the agent of the master, of ordinary care in supplying and maintaining suitable instrumentalities, is a breach of duty for which the master is liable.

Mullen v. Steamship Co. 78 Pa. 25.

Where the servant is employed in a work of danger, the master is bound to see that the machinery is in a safe and proper condition, so as to protect the servant against unnecessary risks.

Paterson v. Wallace, 1 Macq. H. L. C. 751.

No case has been cited and none can be found, from which it can be successfully argued that the decedent and defendant's employees occupied the position of fellow servants, so as to relieve the defendant from liability for the death. To constitute them fellow servants they must be in the employ of a common master and engaged in a common business.

Smith v. Steele, L. R. 10 Q. B. 125; Smith v. R. R. Co. 19 N. Y. 127.

A person who is injured by the negligence of another servant cannot be a fellow servant with the servant whose neglect caused the injury, so as to exempt the master from liability, unless he is under the control and orders of the master.

Swainson v. R. Co. 47 L. J. N. S. (Exch.) 372; 38 L. T. N. S. 201; Smith v. R. Co. 1 Pears. 248; Baird v. Pettit, 70 Pa. 483; R. R. Co. v. Armstrong, 49 Pa. 186.

This is not the case of a trestle which was defective by reason of faulty design merely, or of improper construction, or of defective or decaying timbers. No neglect by reason of these things is alleged against the defendant, but that on the day preceding the injury, the defendant had rendered what might have otherwise been safe, unsafe; and so left it, without notice or warning to the deceased. That this was a clear failure of duty towards those whose business called them upon the trestlework is plain; and the failure to perform a duty which the law casts upon a man is negligence, and makes him answerable to one who is injured by such failure.

Ferguson v. Earl of Kinnoull, 9 Clark & F. 289.

And where there is negligence it is immaterial whether the defendant could have foreseen the consequences or not.

Smith v. R. Co. L. R. 6 C. P. 21; Feltham v. England, 4 Foster & F. 461.

Mr. Justice Sterrett delivered the opinion of the court:

Recognizing the propriety of submitting the case to the jury on questions of fact raised by the evidence, the defendant below requested the court to charge: "First, the burden in this case is on the plaintiff to satisfy the jury that the accident in question was wholly due to the negligence of the defendant; and unless the jury is so satisfied their verdict must be for the defendant; second, if the jury believe that the excessive weight of the engine, or its undue tendency to get off the rails, or the absence of fish or splice plates, at the place of the accident, contributed to the accident, the verdict must be for defendant."

These propositions were both affirmed without any qualification, and a verdict was given in favor of plaintiffs below. In view of the instructions thus given, it follows that the jury, in reaching the conclusion they did, must have found that the accident in question was wholly due to the negligence of defendant below, and that neither of the causes specified in the second point contributed thereto.

In its sixth and seventh points, the Company defendant, somewhat inconsistently with the position assumed in the points above quoted, requested the court to charge in substance that under all the evidence the verdict should be for defendant, because there was no sufficient evidence to justify the jury in finding the Company guilty of negligence in building or caring for the trestle in question. The court declined to so charge, and thus withdrew the case from the jury, saying: "These are questions of fact for the jury, and therefore the point as stated is declined."

An examination of the testimony satisfies us that there was no error in this; that there was evidence, proper for the consideration of the jury, tending to prove negligence of the defendant. Plaintiffs' main contention was that the accident resulted from the condition in which the trestlework was carelessly and negligently left by defendant on the morning of the accident, by removal on the previous night of all the ore from one of the spaces adjoining the double trestle, and thereby allowing from thirty to fifty tons of ore to remain piled up against and nearly to the top of the other side; that the pressure of this body of ore forced the double trestle out of position, and caused it to "buckle," or double upon itself, as one of the witnesses expressed it, thus depriving the track of necessary support, and causing the engine to break through.

The testimony of Benjamin M. Gest, John A. Elliott and others tended to support this theory of plaintiffs below, and was manifestly proper for the consideration of the jury. It is unnecessary to refer more particularly to the testimony on this subject. Suffice it to say that it was quite sufficient to justify the court in refusing defendant's sixth and seventh points. The fourth and fifth specifications are therefore dismissed.

The subjects of complaint in the three remaining specifications are: the refusal of the court to unconditionally affirm defendant's third, fourth and fifth points. There is nothing in the qualified answers of the court to either of these points that can justly be regarded as unduly prejudicial to plaintiff in error. On the contrary they are quite as favorable to the Company as, in view of the testimony, it had a right to ask.

The case hinged on questions of fact, arising out of the testimony, to the admission of which there is no objection. These questions were fairly and correctly submitted to the jury, the proper tribunal for their final determination, and their finding has been adverse to the plaintiff in error. If their finding was contrary to the weight of the evidence, the power to grant relief was in the court below. That question is not before us. We find nothing in either of the five specifications of error that would warrant a reversal of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to Common Pleas No. 4 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

At the trial before Elcock, J., the following facts appeared:

The plaintiff Boyd contracted about October 1, 1878, with one Asay to plaster, for $300 each, twelve houses which Asay was building. On the completion of the work Asay was to assign to him in payment a mortgage of $3,600 on one of the houses.

Before beginning work Boyd discovered that Asay did not own the mortgage, but that it belonged to the defendant, Whelen, who was party to a contract under which Asay was building the houses, and that Asay was to receive the mortgage when the houses were finished.

On October 18, 1878, Asay, by an instrument in writing, in which he recited his contract with Whelen, released Whelen from all obligation to deliver the mortgage in payment for Asay's work, and assigned his interest in the mortgage to Boyd for Boyd's sole use in payment for the plastering as soon as Asay should be entitled to it under his contract with Whelen. The assignment concluded with the words: "And I do hereby acknowledge this as my receipt in full to said Edward S. Whelen, for all claims and demands upon him, for the sum of $3,600 under my contract with him, in consideration of his paying to said Alexander Boyd such sum as may become due for plastering as the work is performed and completed, from time to time, not exceeding in all the sum of $3,000 in cash payment, at which price the said Alexander Boyd has sold the said mortgage."

On the same day Boyd executed an assignment in the following words:

"For value received, and the sum of $5 to me in hand paid, the receipt of which I do hereby acknowledge, I do hereby assign, transfer, and set over unto Mrs. Isabella N. Whelen all my right, title, and interest in the mortgage of $3,600, which A. M. Asay has assigned to me in payment for contract for plastering twelve houses on south side of Butler Street, east of Broad Street, on the condition that in all the sum of $3,000 shall be paid over to me as I shall be entitled to it under the contract of A. M. Asay with Edward S. Whelen for the completion of said houses so fast as said A. M. Asay shall be entitled to any payment, I having sold my claim to said mortgage for the sum of $3,000, which is more valuable to me than the said mortgage, when earned under Asay's contract with Edward S. Whelen."

Boyd then proceeded with the work, and in the course of it Whelen paid him $2,000 on account. When Boyd, as he claimed, finished his work, he brought this suit against Whelen for the $1,000 still due.

Under the pleas of non assumpsit, set-off with notice, and payment with leave to give special matter in evidence, the defendant Whelen contended that Boyd had not done the work properly, that Asay had not finished the houses and that no certificate that Asay had finished the houses had been furnished by Whelen's superintendent Bye. Whelen claimed also to set off against Boyd's claim a counterclaim against him for $10,000 on a bond of indemnity or guaranty.

The facts out of which these alleged defenses arose are fully set forth in the opinion of the court.

The charge and answers to the defendant's points by the court below virtually took away from the jury and excluded from the case the defenses based upon Asay's failure to finish the houses, and upon the want of a certificate from Bye, and left it to the jury to say whether the work was well done by Boyd.

The court refused to charge that if Boyd executed the bond of indemnity, Whelen advanced money upon the faith of it, and Asay failed to finish the houses at the time stipulated, Boyd could not recover.

Verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff; whereupon, the defendant took this writ and assigned as error the charge and answers of the court.

Messrs. John G. Johnson and W. Heyward Drayton, for plaintiff in error:

An insurance company which has insured a mortgagee's interest is liable for the injury to the property, although the remaining land is ample security.

Kernochan v. Ins. Co. 17 N. Y. 428.

A mortgagee in an action on the case for damages to the property can recover the damage done to the estate, without regard to the sufficiency of the security.

Gooding v. Shea, 103 Mass. 360; Byrom v. Chapin, 113 Mass. 311.

In Curtis v. Baugh, 79 Ill. 242, a vendor having a lien took a bond from the owner in $3,000 for indemnity against loss by the sale of timber on the land. Timber to the value of about $2,000 was sold, and afterwards the land was sold to pay the lien, and there was a deficiency of $5,000. It was held that the measure of damages is the value of the timber.

When the contract is more than for indemnity against damages; where a party stipulates against the doing of certain acts, or the existence of certain conditions, or for payment or performance of any kind; then damages are not the gist of the action, and the value of performance of the contract will measure the damages recoverable for the breach.

Bye's certificate was required; it was not competent to prove a substitute for it; and evidence of what he had said as to the condition of the work was immaterial.

Reynolds v. Caldwell, 51 Pa. 298; Howard v. A. R. R. Co. 69 Pa. 489; O'Reilly v. Kerna, 53 Pa. 214.

Mr. Lewis Staver, for defendant in error:

It is claimed that the two papers of October 18, 1878, contain the whole and only agreement. They do not purport to be agreements inter partes upon their face; they are not in fieri, but final; they are signed but by one person and bind but one. They were deeds-poll and nothing else. Mr. Boyd's testimony did not contradict or vary the terms of any written instrument.

Rogers, J., in Hinckly v. Walters, 9 Watts, 182, says: "Here the parol evidence is in accordance, and not in opposition to the legal effect of the indorsement. The agreement was collateral to the assignment, and does not infringe the rule that a contract cannot be partly in parol and partly in writing."

It did not appear that the bond had been forfeited, because there was no proof that Asay had committed a breach of his building agreement. The agreement made between Whelen and Asay without notice to the sureties of April 8, 1879, superseded and did away with the building agreement; and the bondsmen, who were sureties for the faithful performance of that agreement on the part of Asay, were thereby released.

When a creditor has in his hands the means of paying his debt but gives it up, the surety is discharged.

Everly v. Rice 20 Pa. 299; Clow v. Derby Coal Co. 98 Pa. 439.

Mr. Justice Green delivered the opinion of the court:

The jury have found by their verdict that Boyd did the plastering sufficiently well to earn his money. It is true that Bye declined to give him a certificate of approval, but what of that? It is by no means clear that a certificate of approval was an indispensable prerequisite before Boyd could claim payment; but if it were there was testimony enough to justify the inference that it was not given, not because Bye did not think it was deserved, but because Whelen, under whose orders he was acting, would not permit him to give it; and if so, the law is settled that he cannot take advantage of his own or his agent's wrong. We see nothing then in this point which would warrant us in disturbing the judgment.

Nor is there anything in the contention that under the papers of October 18, 1878, Boyd was to be paid $3,000, only in case Asay did what was necessary to entitle him to receive the $3,600 mortgage. It is true that in the first of these two papers Asay recites that he has assigned to Boyd his right to said mortgage "so soon as I shall be entitled to receive and demand the same under my contract to complete the twelve houses," etc. He could assign nothing else so far as this mortgage was concerned, for he had nothing else to assign; but when we come to the consideration for which, by this same paper, he releases Whelen from his obligation to deliver to him this mortgage, we find that it was "of his paying to said Alexander Boyd such sum as may become due for plastering as the work is performed and completed from time to time, not exceeding in all the sum of $3,000, in cash payment, at which price the said Alexander Boyd has sold the said mortgage;" that is, Boyd is to be paid cash from time to time, not to exceed $3,000 in all, as his work, plastering, not Asay's work, the building of the houses, is performed and completed.

And the second of these papers, by which Boyd assigned to Whelen's wife what Asay had assigned to him, explains why he had sold for $3,000 in cash his right to the $3,600 mortgage, viz.: "I having sold my claim to said mortgage for the sum of $3,000, which is more valuable to me than the said mortgage when earned under Asay's contract with Edward S. Whelen."

If, as contended by the plaintiff in error, Boyd would be entitled to be paid only when the mortgage should be earned under Asay's contract, then the plain language of these papers must be ignored, and we are at a loss to know for what Boyd paid or abated $600 in the price of his work; unless, which seems incredible, he was paying or abating this sum for the privilege of retaining the risk which the papers show he intended to avoid. These papers were drafted by Whelen and are to be read together as explanatory and expressive of the arrangement between him and Asay and Boyd; and so read, we cannot doubt that it was understood that Boyd undertook to do the plastering in consideration that he should be paid, as and when his own work was done, independently of the fact whether the work contracted to be done by Asay was done well, or in time, or at all.

But conceding this, it is further contended that there is a set-off in the shape of a bond (whether of indemnity or guaranty) in which Boyd is one of the obligors, which had become payable by reason of Asay's default under his building contract with Whelen. But, according to the evidence, Asay had made actual or essential default, and while Boyd was going on with the plastering, Asay, finding or fearing that he would be "unable to fulfill his contract," made another agreement April 8, 1879, with Whelen, as to the finishing of the said houses, differing materially from the original contract, and in pursuance of which Asay conveyed the said lots and houses to Whelen's son as security for Whelen.

This was done so far as appears without the knowledge or consent of the obligors in the bond. It is true that Whelen notified them of Asay's inability to fulfill his contract and called their attention to their obligation to complete the said houses; but this was not until April 23, 1879, fifteen days after Whelen had made his new contract with Asay, had taken conveyance of the property to his own son as security, had in effect, if not in very terms, released Asay from the original contract, and when, therefore, the obligors had become released from the obligation of their bond.

Why, if Whelen intended to look to the bond, he thus made this new contract it is not easy to understand. It was not merely taking additional security; it was making a new contract with substituted security. When Asay made default, if he did make actual default, Whelen's remedy on the bond was complete and the cases cited by the plaintiff in error would apply. If the obligors had omitted or refused to fulfill their covenant, he could have brought suit against them and recovered damages to the extent of the injury suffered or loss sustained. But he did not. Before, so far as appears, there was any operative default upon the part of Asay or any knowledge by the obligors of his immediate or prospective inability to go on, Whelen, without their consent, without calling upon them or affording them an opportunity to fulfill their covenant, entered into a new contract with Asay which not only prevented them from doing so, but would have made them trespassers if they had attempted to do so. A new contract to perform on different terms, the unperformed part of the old contract, which took the place of the unperformed part of the old contract, and which, under the settled law, released them from performing it, and of course from all damages, under their bond, because it was not performed.

If the obligors are "allowed to escape, scot free," it is because the plaintiff in error did not choose to hold them, when they could have been held. Without going into the question as to whether, if the set-off, had been admitted, the money expended by the defendant below in finishing the houses would have been the proper measure of damages under the circumstances, we think that the judgment was right.

Judgment affirmed.

Louis ZURN, Plff. in Err.,
v.

George W. NOEDEL et ux.

1. A commission merchant is not entitled to commissions on the sale of goods consigned to him, unless he has in all things performed his duties as consignee in a proper manner.

2. A judgment given by a married woman, when covert, before she had applied for the benefit of the Act of April 3, 1872, which secures to a married woman her separate earnings, is not a binding obligation upon her; yet she has a right to pay it and, having paid interest upon it, cannot recover it back.
3. A note given by her, after having applied for the benefit of such Act, for money borrowed to enable her to engage in business, is valid as against her.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of York County, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, in an action of trespass on the case upon promises. Reversed.

In 1875 George W. Noedel was engaged in farming and in the business of manufacturing Limburger cheese in the County of York. Louis Zurn was then and still is a commission merchant, doing business in Philadelphia. Zurn advanced money to Noedel to the amount of $1,500, for which Noedel and his wife, Bertha Noedel, executed a note with warrant of attorney to confess judgment, upon which judgment was entered in 1875, which judgment has been duly revived by act. fa.

On October 29 and November 8, 1875, the personal property of George W. Noedel was sold on executions against him. Among his personal property sold on October 29 was a large quantity of Limburger cheese partly manufactured, which was purchased by Joseph Lebach for Bertha Noedel. At the second sale, on November 8, said Lebach purchased for her other personal property, consisting of farm implements and supplies amounting to $438. Of this amount $375 was furnished her by W. C. Chapman.

On November 8, 1875, Mrs. Noedel filed her petition to obtain the benefit of the Act of April 3, 1872, securing to married women their separate earnings; and at once, with the goods purchased at the sheriff's sale and others of her own, she assumed the management of the farm and proceeded to finish and prepare the unfinished Limburger cheese for market, and to engage in the business of manufacturing Limburger cheese.

On November 17, 1875, Zurn, the plaintiff in error, advanced to Mrs. Noedel $400, with which she paid W. C. Chapman the money advanced by him to pay for the articles purchased at the sale of November 8, and gave to Zurn her note for $402 at thirty days.

Mrs. Noedel finished the cheese, and from time to time consigned it to Zurn for sale on a commission of 10 per cent, the dates of shipment being from November 30 to December 13, 1875, and the total amount consigned being 111 boxes aggregating 12,808 pounds. Mr. Noedel acted as the agent of his wife and conducted the correspondence. Letters of instruction were sent with each consignment, which were in evidence.

The first letter dated November 29, 1875, directed the consignee to "Make the best price you can for it." The second letter, December 4, expressed the "Hope that you are making good prices." The third letter accompanying consignment of December 9, says: "You need not hurry with the sale. I need no money before the beginning of March; only at good prices; I wish to get about 15 cents."

The letter accompanying consignment of December 13, said: "Sell to the highest price as the sale is not pressed." With the letter of November 29, 1875, was sent the sum of $100 on account of Mrs. Noedel's note of $402.

In the course of the correspondence defendant repeatedly asked for payment of the balance of the $402 note. In her letter of December 13, in connection with a promise to remit money on account of the note she says (referring to the consigned cheese): "You have enough to cover you."

In her letter of February 12, 1876, she demanded an account of sales, and said: "Make now all the disbursements and advances and the interest on the $1,500 on the above lot of cheese, and try to make account sales as soon as you can." In her letter of February 26, she informs him that she requires the money realized on the consignment, by March 1, and asks an advance of $1,000. In her letter of March 15, she reproaches him for not accounting, and asks an advance of $200. Merchandise was sent to Mrs. Noedel by Zurn, to the amount of $29.02, and $10 in cash, March 1.

On May 17, 1876, Zurn wrote Mrs. Noedel requesting her to remove the balance of her cheese, and that on her failure to do so he would store it at a public store house at her risk. On May 31, 1876, he wrote her that the unsold balance of cheese would be sent to Comley & Co., auctioneers, for sale at auction on June 7, then next ensuing, unless ordered to the contrary. Thereafter the said cheese, consisting of 69½ boxes, was sent to said auctioneers and sold at public auction on June 9, 1876, realizing the net amount of $29.97. The cheese was in good order and condition when shipped to and received by defendant. It was spoiled when sold by Comley & Co. The cause of its deterioration was not disclosed in the evidence.

On December 3, 1879, this suit was brought by G. W. Noedel and Bertha Noedel, his wife, in her right and for her use. The original narr. contained only the common counts for goods sold and delivered, work and labor, and the money counts. Afterwards an amended narr. was filed, containing special counts averring consignments by the plaintiffs to defendant for sale on commission of a large quantity of cheese, and charging defendant with a failure and refusal to account and pay over proceeds to plaintiff.

On July 20, 1885, an additional count was filed by leave of court averring the consignment, by plaintiffs to defendant, of the cheese, and charging the defendant with negligence in the custody of the same, as well as in the sale, whereby it was alleged that a large portion of the cheese was injured and deteriorated in value, and with selling the same at auction, to the damage of the plaintiffs, etc.

To the original narr. and first amendment the defendant pleaded non assumpsit, payment with leave, and subsequently, set-off; and to the last amended narr. he pleaded not guilty. The action was referred to a referee who found the facts as above stated and the defendant liable in the amount of $845.86, and made his calculation as follows:

Judgment was entered for plaintiffs and against defendant, for the sum of $787.54, with costs; and defendant took this writ specifying errors as follows:

1. The court below erred in dismissing the defendant's sixth exception, filed to the report of the referee, which exception in part was as follows:

"The referee erred in rejecting the defendant's claim for commissions and guaranty, which plaintiff had agreed to allow him."

2. The court below erred in dismissing the defendant's twelfth exception filed to the report of the referee, which exception was as follows:

"The referee erred in rejecting the $302, due on the note of plaintiff, to the defendant, as a credit under the agreement of the consignor and consignee, made after the execution of the note and the shipment of the cheese to the defendant, and under all the circumstances of the case."

3. The court below erred in dismissing the defendant's fifteenth exception filed to the report of the referee, which said exception was as follows:

"The referee erred in rejecting the disbursements and advances disallowed by him; the plaintiff in her letter of February 12, 1876, having directed him to 'Make now all the disbursements and advances and the interest on the $1,500 note, on the above lot of cheese,' etc."

4. The court erred in dismissing the defendant's fourteenth exception to the referee's report which exception was as follows:

"He erred in not allowing defendant credit for the interest due on said judgment of $1,500, which the plaintiff by her letter of February 12, 1876, directed him to make for himself out of the cheese consigned to him for sale."

5. The court erred in dismissing the defendant's ninth exception to the referee's report, which exception was as follows:

"He erred in rejecting the balance due the defendant on the note of Bertha Noedel to defendant, of $402, as a set-off against the plaintiffs in this action."

6. The court below erred in dismissing the defendant's eleventh exception filed to the referee's report, which said exception was as follows:

"The referee erred in rejecting the judgment note of $1,500, against the plaintiffs as a set-off against plaintiffs' claims in favor of the defendant."

Messrs. N. M. Wanner and W. F. Bay Stewart, for plaintiff in error:

Mrs. Noedel used the money furnished as the consideration of the note in stocking the farm and in farming operations, which brings her within the plain ruling of this court in Bovard v. Kettering, 101 Pa. 181.

Her husband acted as her agent and conducted the correspondence. He knew what disposition she was making of her property. She might give it to a stranger with his consent.

Keen v. Philadelphia, 8 Phila. 49; Dando's App. 94 Pa. 76.

In Dando's App. this court said: "A married woman may transfer her separate property to pay a present or future indebtedness of her husband." Her power is not lessened by the Act of 1848. She may transfer it in the same manner she could have done before; citing Haffey v. Carey, 73 Pa. 431.

"While she may not be liable on a contract to sell and deliver her personal property at some future time, yet she cannot repudiate a gift or contract fairly made, under which she has delivered possession of the property."

Brown's App. 94 Pa. 367. See also Fryer v. Rishell, 84 Pa. 524.

Messrs. H. L. Fisher and T. W. Noedel, for defendant in error:

"There can be no reasonable doubt that in particular circumstances a wish expressed by a consignor to a factor may amount to a positive command."

Brown v. M'Gran, 14 Pet. 479 (39 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 550).

This has been held in a case similar to this in principle.

Porter v. Patterson, 14 Pa. 229.

In McMullen's App. 107 Pa. 94, it was held by this court that a married woman was not liable on such a note, although for money borrowed and applied to the purposes of repairing or improving her separate estate, simply because it was not shown affirmatively that such improvements or repairs were necessary.

See also Vandyke v. Wells, 103 Pa. 49; Glyde v. Kiester, 32 Pa. 85; Shyder v. Noble, 96 Pa. 286.

Mr. Justice Paxson delivered the opinion of the court:

We are unable to see any error in the refusal of the court below to allow the plaintiff in error his claim for commissions. Undoubtedly he would have been entitled to them had he in all things performed his duties as consignee in a proper manner. But the referee has found that he did not, and we are entirely satisfied with that finding. Even if we were not, and were disposed to review it, we could not do so in the absence of the evidence, the documentary portion of which only is printed.

Nor do we see any error in the disallowance of the $1,500 judgment. It was given to Mrs. Noedel when covert, and before she applied to the court for the benefit of the Act of April 3, 1872. It was not, under all the authorities, a binding obligation upon her.

But we think the court below fell into error in rejecting the claim of the plaintiff in error to be allowed the interest on this judgment, and also for the balance of the note of $402.

Mrs. Noedel (defendant in error) had consigned to the plaintiff in error a large amount of Limburger cheese which she had manufactured on a farm in York County. The farm appears to have been owned, at least carried on, by her husband at one time. He failed in business and some personal property he had there, including some Limburger cheese, was purchased by his wife Mrs. Noedel, who continued the business of manufacturing this species of cheese, in connection with the farm. It was found by the referee that she had sufficient separate estate to make the purchase. The $402 note referred to grew out of this transaction. Prior to her giving it she had applied to the court of common pleas for the benefit of the Act of April 3, 1872, which secures to a married woman her separate earnings. This brings the case within the ruling of Bonard v. Kettering, 101 Pa. 181.

The learned judge below held that Bonard v. Kettering did not apply, for the reason, in part, that the proceeds of the $402 note were not traced directly into the manufacture of the cheese consigned to the plaintiff in error. We think this was error. The money was borrowed to enable her to engage in the business which her husband had previously followed. She did so engage and as a result thereof shipped a large amount of cheese to the plaintiff in error, who had advanced the $402. In her letter of February 12, 1876, she authorized the plaintiff in error to retain, out of the proceeds of the consignment, the interest on the $1,500 judgment and all disbursements and advances. She was not obliged to pay the principal or interest of this judgment, for the reason already given, yet she had a right to do so; and it is no part of our duty to prevent a married woman from being honest. Her consignee held this judgment against her, and her letter to him was an appropriation of so much of her money in his hands to the payment of this interest.

Under the ruling in Bonard v. Kettering, she was clearly liable on the note; and it did not need her letter to her consignee to justify him in deducting the amount from the sales of the cheese.

Both of these claims should have been allowed.

Judgment reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

Charles I. LANDIS, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Robert A. EVANS.

1. Assignments of error should be so complete in themselves as not to require reference to other parts of the record. Each specification of error should, in and of itself, present the question to be decided.
2. Where the primary design of a plaintiff, in issuing an execution, is to obtain a lien upon defendant's personal property and not to sell the same except in the contingency of a subsequent execution being issued, the lien of the first execution will be postponed to the second.
3. But where the facts show nothing more than a disposition on the part of plaintiff to treat the family of defendant in the execution with due consideration, by not subjecting them to unnecessary inconvenience or annoyance, as where the plaintiff told the sheriff not to go to defendant's house until next day as the house was torn up, the lien of the execution will not be postponed to that of a later one.

(Decided October 4, 1898.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Lancaster County, to review a judgment directing the payment of moneys collected on an execution sale. Reversed.

The judgment of the court below was rendered on a case stated. The parties are judgment creditors of F. A. Diffenderfer and the moneys in question were collected on a sale of his property on executions issued on such judgments.

The facts are further stated in the opinion.

Mr. D. G. Eshleman, for plaintiff in error: Only in cases where the execution is not issued for the enforcement of the judgment is it fraudulent as to subsequent execution creditors.

Dorrance's Admrs. v. Commonwealth, 13 Pa. 160; Brown's App. 26 Pa. 490; Hickman v. Caldwell, 4 Rawle, 376.

The great question in every case is the intention of the plaintiff.

1 Trickett, Liens, p. 343, § 289; Lantz v. Worthington, 4 Pa. 155; Thorn's Case, 2 Pa. 831.

If the sheriff was directed not to levy until the afternoon as claimed by defendant, was he not bound to levy as soon as the afternoon commenced, which was at least two hours before defendant's execution was issued?

"An execution will not be postponed for an officer's default. His procrastination, even by sufferance of the creditor, is not fraudulent per se, and postpones only where the creditor directs him not to proceed."

McGinnis v. Prison, 85 Pa. 116.

Even if a plaintiff is guilty of laches, and none has been shown in this case, he will not be postponed, if he order the sheriff to proceed before another writ comes into his hands.

1 Trickett, Liens, p. 351, § 295; Deacon v. Govett, 4 Phila. 7; Freeburger's App. 40 Pa. 244; Mentz v. Hamman, 5 Whart. 150.

In Childs v. Dilworth, 44 Pa. 123, where one of the plaintiffs desired the sheriff to postpone the sale of the personal property until after that of the real estate, which the sheriff refused to do, postponing the advertisement of the personal property for one day only, and then proceeded to sell, it was held that the plaintiff's priority of lien was not destroyed.

Mr. A. J. Eberly, for defendant in error:

This court decided in Earl's App. 18 Pa. 483, that delay will defeat an execution whether owing to the directions or permission of the plaintiff, or to the default of the officer.

In 5 Rawle, 290, Justice Sergeant says: "If the plaintiff delivers an execution to the sheriff with directions not to levy at all, or not until further orders, it creates no lien on the defendant's personal property as against a creditor issuing and proceeding with a subsequent execution."

Commonwealth v. Stremback, 8 Rawle, 344.

"The rule is the same if there is a levy accompanied with instructions to stay proceedings."

Hickman v. Caldwell, 4 Rawle, 376.

"In both cases the plaintiff's object is considered to be to obtain security, not satisfaction for his debt; and the employment of an execution for this purpose is a perversion of its design, and a fraud against third persons."

Justice Kennedy in Weir v. Hale, 3 Watts & S. 288, 289, delivering the opinion of the court on the same subject, says:

"In order to make the execution first put into the hands of the sheriff available against those delivered to him subsequently, it is not sufficient that the plaintiff in it has a valid judgment, and that he is entitled to have execution of it; but he must sue out his execution, and deliver it to the sheriff, not merely for the purpose of having his debt secured by creating a lien on the personal property of the defendant, or still less of protecting the defendant thereby in the use and enjoyment of it, but for the purpose of having his judgment satisfied by a bona fide execution of the writ as far as it may be practicable."

In Truitt v. Ludwig, 25 Pa. 149, Lewis, Ch. J., lays down this rule on the subject of executions: "Nothing can be better settled than that an execution is intended not to secure, but to enforce, payment of a debt. It must be used in good faith for its legitimate purpose, or the plaintiff in whose favor it issues gains no advantage from it."

It is true that the directions given by the plaintiff in Stern's App. 64 Pa. 447, to the sheriff on Sunday to proceed with the pluries writ had not the effect on the writ to make it a lien from the time the order was given and to galvanize it into life again without a levy, because the order was given on Sunday; but the court does not decide that it would not have the same effect if given on any other day.

Mr. Justice Sterrett delivered the opinion of the court:

As has been repeatedly said, the assignments of error are an essential part of the pleadings in this court, and as such should be so complete in themselves as not to require reference to other parts of the record. When the case is disposed of and the record returned to the court below, the precept, assignments of error and plea thereto are all the papers that usually remain of record in this court as the basis of our judgment or decree, as the case may be. It must be obvious, therefore, that each specification of error should, in and of itself, present the question we are called upon to decide.

In the case under consideration, there are only two specifications, one of which is: "The court erred in discharging the rule of Charles I. Landis," and the other: "The court erred in making absolute the rule of Robert A. Evans."

What these rules respectively were, in disposing of which it is insinuated the court below committed manifest error, we are not informed by the pleadings, and we might, with propriety, and perhaps ought to affirm the judgment, for the reason that there is no valid assignment of errors.

By referring to the case stated in the record of the court below, we find that the former was a rule to show cause why the sheriff should not be ordered to pay the proceeds sale of Dufferden's personal property to Charles I. Landis, the plaintiff in error, and the latter a rule to show cause why the same money should not be paid to Evans, the defendant in error. It appears that Landis and Evans were both executive creditors of the defendant whose property was sold on both executions.

Landis' execution was issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff at 2.15 o'clock P. M. on February 26, 1835, and Evans' execution at 2 o'clock P. M. of the following day. Ordinarily there would be no question that the first execution would be entitled to the money; but the court awarded it to the second execution, upon the ground that the first was postponed in consequence of directions to the sheriff not to proceed immediately and levy on defendant's property. What passed between the sheriff and Landis' attorney is set forth in the case stated; and the question is, whether, upon the facts there presented, the court was right in holding that the first execution was postponed to the second.

It appears, in substance, that on the day the first execution was issued, Landis, the plaintiff therein, told the sheriff's deputy not to go to defendant's house until next day, as the house was torn up; and on the following morning he informed the sheriff that the ladies were clearing up or fixing things up in the house, and suggested to the sheriff that, if it made no difference to him, he might go up in the afternoon.

It cannot be doubted that what was thus said and suggested by the plaintiff in the execution was prompted by a desire to accommodate the family of the defendant in the execution, and cannot be fairly construed as evidence of a design on his part to merely obtain a lien by virtue of his execution and hold the same as security.

The authorities are abundant that when the primary design of a plaintiff, in issuing an execution, is to obtain a lien upon defendant's personal property and not to sell the same except in the contingency of a subsequent execution being issued, the lien of the execution will be postponed. The facts recited in the case stated, however, do not warrant any such conclusion. On the contrary, they show nothing more than a disposition on the part of plaintiff to treat the family of defendant in the execution with due consideration, by not subjecting them to unnecessary inconvenience or annoyance. We think, therefore, that the learned court erred in holding that the lien of the first execution was lost.

The order of court is reversed, and the rule to show cause why the sheriff should not be ordered to pay the proceeds of sale to plaintiff, Charles I. Landis, is made absolute.

v.

Davis W. JOHNS.

A debt discharged by proceedings in bankruptcy is revived by a subsequent absolute and unconditional promise, by the debtor, to pay it, and by a partial payment.

(Decided October 18, 1888.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Greene County, to review a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff in a action of trespass on the case on promises to pay a pre-existing liability. Affirmed.

The facts of the case as they appeared in the court below are stated in the charge to the jury by INGRAM, J.

"It appears from the evidence in this case that on the 10th day of December, 1873, the defendant, James Huffman, gave to the plaintiff, D. W. Johns, his note under seal calling for the payment of $325.50, one year after date. From the evidence it doesn't appear that anything was done with that note, but it does appear that on the 17th day of July, 1876, the defendant, James Huffman, was adjudicated a bankrupt; and on the third day of December, 1879, he was discharged in bankruptcy, of course dating back to his adjudication on the 17th day of July, 1876; and that relieved him from all liability on this note.

"But it is claimed by the plaintiff that on or near the first of July, 1880, he called upon the defendant at his house and asked him to renew the note dated on the 10th day of December, 1873, but that the defendant refused to renew it, but said that he must and would pay it; and it is claimed by the plaintiff that he offered to give him a horse on the note, which he considered worth $100; and that he, the plaintiff, agreed that he would take the horse on the note, and that they went to the field to look at the horse; that they did look at him, but the defendant wanted to use the horse for a few days in some of his farming operations, possibly; and that he left him there, but when he went back the defendant claimed that the horse was worth $120.

"The plaintiff claims that he said he would give him credit on the note for the horse and that the defendant sanctioned that proceeding, and he claims that he afterwards did give the defendant credit on the note for $120, the price of the horse, and also gave the defendant a pocket receipt for the amount of the value of the horse. This is, as we remember it, the evidence on the part of the plaintiff on which he relies for a recovery in this action, claiming that there has been such a promise on the part of the defendant to pay this debt, as would render him liable to a recovery in this action.

"On the part of the defendant it is not denied that he gave the plaintiff the horse on the note, or as a payment on the note, but he claims that it was under different circumstances and under a different state of facts than that claimed by the plaintiff. He claims that the plaintiff came to his house or his place, about the first of July, 1880, and asked him to renew the note, but that he declined and refused to do so, but stated to the plaintiff that he would like to pay the note, but was unable to do it. It is claimed also that he stated to the plaintiff that he would give him the horse on the note if he, the plaintiff, would release the defendant, or rather discontinue a suit in the name of the administrators of Cowan against the defendant and his brother that was then pending in this court; and further, that if he would discontinue that suit and give him an opportunity to pay the note by assisting him (the plaintiff then being a candidate for the nomination for treasurer of the county, and the defendant believing the plaintiff's prospects for the nomination were pretty fair)—that he stated to the plaintiff that if the plaintiff would give him an opportunity of clerking for him and collecting money for him, he would in that way pay the note; and he claims that he made no other promise than that; that he did state in reply to the request of the plaintiff to renew the note, that he wouldn't do it; that he would like to pay it, and if the plaintiff would give him the opportunity he would pay it, and that he would give him the horse on the note, if he, the plaintiff, would release the suit then pending against him in the name of the administrators of Cowan.

"The defendant claims that the promise, if any was made, was entirely conditional upon his being allowed to assist the plaintiff in his business, in his office, and that the further condition was that they would discontinue the proceedings in the Cowan suit against the defendant; and he claims that the proceedings in that case were not discontinued, and the record in that case shows that they proceeded until he was finally successful in recovering a verdict in his favor on the 21st of April, I believe, 1885.

It is claimed by the defendant that whatever promise was made about the first of July was conditional and entirely so; that the condition failed and that he is not now responsible for this note or the balance of it, after deducting the credit of the price of the horse.

"On the part of the plaintiff it is not denied that they had some conversation about the Cowan suit, and about assistance in the office of treasurer if the plaintiff should be nominated and elected; but he claims that the promise to pay the note was before that, that the promise to pay the note was made at or near the house of the defendant and that nothing was said about assisting in the office of treasurer, and that nothing was said about the Cowan suit at that time; but that after they had been talking there awhile and the promise had been made and they had gone to the field to look after the horse, and were out in the field, or returning to the house afterwards, the defendant did say something afterwards about the discontinuance of the Cowan suit and about clerking in the office of treasurer for him, or collecting moneys for him, but he denies that such conversation took place at the time the promise, as he claims, was made.

"The question for you to determine, gentlemen of the jury, is whether there has been an absolute promise to pay this note or debt since the discharge of the defendant in bankruptcy. Whatever promise was made was made, of course, since his discharge in bankruptcy, that having taken place in December, 1879; and it is claimed by the plaintiff that the promise which he alleges was made was made in July, 1880. It will be a question of fact for you to determine from all the evidence in the case, relying upon your own recollections of the testimony as to what has been testified to on the one side or the other. It is not what we may state was the testimony, or what the counsel may state that you are to rely upon in making up your verdict, but it will be your duty to remember the testimony of the witnesses, and upon your recollection of it make up your verdict. * * *

"If the jury should find that there was a promise of the defendant, that it was an absolute promise to pay the amount of that note, and that he did pay the $120 on it, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, and your verdict should be for the plaintiff for the balance of the note with its interest. * * *

"If the jury should find from the evidence that it was a conditional promise, not unconditional and absolute on the part of the defendant to pay, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and your verdict should be for the defendant. It will be altogether a question of fact for you, gentlemen of the jury, under the evidence in the case. If you believe it was unconditional and absolute after his discharge in bankruptcy, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and your verdict should be for the plaintiff for the balance of the note, with its interest down to the present time. If, on the other hand, you find that the promise was not unconditional and absolute, the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover, and your verdict should be for the defendant."

The jury found a verdict for plaintiff, upon which judgment was entered; and defendant took this writ, assigning errors as follows:

1. The court erred in affirming plaintiff's point, as follows:

"That if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant promised to pay the plaintiff after his discharge in bankruptcy as stated by plaintiff, to wit: 'I must and will pay it,' in speaking of the note, and paid by a horse $120, on said note, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the residue of said note."

2. The court erred in refusing defendant's second point, as follows:

"Under all the evidence in the case the verdict of the jury should be for the defendant."

Messrs. Sayers & Son, for plaintiff in error: When a case is submitted to a jury upon clearly insufficient evidence, such as no court ought to sustain a verdict upon, it is its plain duty to reverse.

Couffman v. Long, 82 Pa. 80 and cases cited.

If there is evidence from which the jury can properly find the question for the party on whom the burden of proof rests, it should be submitted; if not it should be withdrawn from the jury.

Hyatt v. Johnston, 91 Pa. 196.

PA.

It is not enough that there was a recognition of the debt or payment made on same after discharge in bankruptcy; there must be an express promise to pay, unconditional and absolute.

Canfield's App. 1 W. N. C. 67; Yostheimer v. Keyser, 11 Pa. 386.

The effect of such evidence has been carried very far to avoid the Statute of Limitations; much farther than it ought to be in order to avoid a bankrupt's discharge, which would otherwise be a dead letter. Id.

The decisions of this court apply very strict rules to acknowledgments, to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations.

Johns v. Lantz, 68 Pa. 324; Shaeffer v. Hoffman, 17 W. N. C. 501; Landis v. Roth, 16 W. N. C. 309.

Mr. A. A. Purman, for defendant in error.

Per Curiam:

In order to restore the legal efficacy of a debt discharged by proceedings in bankruptcy, the promise to pay must, undoubtedly, be unambiguous and explicit. But in the case in hand, as the jury has found, there was not only an absolute and unconditional promise by the defendant to pay the note in controversy, but also a partial payment. Than this there could be nothing more unequivocal, and it fully and in every particular complies with the rule for the revival of the discharged debt.

Judgment affirmed.

v.

Henry J. GOODWIN et al.

1. A foreign attachment, issued in any county where the property of a non-resident is situated, after the execution in another State of an assignment for the benefit of creditors, but before the assignment is recorded in the county, has priority over the assignment.
2. The power to quash a writ is limited to proceedings that are irregular, defective or improper.
3. That the debt is not presently due is not sufficient ground for quashing a writ of foreign attachment, at the instance of the defendant's assignee for the benefit of creditors.
4. An existing indebtedness from the defendant to the plaintiff being undisputed, the question whether the debt is or is not presently due is for the jury.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to Common Pleas No. 1 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment making absolute a rule to quash a writ of foreign attachment. Reversed.

The facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. George P. Rich and Mayer Sulzberger, for plaintiffs in error:

The assignee not being a party to the record had no standing in court.

The declared object of the Act was to prevent nonresidents from withdrawing their effects from the State, leaving their debts unpaid.

Fitch v. Ross, 4 Serg. & R. 564.

The defendant is authorized to have the attachment of his effects dissolved, by entering security for the debt. When this is done, the action becomes merely a common-law remedy.

Ins. Co. v. Whitney, 70 Pa. 248.

The defendant has also the right to ask the court, as in the case of a capias, to inquire into the cause of action and, if no satisfactory cause be shown, to dissolve the attachment.

Vienne v. M'Carty, 1 Dall. 154 (1 U. S. bk. 1 L. ed. 79).

In the absence of the defendant, the courts, in view of the hardship resulting from the attachment of his property, have permitted the garnishees, on behalf of the defendant, and for the protection of his interests, to make this motion.

Morris v. Turner, 3 Clark, 428.

But a stranger, claiming that the property attached in the garnishees' hands belonged neither to the defendant nor the garnishees but to himself, was without any protection whatever, and was in danger of losing his property or at least the enjoyment of it, without redress, until the Act of June 10, 1881, P. L. 107, Purd. Dig. p. 1361, pl. 89, was passed. That Act extends the benefits of the Sheriff's Interpleader Act to any claim which has been or shall be made by any person, persons or corporation not being the parties against whom process of foreign attachment has issued, to any goods or chattels taken or entitled to be taken by or under any process of foreign attachment.

The only means, then, in which a stranger to the record, which ex necessitate includes one claiming to be the owner of the goods attached by purchase or assignment from the defendant, can have any relief is under this Act; and the only relief contemplated by this Act is an interpleader. It does not, in its terms or in the very nature of things, apply to choses in action; as to these, the stranger claiming ownership in them would be as much without relief since the Act as before.

In addition to dissolving the attachment where no cause of action is shown, the court may also, on motion of the defendant or of the garnishee in his behalf, quash it, where it appears on the face of the record that the proceedings are irregular and void.

Crawford v. Stewart, 38 Pa. 34.

A debt due to a nonresident debtor is bound by a foreign attachment issued in this State, notwithstanding a previous assignment by him in trust of all his estate and effects, where the assignment was not recorded within the county in which the debt attached was due, as required by the Act of May 3, 1855, and no notice of the assignment was given to the attaching creditor.

Philson v. Barnes, 50 Pa. 280.

An assignment for the benefit of creditors, executed, delivered and recorded outside of this State, is ineffectual to pass title to property within this State, until recorded in the county where said property lies. Where, therefore, a foreign attachment is issued in said county after the execution of said attachment, but prior to the recording thereof in said county, it has priority over the attachment.

Warner's App. 13 W. N. C. 505.

Irregularities in the proceedings, and that they were commenced in violation of an agreement on the part of the plaintiffs to extend the time of payment of the debt, are not sufficient to warrant the court in dismissing the proceedings. The agreement to give time is a matter to be pleaded and tried in the regular way, and not on a motion to dismiss the suit.

Murlock v. Steiner, 45 Pa. 349.

It is error for the court in a summary manner, by motion or rule to quash, to pass upon the rights of one claiming to be assignee of the fund attached. The parties have a right to appear and plead, and have the issue tried by a jury.

Pleasants v. Cowden, 7 Watts & S. 379; Lancaster Co. Bank v. Gross, 50 Pa. 224; Lorenz v. Orady, 87 Pa. 226.

Messrs. Sharp & Alleman, for defendants in error:

If the garnishee can intervene (Morris v. Turner, 3 Clark, 428), or if a subsequent judgment creditor may do so (Pfouts v. Comford, 36 Pa. 420), the assignee for the benefit of creditors may be allowed that right.

Reed's App. 71 Pa. 382.

A foreign attachment cannot be maintained in this State for a debt not due.

McCullough v. Grishobber, 4 Watts & S. 202; Coakes v. White, 11 W. N. C. 171. See Rend v. Ware, 2 La. Ann. 498; Hearne v. Keath, 63 Mo. 84.

The foundation of the action was the existence of a debt, due and payable; the right to the effects in the garnishees' hands depended upon the legal service of the writ and their attachable character. If any of these requisites were wanting, it went to the foundation of the matter and a motion to quash was the proper one.

Troubat and H. Pr. § 2299; Downing v. Phillips, 4 Yeates, 274; Ross v. Clarke and Doane v. Penhallow, 1 Dall. 354, 218 and McCombe v. Dunch, 2 Dall. 73 (1 and 2 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 173, 108, 294).

In view of the severity of the remedy the courts have exercised the largest powers in the protection of the rights of those in interest, requiring the plaintiff to affirmatively prove his cause of action, and inquiring into it the same as on a capias where the defendant is in custody.

Troubat and H. Pr. §§ 2271, 2272; Vienne v. M'Carty, 1 Dall. 154 (1 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 79).

Prior to the passage of the Act of May 3, 1855, Purd. Dig. p. 122, pl. 14, assignments for the benefit of creditors, made by debtors domiciled in another State, had been recognized as valid in this State as to property located here and as to choses in action, where the debtor lived here, even though the assignments were not recorded here.

Lavo v. Mills, 18 Pa. 185; Speed v. May, 17 Pa. 91.

While the phraseology of the Act of May 3, 1855, standing by itself, would seem to purport an extension of the rights of foreign assignees, it is plain from the adjudicated law and the Act taken together that its purpose and effect was to limit their rights as conferred by the common law. The Act therefore, being in derogation of a common-law right, must be strictly construed and must not be held to deprive the foreign assignee of any right he previously had unless such is the plain intent of the law. But the law relates only to such property as is situate within this Commonwealth.

A chose in action whose owner is domiciled in the State of New York is not "situate within this Commonwealth," even though the debtor may be resident here.

A chose in action is an intangible thing that has no actual situation; it has only a legal situs, or is in law "situate" where the creditor is or where he resides.

Kuntzing v. Hutchinson, Legal Int. 1877, p. 865.

No Pennsylvania case prior to 1855 held any other doctrine, and the Act in question does not purport to define the word "situate," as applied to a chose, differently from what it had been defined by the prior decisions.

Philon v. Barnes, 50 Pa. 280, does not commit this court to a contrary doctrine. The point now made was not suggested by counsel or the court in that case.

Nor does Warner's App. 18 W. N. C. 505, make against this view. The property there attached was not a chose in action, but tangible personalty that was situate in this State.

So was the property in Smith's App. 104 Pa. 381, a trust fund, not a chose in action.

Mr. Chief Justice Mercur delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding in foreign attachment against the defendants who resided in New York, with notice to garnishees who resided in Philadelphia. The writ was served on the latter. On the application of Bird, assignee for the benefit of creditors of the defendants, the court quashed the writ of attachment. This is assigned as error.

The assignment of the defendants was executed on the 11th of December, 1884, and on the day following was recorded in the City of New York, where it was made, but was not recorded in Pennsylvania until the 24th of the same month.

This writ of attachment was issued and served on the 12th of December. The plaintiffs were then informed of the insolvency of the defendants, but had no knowledge of the assignment.

Neither at the issuing of the writ nor at any time thereafter was the assignee made a party to the record; nor did he pray to become such. He did not ask that the attachment be dissolved, nor that the service of the writ be set aside. He only asked that the writ itself be quashed. The court granted his request. Was this error? He certainly occupied no higher ground than the defendants under whom he held. He did not stand in the position of a good faith purchaser for value. Ritter v. Brendlinger, 58 Pa. 68; Missimer v. Ebersole, and Kent, Santee & Co's App. 87 Pa. 109, 165; Morris' App. 88 Pa. 368.

The garnishees did not allege any defect in the service on them. On the contrary, they admitted its validity and asked leave to pay in to court the money attached.

The defendants resided in the State of New York. The plaintiffs resided in this State, and the property sought to be attached was here. Was it subject to foreign attachment for a debt due from the defendants? No service of the writ on them was required. The service on the garnishees was not set aside, nor was the attachment dissolved. It is not now necessary to decide any question relating thereto. The writ having been quashed, the sole contention is whether the action of foreign attachment lies.

The Act of May 3, 1855, P. L. 415, declares: "Whenever any person, making an assignment of his or her estate situate within this Commonwealth, for the benefit of creditors, shall be resident out of this State, such assignment may be recorded within any county where such estate, real or personal may be, and take effect from its date; Provided, That no bona fide purchaser, mortgagee, or creditor having a lien thereon before the recording in the same county and not having had previous actual notice thereof, shall be affected or prejudiced" by said assignment.

The power of a State to regulate the transfer of all property within its territory is well established. Story, Conf. L. § 390; Milne v. Moreton, 6 Binn. 361; Green v. Van Buskirk, 7 Wall. 151 [74 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 113]; Warner's App. 18 W. N. C. 505.

When this power is asserted by legislation of the State where the property is situated, any principle of comity in conflict therewith must not render the legislation invalid. Id.

When, therefore, a foreign attachment is issued in any county in this Commonwealth where the property of a nonresident is situated, after the execution of an assignment in another State, but prior to the recording thereof in the county where the property is found, the attachment has priority over the assignment. Id.; Philon v. Barnes, 50 Pa. 280.

The power of quashing writs is limited to proceedings that are irregular, defective or improper. Crawford v. Stewart, 38 Pa. 34.

If it appears on the face of the record that the proceedings are void or grossly irregular, or where it is clearly shown that a valid cause of action in this form does not exist, the court may, on motion of the defendant or of the garnishees in his behalf, quash the writ. No such case is presented here. This record does not show anything irregular, defective or improper in the commencement of the action.

As we have declared, the residence of the defendants and of the garnishees, and the debt due from the latter, were such as to make the action proper. The attempt of the assignee was to show, by evidence dehors the record, that the indebtedness from the defendants to the plaintiffs was not yet due. This, however, was a disputed question which should be passed upon by a jury. The learned judge erred in determining it against the plaintiffs as matter of law, and thus putting them out of court. The right of the plaintiffs to maintain an action under all the evidence cannot be disposed of in this summary manner. An existing indebtedness from the defendants to the plaintiffs being unquestioned, the latter are entitled to have the other question which is controverted, submitted to a jury. Lancaster County Bank v. Gross, 50 Pa. 224; Lorenz v. Orlady, 87 Pa. 226.

Judgment reversed, rule to quash the attachment discharged, and a procedendo awarded.

v.

City of PHILADELPHIA.

1. As a general rule a lessee is not permitted to impeach or in any way to call in question the title of his landlord, except in cases of fraud, misrepresentation or mistake.
2. If an owner of land is in possession and, with full knowledge of his own title, takes a lease from a stranger, he will not, in the absence of fraud, misrepresentation and mistake be permitted, during the existence of the term, to assert his own title against his lessor, or as a defense to the payment of rent.
3. The same rule applies to a tenant holding over.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to Common Pleas No. 4 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment on a verdict for the defendant in an action of replevin. Affirmed.

This was an action of replevin by Frank K. Ward against the City of Philadelphia, for goods belonging to him distrained by the defendant for rent alleged to be due.

Upon avowry by the defendant the plaintiff pleaded non demisit and non tenure.

At the trial it appeared that in 1870 the City was authorized by Act of Assembly to take actual possession of any land or property at or near South Street which it might deem necessary for the site of a bridge. Under this Act the City built the arched eastern approach to the South Street Bridge, diagonally through a lot of ground belonging to one Rubicam. The lot was almost a rectangle, fronting on the Schuylkill River, and the approach divided it into two triangular pieces, one of which had all the river front.

The jury to assess damages awarded Rubicam $14,500, stating that the property was very seriously injured, and that the whole wharf front and a part of the dock adjoining on the north had been "taken."

In 1874 Rubicam sold to Ward the lot with the following reservation: "Subject to the rights of the City of Philadelphia to the use of that portion of the hereby granted premises taken and necessary for the construction of the bridge crossing the River Schuylkill at South Street."

Ward took possession of the whole lot, including the triangular space on the river and the spaces under the arches of the approach, and was in possession up to the trial. He used the property as a coal and wood yard, unloading his supplies from towboats under the bridge or on the triangular piece. His possession was undisputed until some time in the year 1880, when, having previously rented out the triangular space, he was summoned by the commissioner of city property who demanded the rents received from it, on the ground that it belonged to the City. He refused; and his possession was not again threatened until early in the year 1881, when, having been informed by bills posted on the premises that the City was about to sell immediately to the highest bidder a lease of the triangular space and the ground under the arches, he took a lease of the property in dispute, from the city, for the term of three years, commencing March 1, 1881, at the annual rental of $810. If it had been rented and occupied by another person his business would have been destroyed. Before signing another lease for this property, he happened to examine his title papers and discovered that the City had not taken the triangular lot, and that the title thereto was in himself and not in the City, and that he had a right to use the ground spanned by the arches of the bridge in such a way as not to interfere with the City's use of the ground for the purpose of perpetually maintaining the bridge, and could not be compelled to pay rent therefor; he therefore refused to pay rent to the City for his own property; whereupon, the City distrained for the same, and this action arose.

Of the rent distrained for, but $77.50 accrued under the old lease. The balance was due on a verbal contract of letting which was never reduced to writing, but was made before the plaintiff had discovered that the City had no title to the premises.

After the defendant had proved the lease, the plaintiff, having put in evidence the facts under which he was compelled to sign the lease, offered the deed from Rubicam to himself, in order to show superior title. The offer was rejected, on the ground that no fraud had been shown on the part of the City.

The verdict, by the direction of the court, was for the defendant; whereupon, the plaintiff took this writ and assigned as error the rejection of his deed.

Messrs. Ellis Ames Ballard and Rufus E. Shapley, for plaintiff in error:

The doctrine of estoppel, as applied between lessee and lessor, does not hold where the lease has been taken under fraud, force or illegal behavior on the part of the lessor.

Hamilton v. Marsden, 6 Binn. 45.

Where one in possession of property is induced to take a lease, the circumstances being such that he could not, at the time, refuse to sign it, he may, nevertheless, impeach his landlord's title. And it is for the jury to say whether, under the circumstances, his acceptance of the lease was a waiver or abandonment of his title.

Brown v. Dyeinger, 1 Rawle, 408, 415.

In Robins v. Kitchen, 8 Watts, 390, it is said that upon the issues of non demisit and no rent in arrear, it is competent for the plaintiff to show that he was induced to execute the lease and become the tenant of the defendant, by fraud and misrepresentation, and that at the time it was executed he was really the owner of the land himself.

In the present case the plaintiff's position is greatly strengthened by the fact that he had enjoyed the exclusive and uninterrupted possession of the property in dispute for six years, and that, indeed, the City had never before either been in possession or asserted its right so to be.

Where one in peaceable possession of property is approached by another who has no right and who induces him to become his tenant, it must be by some misrepresentation of fact or law or both, or by some unfair combination between him and the tenant.

Hockenbury v. Snyder, 2 Watts & S. 240; Baskin v. Sechrist, 6 Pa. 154, 163; Miller v. McBrier, 14 Serg. & R. 382; Hall v. Benner, 1 Penr. & W. 402.

The wording of the Act under which, in this case, the City took the property in dispute is: "The city commissioners may take actual possession of any land or property at or near South Street which they may deem necessary for the site of the bridge."

Act April 28, 1870, P. L. 1289.

To vest the fee in the public it must clearly appear that it was the intention of the Legislature, disclosed by the Act itself, to take a fee.

Washington Cemetery v. R. R. Co. 68 N. Y. 591.

No more of the title is divested from the former owner than is necessary for the public use. Redf. Railways, 156.

"If the language of the Act admits of a construction which will leave a fee in the owner, subject to the public easement; it will be so construed."

Mills, Em. Dom. § 49.

The fact that the word "taken" is used, either in the Act of Assembly or in the award of the jury, does not raise a presumption that a fee was intended.

People v. Blake, 19 Cal. 579; Mills, Em. Dom. § 80.

The owner of property along which a road has been built at an elevation can use the spaces under the trestle or arches, provided such use does not interfere with the use of the road.

R. R. Co. v. Allen, 22 Kan. 285; Overman v. May, 35 Iowa, 89.

The wording of the Act of Assembly in the present case is not so strong as that before the court in two other instances, in which it was held that the State or its representative took but an easement.

R. R. Co. v. Johnson, 59 Pa. 29; R. R. Co. v. Bruce, 102 Pa. 23.

Messrs. Frank M. Riter, Robert Alexander and Charles F. Warwick, for defendant in error:

"It is a general rule that neither the tenant, nor one claiming under him, will be permitted to controvert the title of the landlord by showing a better title to the demised premises, either in himself or in a third party. To this rule there are, however, some exceptions, and the tenant may dispute the landlord's title under the following circumstances:

When he can show that the landlord had only a life estate in the premises, which has terminated by his decease.

When he can show that the title of the landlord has expired.

When he can show that the landlord's reversion has been sold.

When he can show that the title to the premises has become vested in himself, by the advice of the landlord.

When he can show that he was induced to accept a lease, by the illegal behavior, fraud or misrepresentation of the landlord.

When he can show that the landlord is holding in violation of law."

Jackson and Gross, Land. & T. p. 336.

The exception to the rule forbidding a tenant to dispute his landlord's title extends only to cases of fraud, misrepresentation and illegal behavior on the part of the landlord.

Society of United Brethren*, 20 Pa. 60; Mays v. Dwight, 82 Pa. 462; Smith v. Crosland, 106 Pa. 413.

Mr. Justice Trunkey delivered the opinion of the court:

Ward's deed is dated June 1, 1874, and is on its face subject to the rights of the City to the use of that portion of the premises taken and necessary for the bridge. He has been in possession of the premises since the execution of his deed.

In 1881 he became a party to the lease, in which he covenanted to pay rent and to deliver up the premises to the City at the end of the term. Before he accepted the lease he knew all the facts, saw an advertisement for a public sale, attended the sale and became the highest bidder for the lease.

Prior to the advertisement, the commissioner of city property had demanded rent from Ward, on the ground that the City owned the land; the commissioner claimed that the City was the owner.

The assertion at the argument that the City threatened Ward that unless he should accept a lease, a powerful corporation would be put into possession, is a mistake. Ward testifies that the commissioner told him the City had received an offer from such corporation for the use of the premises. But the offer was not accepted; on the contrary, the lease was sold at auction to Ward himself.

There is no evidence that the city officer made false statements respecting the title, or that he made threats or menaces, or that he threatened to convey or lease to another person, before Ward could consult and advise with others, or that Ward was imbecile. The testimony discloses no sign of coercion. In fact, Ward knew what the title was, and preferred taking a lease to resisting the adverse claim. He does not say that it was told him or that he believed that a lessee under the City would have a better right to possession than the City, or could take it by force. Nor is there anything to show a mistake, that is, "some unintentional act or omission or error, arising from ignorance, surprise, imposition, or misplaced confidence."

Where an ignorant, imbecile and timid old man has been induced to take a lease of his own land, by misrepresentation and threats, the proof of such misrepresentation and threats need not be very strong. Robins v. Kitchen, 8 Watts, 390.

If one who has no right induces the owner who is in possession to become his tenant, it will require little proof of fraud, or threats, or imbecility, or some undue influence, to dissolve the relation of landlord and tenant, and put the tenant into the situation in which he was before he was induced to sign the lease. Hockenbury v. Snyder, 2 Watts & S. 240.

As a general rule it is incontrovertible that a lessee is not permitted to impeach or in any way to call into question the title of his landlord, except he has been guilty of fraud, misrepresentation or unfair dealing in the transaction. And the exception is more stringently applicable where the owner or tenant in possession takes the lease. It matters not whether the deception practiced is voluntary falsehood or is simple mistake, for the immunity it confers springs not so much from the fraud of the lessor as from the wrong which the deception would work upon the rights of the lessee. Baskin v. Seechrist, 6 Pa. 154.

But deception is not to be inferred without any evidence; neither is mistake. If the lessee was in possession at the time the lease was executed, and the lessor had no title or right of possession, the lessee may resist proceedings to turn him out, because the landlord, if he fails, is in no worse condition than he was before the lease. In order, however, to give the tenant this right, it is necessary to prove that he accepted the lease in mistake, or was induced to accept it by some fraud or misrepresentation. A lease given in good faith by one party and accepted by another with his eyes open is valid and binding on both. The mere fact that the tenant has a better title than his landlord does not of itself raise the presumption that the lease was a fraud, or accepted by mistake. Thayer v. Society of United Brethren, 20 Pa. 60.

That case was for recovery of possession; its doctrine could not apply with less force in a proceeding to collect rent.

The same rule extends to a tenant holding over, as to a tenant within the stipulated term. Taylor, Land & Ten. § 705.

v.

Andrew BRYDEN.

1. The finding of a jury upon a controverted question of fact is conclusive, unless the trial judge erred in the admission or rejection of testimony or in his instruction to the jury.
2. An assignment of policies to pay a debt of the assignor is not void as to his creditors because there is no time therein provided for the payment of the debt, or for the return of the surplus to the assignor, and especially where there is no surplus.
3. Such an assignment, duly recorded, is not inadmissible in evidence because it is not a recordable paper, as being necessarily void as to creditors.
4. That the deed of assignment of a limited partnership was at first indexed in the "Limited Partnership Docket" and not in the "Deed Book Index" does not invalidate the recording of the instrument.
5. A deed left with the recorder for the purpose of being recorded is, in contemplation of law, recorded, and takes effect, from the time it was so left.
6. Actual notice of a deed is equivalent to its recording.

7. Where a debtor assigned part of his property in trust to pay certain specified debts on a feigned issue to try the ownership of the proceeds of the assigned property, to which the trustee is a party, evidence to prove the insolvency of the assignor for the purpose of avoiding the assignment as to other creditors, is inadmissible.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Luzerne County, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in a feigned issue to try the title to certain insurance moneys. Affirmed.

On November 30, 1882, certain property of the Pittston Knitting Company, limited, was destroyed by fire and there became due to said company, on policies of insurance issued on such property, the sum of $15,168.93. Two of the policies were made payable to beneficiaries (creditors) therein named; and after deducting the amount of their adjusted loss the sum of $10,669.08 was found due the company.

In November, 1882, George H. Sheble & Co. obtained a judgment against the company and, December 14, 1882, attached in the hands of the insurance companies the amount of the insurance moneys due the company.

On December 1, 1882, the knitting company by instrument in writing assigned to Andrew Bryden, as trustee, all its insurance policies and money due thereon: first, for the benefit of certain of the bondholders of the knitting company; second, to return to the knitting company any surplus that might be left after the payment of these bondholders.

Andrew Bryden, as plaintiff, and George H. Sheble et al., as defendants, were made parties to a feigned issue to try the ownership of the moneys due from the insurance companies, and such moneys were paid into court.

The court allowed Bryden as trustee to interplead in the attachment suit judgment of Sheble et al., and with the approval of the court an interpleaded issue was raised by way of declaration averring, and plea denying, that the right of property to the fund in court was in said Bryden as trustee.

At the trial of such issue before Rice, P. J., Bryden, the plaintiff in such issue, showed that on March 1, 1880, the knitting company executed a mortgage to him as trustee to secure bonds to the amount of $12,000, and alleged that these bonds were held by different parties and that the assignment to Bryden was for their benefit.

Bryden testified that the assignment was delivered to him December 1, 1882, and that it was handed back to have it acknowledged and recorded. It was acknowledged December 29, 1882, and recorded December 30, in Limited Partnership Book, No. 1, in the office of the Recorder of Deeds of Luzerne County, and was not indexed in the deed book until July 5, 1883.

The court, RICE, P. J., charged inter alia as follows:

"It is alleged by the defendants that this assignment was invalid. You have heard the course of the argument and the contest that has been before the court as to certain questions of evidence; their first point being that this assignment was invalid because the knitting company was insolvent at the time, and that they could not prefer these creditors except by following the method which the law has provided. We have held, however, that that question is not material in the present issue, for if they were insolvent, then by operation of law the assignment became an assignment for the benefit of all of the creditors, notwithstanding only certain of the creditors were mentioned in it; and if in another issue it should be ascertained as a matter of fact that the company was insolvent at that time, then, as we at present view the law, this assignment would be by operation of law for the benefit of all of the creditors and not simply of the bondholders.

"We have been requested by the defendants' counsel to charge you upon two points, which substantially raise the questions involved in the case. They are as follows:

"I. That the deed to Bryden is void because delaying the defendants from realizing their judgment from the moneys in court, no time being provided for the payment of the bonds therein mentioned or for the return of the surplus to the assignor. The verdict of the jury must therefore be for the defendants and against the plaintiff."

"We decline to charge as requested in that point. In the first place [if as matter of fact the bonds amounted to $12,000, and the fund which was assigned only amounted to something like $10,000, the reservation to the plaintiff of any surplus which might be left after the payment of these bondholders would be entirely harmless; because there would be no surplus.] In the next place [this assignment, as we view it, did not remove this surplus, if any, from the grasp or reach of an attaching creditor. In effect, in equity at least, the assignment was only of so much of the fund as was necessary to satisfy the bondholders; and the residue, if any, could have been attached and reached as the property and effects of the Pittston Knitting Company, even though the assignment might have been in terms for the whole fund.] Hence, we decline to charge as requested on that point. We are of opinion, as the case is now presented, that the assignment was valid, and if there were nothing else in the case, would entitle the plaintiff to the fund in court.

"II. That a deed of assignment must be delivered; and if the jury find that there was no formal delivery, then the time will be presumed to be when the assignment was acknowledged without the officers of the knitting company saying or doing anything to qualify the act of acknowledging the deed. The acknowledgment being after the attachment of the defendants, the verdict must be for the defendants."

"We decline to charge as requested in that point. It is essential to every paper of this nature that it be executed, of course. That includes a delivery.

"There would be a presumption of delivery at the time that it purported to have been executed; but if you believe the testimony of Mr. Bryden, who has testified as matter of fact that the deed was delivered to him on the evening of December 1, 1882, then there was a sufficient delivery of the deed to vest in him the title, notwithstanding it was subsequently taken back to the officers of the company to be acknowledged."

edged. We say if you believe the testimony of Mr. Bryden upon this subject (and there is no contradictory testimony), then the delivery was sufficient and the title vested in him, and your verdict should be for the plaintiff."

Verdict was for the plaintiff, Bryden, upon which judgment was entered and defendants took this writ assigning as error 1 and 2, the portions of the charge of the court embraced in brackets; and 3, the action of the court in declining to charge as requested in the first point.

4 and 5. In overruling the objections to the admission in evidence of the assignment to Bryden: 1, on the ground that it is not a recordable paper; 2, that it is void as hindering the collection of the judgment on which the attachment was executed.

6. In sustaining plaintiffs' objection [as irrelevant] to proof that the assignment to Bryden was not indexed in the general deed index, as required by the Act of 1875, within thirty days from its date.

7. In sustaining objection to defendants' offer to prove the insolvency of the assignor, for the purpose of avoiding the assignment.

8. In overruling the offer to show that the assignment was an assignment for the benefit of creditors and not recorded within thirty days.

Messrs. F. C. Sturgis and John Bethell Uhle, for plaintiffs in error:

The assignment was invalid. There was a reservation of the surplus.

Bentz v. Rocky, 71 Pa. 77.

The law regards the fact of the reservation of a portion as fraudulent, without inquiring as to whether there is a surplus. Hart v. McFarland, 13 Pa. 182.

The learned judge erred in holding that the ability to attach any surplus would save the assignment; for it is the delay and the hindrance which the law objects to, not the ability to realize at a deferred time or after the surplus has been ascertained.

Adlum v. Yard, 1 Rawle, 163, 171.

An absolute conveyance without valuable consideration cannot stand where there are creditors, unless the grantor has sufficient ability to otherwise pay his debts and there has been no collusion.

Kepner v. Burkhart, 5 Pa. 478; Chambers v. Spencer, 5 Watts, 404.

Or rather, to draw the line closer: "If a deed is a voluntary one, and its effect is to hinder or delay creditors * * * a vendee without consideration, whether there was fraud on his part or not, would take no title as against creditors."

Clark v. Depew, 25 Pa. 509, 516.

The court below refused to consider any evidence showing a failure to enter the assignment on the general deed index of the county, within the thirty days, solely because this court had ruled the effect of the laws prior to the Act of 1875 to be that a paper was recorded when handed to the recorder, with his fees.

Glading v. Frick, 88 Pa. 460, 464; Clader v. Thomas, 89 Pa. 343, 345; Schell v. Stein, 76 Pa. 398, 401.

But this court has not yet considered the effect of the Act of 1875.

Wyoming Nat. Bank's App. 11 W. N. C. 567, 568.

Notice is the first and greatest of the two reasons for recording an assignment for the benefit of creditors.

Englebert v. Blanjet, 1 Miles, 226; Dougherty v. Darrach, 15 Pa. 402; Reigart's App. 4 Pa. 477.

The plaintiffs in error contend that no notice is equivalent to no recording.

By P. L. 1875, p. 32, Brightly, Purd. Dig. 566, ed. 1885, the Legislature expressly declared it to be the recorder's duty to keep a general index, the absence of which requirement was the foundation for the ruling that the indexes were for the recorder's convenience and not for the notification of the citizen. In other words, formerly everyone received record notice of a deed, etc., as soon as it should be accepted by the recorder for record, although no entry of its contents had been made on the books.

Schell v. Stein, 76 Pa. 898, 401.

And this was said, notwithstanding each book of deeds was required to have an index.

Speer v. Evans, 47 Pa. 144.

Because the Act of 1827 did not make the index notice, as the Act of 1875 does.

Sec. 5. Act March 29, 1827, P. L. 156, Brightly, Purd. 1467.

The instances are rare in which an Act of Assembly designates the book in which an instrument must be recorded. Where such direction is given in a statute its terms must be complied with or the record would be worthless.

Glading v. Frick, 88 Pa. 460, 463, 462.

Mr. George S. Ferris, for defendant in error:

The assignment is not void as hindering or delaying creditors. The surplus, if any there might be, at once became payable to the assignor and attachable by its creditors, with no greater hindrance and delay than if the assignment had not been made.

Hubler v. Waterman, 33 Pa. 414.

There is nothing to invalidate the assignment, in the provision that any surplus, if any, is to be returned to the assignor. This reversionary clause could have nothing to operate upon, there being no surplus. Nor is such provision in contravention of law. It is no more than the law would require without it. It does not impair the rights of any creditor in any way, and "would be implied if it were not expressed."

Hubler v. Waterman, 33 Pa. 414; Wiener v. Davis, 18 Pa. 333; Heckman v. Messinger, 49 Pa. 473; Dana v. Bank of U. S. 5 Watts & S. 223, 250.

Even if the effect of the assignment were to hinder and delay creditors it would not be void.

Witt v. Franklin, 1 Binn. 513, 514.

The validity of such assignments has been recognized by legislative authority and by all the cases since Witt v. Franklin.

Under the earlier Acts preferences were allowed. The Act of April 17, 1843, however, while making the preferences void, continued the assignment as valid, but to inure to the benefit of all, instead of the preferred creditors. And this is true as against attaching creditors.

Wiener v. Davis, 18 Pa. 331; Law v. Mills, Id. 185; First National Bank of Newark v. Holmes, 85 Pa. 231.

The assignment was recorded "within thirty days after the execution thereof" in the recorder's office of the proper county.

Act March 28, 1818, Purd. 121.

The recording of the assignment in the limited partnership book by the recorder will not invalidate it.

There being no requirement in the Act that the paper should be recorded in any particular book, it was properly recorded in any book kept by the recorder. The party depositing the instrument has nothing to do with the book in which it is recorded.

McLanahan v. Reeside, 9 Watts, 511; Glading v. Frick, 88 Pa. 463; Clader v. Thomas, 89 Pa. 343; Paige v. Wheeler, 92 Pa. 282; Marks' App. 85 Pa. 231, 234.

These rules of law are not affected by the Act of March 18, 1875, P. L. 32, requiring recorders of deeds to keep general, direct and ad sectam indices to deeds and mortgages.

The Act is in pari materia with and would seem to point to and supplement the system of legislation known as the Recording Acts. It should therefore be construed in reference to them. These Acts have to do with titles to real estate, and do not apply to assignments for the benefit of creditors.

Spackman v. Ott, 65 Pa. 131.

The moment an assignment for the benefit of creditors is placed, by the assignor or anyone interested, in the office of the recorder of deeds of the proper county and within the prescribed time, the beneficial interest of the creditors, the cestuis que trust, is certainly and completely vested.

Marks' App. 85 Pa. 231.

Mr. Justice Sterrett delivered the opinion of the court:

The controlling question of fact, properly submitted to the jury and by them found in favor of plaintiff in the issue, was whether the assignment to him of the insurance policies was duly executed and delivered before the attachment execution of defendants below was issued. This finding of the jury is conclusive of the case, unless the learned judge erred in the admission or rejection of testimony, or in his instructions to the jury.

There was no error in charging as complained of in the first and second specifications, nor in refusing to affirm defendants' first point, viz.: "That the deed to Bryden is void, because delaying the defendants from realizing their judgment from the moneys in court, no time being provided for the payment of the bonds therein mentioned or for the return of the surplus to the assignor. The verdict of the jury must therefore be for the defendant and against the plaintiff."

The testimony tended to prove that the bonds, for payment of which the policies were assigned, amounted to $2,000 more than the insurance. In view of this evidence the learned judge said if that was the fact, the reservation to the Pittston Knitting Company, the assignor, of any surplus that might remain after payment of the bondholders would be harmless, because there would be no surplus. In the next place, the reservation of a possible surplus did not remove it from the grasp of attaching creditors. In effect the assignment was only of so much of the insurance money as would satisfy the bondholders. The residue, if any, could have been attached as the property of the assignor.

The fourth and fifth specifications, relating to the admission in evidence of the deed of assignment, cannot be sustained; nor is there any merit in the objection covered by the sixth specification, that the deed of assignment was at first indexed in the "Limited Partnership Docket" and not in the "Deed Book Index." This did not invalidate the recording of the instrument. In contemplation of law it was recorded and took effect from the time it was left with the recorder, for the purpose of being duly recorded. This principle is recognized in Glading v. Frick, 88 Pa. 463; Clader v. Thomas, 89 Pa. 343; Paige v. Wheeler, 92 Pa. 282, and Marks' App. 85 Pa. 231.

Plaintiffs in error were not prejudiced by the failure of the recorder to enter the assignment on the general deed index. Their attachment issued before the instrument was left for record but, as the jury found, after it was executed and delivered; and they appear to have had actual notice before any further steps were taken.

There is nothing in the remaining specifications of error that requires special notice. There is no merit in either of them. The issue was well tried, and we discover nothing in any of the rulings of the court that would warrant a reversal of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

APPEAL of George H. SHIBLE et al.

1. An auditor's finding upon a pure question of fact, when the court is not satisfied that a mistake has been committed, must be confirmed.
2. An assignment by a solvent assignor of a portion of his property to pay certain specified debts is not void as to his other creditors; and the latter cannot participate in the distribution of the fund.

(Decided October 4, 1886.)

APPEAL from a decree of the Common Pleas of Luzerne County, overruling exceptions to the report of an auditor distributing moneys in the hands of a trustee for creditors. Affirmed.

The questions in this case arise out of the facts stated in the preceding case of Shible v. Bryden.

Bryden stated an account as trustee, which was excepted to by appellants and referred, by agreement of counsel, to William S. McLean, as auditor, to pass upon the exceptions and report distributions. The exceptions were practically abandoned and the contest before the auditor was on the question of distribution: whether it should be confined to the bondholders for whom the assignment was intended, or should embrace as well the other creditors of the company.

The appellants claimed, with other creditors, that the knitting company was insolvent at the time of making the assignment, and made it to prefer creditors, and on account of inability to pay its debts, and that the assignment consequently inured to the benefit of all creditors of the company, under the Act of April 17, 1848, P. L. 278.

The bondholders contended that the insurance money should be distributed pro rata only to them, for the reason that when the assignment was made the knitting company was able to pay its debts.

The auditor reported inter alia as follows:

"A great deal of evidence was adduced by the creditors other than the bondholders, going to show that when the assignment was made the company was insolvent. A great mass of testimony was also adduced by the bondholders going to show that when the assignment was made the company was solvent. The witnesses to insolvency were highly respectable and disinterested in the question at issue. The witnesses to solvency were equally respectable, but mainly interested in the question at issue.

We have carefully and conscientiously considered and analyzed the testimony upon one side and the other. We have also carefully gone over the briefs of the learned counsel on the one side and the other on this point. We are convinced that all of the witnesses are equally honest in their opinions of value; and the result of our examination is that the weight of the testimony established the fact that, at the time of the assignment in question, the company was solvent; or in other words, that at that time, its assets exceeded in amount its liabilities. In coming to this conclusion we have not forgotten the interest of some of the witnesses to solvency in the question at issue, and we are mindful that that interest may affect the judgment; but we are also convinced that it does not necessarily.

"The witnesses in support of solvency, as a rule, seemed more familiar with the premises in controversy and the property on them than the witnesses in support of insolvency. The average estimate of value of all the witnesses called clearly established the solvency of the company at the time of the assignment; so does the average estimate of the exceptant's witnesses. A tabulated statement of these averages was prepared for us by the counsel for the trustee. We have examined it carefully, found it correct, and have adopted it as a part of our report, not as establishing in itself the main question, but simply to present one feature of it. We are convinced of the fact of solvency from the weight of the testimony alone, and not from any rule of average.

"We, therefore, specifically find as facts:

"First, that the Pittston Knitting Company 'Limited,' made an assignment to Andrew Bryden, of the insurance money belonging to it in trust for the bondholders aforesaid, some of the creditors only of the company.

"Second, that it then was of ability to pay its debts; and,

"Third, that this assignment was made to prefer these bondholders.

"We also find, as a conclusion of law, that the money so assigned belongs to these bondholders; and after deducting reasonable expenses, it should be distributed to them, in proportion to their respective demands.

"We will now proceed to dispose of the exceptions, which are four in number:

"The second exception charges that the claim of the trustee for services is excessive. The claim is $531. There was no testimony taken to support the exception; hence it must be disposed of on what appears in the account. At common law, the rule is "that a trustee, executor or administrator shall have no allowance for his care and trouble. 2 L. Cas. Eq. Part 1, Page 508.

"This rule does not prevail in Pennsylvania. Swartswalter's Acct. 4 Watts, 79; Rawle, Note, 2 L. Cas. Eq. Part 1, p. 317.

"And the general practice in this State is to allow compensation to trustees by commission; 5 per cent is the usual allowance. The accountant in this case has charged 5 per cent on the money for distribution. We think we are justified in enforcing the rule laid down by Judge Rhone in the Watson Estate, 6 Kulp, 13, which reads as follows:

"When over 5 per cent is charged for services of an administrator, and is excepted to, the burden of proof is on him to show that his services are worth more than that sum; and when the parties interested desire to have the charges reduced below 5 per cent, the burden of proof is on them to show that it is worth less.' The second exception is, therefore, discharged.

"The first exception charges that the counsel fee is excessive. The counsel fee, together with the expenses incurred in defending the fund for distribution, amounts to $550. Since the trustee is entitled to an allowance of reasonable counsel fees, and other expenses necessary for his guidance, and incurred in protecting the trust fund, we cannot see how, in the absence of any evidence in support of the exception, we can sustain it. There seems from examination of the account to have been a contest over the ownership of the insurance money between certain creditors of the knitting company and the trustee. Taking into consideration this contest, the amount of money involved, and the absence of any testimony going to show that the charges in question are excessive, we are inclined to hold that they are reasonable; and, therefore, we overrule the first exception.

"The third exception complains that the accountant has not charged himself with interest on the money for distribution. There is no evidence that he received any; he never actually had the moneys in his possession. They were paid into court by the insurance companies. The trustee was not to collect and invest the trust funds; his duty was simply to collect and pay them over to the parties entitled to them. Not being obliged to invest or able to invest, it clearly became the duty of the exceptant to support his exceptions by affirmative testimony. This was not done; and, therefore, we are obliged to overrule the third exception.

"The fourth exception is general and we find nothing in the testimony requiring us to consider it; and therefore, it is dismissed.

"Counsel for exceptant have in writing requested us to find certain facts and conclusions of law, which we have appended to the report and which we will now proceed to answer.

"We find substantially the first fact as requested. The request states the indebtedness of the Pittston Knitting Company 'Limited' at the date of the assignment, December 1, 1882, at over $25,400. We find as a matter of fact that the indebtedness was about $25,150; this amount was past due when the assignment was made, except $4,000.

"We find the second fact substantially as requested. The request states the assets of the Pittston Knitting Company 'Limited' on the first of December, 1882, to consist of claims for insurance money, amounting to $15,168.92, and the factory lot. We find as matter of fact that the assets consisted of the $15,168.92 of insurance money, the factory lot and the improvements not destroyed by the fire, together with the engine and machinery upon it, and that the insurance money was not payable until sixty days from the proof of loss.

"The first conclusion of law which we are requested to find, we refuse. The request is in the following words: '1. The value of the factory lot is immaterial in this case; and from the undisputed testimony in this case, the assignment to Andrew Bryden comes under the provision of the Act of April 17, 1843, and inures to the benefit of all the creditors.' We are of opinion that the value of the factory lot is material, in order to determine the question whether the knitting company at the time of the assignment was of sufficient ability to pay its debts. The value of this lot must necessarily be considered.

"The second conclusion of law which we are requested to find, is in the following language: 'If the assets of the Pittston Knitting Company exceeded their liabilities at the time of the assignment, yet if they were not available and could not be readily converted into cash, then the assignment comes within the provisions of the Act of April 17, 1843, and inures to the benefit of all the creditors.' This request embodies matter of fact rather than of law. The question of the availability of assets, and their ready conversion into cash, is one of fact. If an asset is not available, it is because of the fact that it is worthless; if it cannot readily be converted into cash, it is because of the fact that it has not a ready sale in the market. For these reasons we must refuse to find the request as stated; but we do find specially that the assets of the knitting company were available; that is, that they could be converted into cash, and that they had a market value at the time of the assignment.

"Having disposed of all the questions raised by the exceptions, the evidence and the requests, we will first distribute to the costs of the audit, and the balance of the trust moneys we will distribute to the bondholders, the ce-tuis que trust, pro rata, according to their respective demands. The owners of the bonds appear in a list appended to this report, which was conceded by all parties to be correct.

"The fund for distribution as per the account filed is - - - $9,487.27

From which deduct:

Paid prothonotary filing acct.	$2.50
Recording this report	5.57
Advertising audit	6.00
Auditor's fee	100.00—114.07

* Balance to be distributed to bondholders - - - $9,373.20

"The bondholders are entitled to 78.11 cents on the dollar on the face of the bonds."

Supplement to foregoing report:

"In the oral argument, after the taking of the testimony, we were asked by Mr. Sturgis, of counsel for exceptant, to strike out the testimony of all the witnesses, called to support the solvency of the "Knitting Co., Limited," who were bondholders, for the reason that, being experts and interested, their testimony was not admissible. We forgot to pass upon this request, in writing up our report, but will proceed to do so now.

"We refuse to strike out the testimony of these witnesses. The Act of 1869 makes them competent. It makes no distinction between an expert and an ordinary witness.

"Besides, if it were the law that an expert, interested in the issue, is still incompetent as a witness, the testimony in question could not be stricken out, because the witnesses who gave it simply testified as to the value of certain real estate, or, in other words, knowing the real estate, gave their opinions as to its value. They were not called as experts, but as ordinary witnesses, having a knowledge of the land in question. The market value of land is not such a question of science and skill upon which only an expert can give an opinion. Canal Co. v. Bunnell, 81 Pa. 414; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 440 a; Rogers, Expert Testimony, § 162."

The appellants excepted to the report of the auditor, and on the argument on such exceptions before the court below, the following opinion was delivered by RICE, P. J.:

"Four things are essential to entitle the exceptants to participate in this distribution: 1, inability of the assignors to pay their debts; 2, an assignment on that account; 3, in trust; 4, to prefer one or more creditors. The fourth essential has been correctly found by the auditor, and the third appears on the face of the assignment; but the first two the learned auditor negatives.

"It is unnecessary to attempt any general definition of the term, insolvency, which will apply to all cases. It is enough to ascertain its meaning in an assignment of this kind; and I think the following definition is correct and applicable: Insolvency, then, is the inadequacy of a debtor's means, that is, of his whole means or resources (including not only money or its equivalent, but property in its most extensive sense), for the payment of his debts. Debts are paid with property; and so long as a debtor is in possession of means of any kind with which or out of which he can himself at once discharge all his liabilities in full, or out of which his creditors can collect all their debts by legal process, he cannot be considered insolvent. Burr. Assign. 78 et seq.; Herrick v. Borst, 4 Will, 652.

"Now it appears that on November 30, 1882, a large portion of the property of the Pittston Knitting Company (limited) was destroyed by fire. On the following day the company assigned the policies of insurance, and the money to become due on the same, to the accountant, in trust for the benefit of certain preferred creditors.

"Mr. Stinson, the managing superintendent of the company's affairs, says: 'Immediately preceding the fire the knitting company was not in a prosperous condition. They were unable to meet their indebtedness at that time. The indebtedness past due was considerable. Notes were given prior to the fire which matured before the fire. A number of these notes were not paid; some of them were protested. Before the fire suits were brought against the company. The company had been requested to pay claims. Don't think any threats were made if they did not pay. There were one or two intimations from creditors that they would have to collect their claims.'

"On cross examination, he says: 'We considered that the day after the fire we had more property than required to pay debts. I mean, when I say that the company at the time of the fire were not able to pay their debts, that they were not prepared at that time to do so. Most of the mortgage debt was not due.'

"The evidence also shows that about a week before the assignment, awards of arbitrators had been filed in two suits against the company, in the gross amount of $4,586.56, and that appeals have not since been taken.

"Under all these circumstances, we think it is correct to say that, if the remaining assets of the company were insufficient, upon an immediate liquidation, to pay the remaining debts of the assignors, the fact of insolvency is made out; the inference is then irresistible that the assignment was made on account of their insolvency, and being made in trust to prefer a part of the creditors, it becomes by operation of law an assignment for the benefit of all the creditors. Act April 17, 1843, P. L. 278.

"If such circumstances (the fact of insolvency being for the moment assumed) do not establish the second essential stated at the outset, it is difficult to see how the fact that the assignment was made on account of the inability of the assignor to pay his debts could be proved in any case where he had not expressly declared his reasons in the assignment itself.

"Where an assignment is made under the circumstances disclosed by this evidence, the debtor has no right to say to his unpreferred creditors: 'If I am permitted and given time to administer my remaining assets, I can eventually pay you in full.' He must be able to say: 'My remaining assets are at once convertible into money sufficient to pay you in full.' Otherwise the purpose of the legislation against preferences would be frustrated, and the failing debtor would still be enabled to dictate the course his property shall take.
